The First Methodist Church (Evanston) membership, which stood at 1,000 when he came in 1918, increased almost three and a half times during his thirty-one-year ministry. To meet the needs of this growing congregation, enlargements and remodeling of the church plant costing some $750,000 were undertaken in the late '20s and completed in 1930. This made the church proper one of Methodism's most impressive religious structures and gave it a Gothic chapel of unusual grace and beauty. In 1966 this chapel was rededicated in Tittle's memory as "The Ernest Fremont Tittle Chapel."

Though an indefatigable pastor and preacher and active in Evanston community life, Tittle's contributions to the denomination at large and to the ecumenical movement are suggested by the following activities:

He was a delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCES of 1928, '32, '36, '40, and '44, and to the JURISDICTIONAL CONFERENCES of 1940 and '44. He attended the Oxford World Conference on Church, Community and State in England; was a member of three major commissions of the former FEDERAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, and of the Crusade for a New World Order sponsored by the Methodist COUNCIL OF BISHOPS. He was president of the Chicago Council Against Racial and Religious Discrimination, and was a longtime member and finally chairman of the WORLD PEACE COMMISSION of The Methodist Church. At the General Conference of The Methodist Church in 1944, during the progress of World War II, Tittle, as Chairman of the important committee on the State of the Church, presented a majority report from that Committee whose effect was to refuse to sanction prayer for victory during the great conflict. A minority report asking that the Church pray for victory presented by CHARLES PARLIN was adopted by the General Conference on a "vote by orders"—by only one clerical vote. A report reconciling the two sides was subsequently worked out a day or two later.

In 1937 Tittle suffered a serious heart attack, but continued with only slightly curtailed energies his many activities at both the local and national levels. As he grew older his preaching was based more and more on those central truths relating to the nature of God and Christ and their relevance to man's place in the universe. A special emphasis in his services of worship, which were always dignified and liturgical, was his pastoral prayer. To the preparation of these prayers he gave almost as much time and prayerful thought as to his carefully organized sermons. He wrote a book of Pastoral Prayers in his later life and in this book made much of his helpful thought along this line available to other ministers.

His sermons were delivered with only an occasional written memorandum and upon their preparation he once stated to the editor of this Encyclopedia that he put "six hours a day, six days a week." Without the help of a public address system his voice easily reached to the farthest pew in a church which seated 1300 people.

Tittle was a prolific writer and ten of his books were published before his death and three in the years immediately following. Among these were What Must the Church Do to Be Saved?, 1921; The Foolishness of Preaching, 1930; Christians in an Unchristian Society, 1939; A Mighty Fortress, 1949-1950 (which contained a biographical introduction by Paul Hutchinson, entitled "Portrait of a Preacher"); and A Book of Pastoral Prayers, as mentioned above, 1951.

Dr. Tittle was at work upon the exposition of St. Luke's gospel for the INTERPRETER'S BIBLE when he died leaving his work uncompleted. The part of the writing he had completed was subsequently brought out by another publisher in a book entitled The Gospel According to Luke, 1951. A sudden heart attack took his life on Aug. 3, 1949.

ELEANOR DARNALL WALLACE

TITUS, MURRAY THURSTON (1885-1964), American missionary to INDIA, considered one of the foremost authorities on Mohammedanism, was born on Nov. 5, 1885, in Batavia, Ohio. He was educated at OHIO WESLEYAN, Chicago University, and the Kennedy School of Missions, receiving in time the degrees of Ph.D. and D.D. On July 6, 1910, he was married to the former Olive Glasgow, and they went to India that same year. He first served as an instructor in English in LUCKNOW CHRISTIAN COLLEGE. Subsequent appointments in India included: DISTRICT SUPERINTENDENT, Bijoor, Budaun, and Moradabad Districts; principal, Lucknow Christian College; and secretary of National Christian Council. He served for many years as honorary treasurer of the executive board of the M.E. Church in Southern Asia.

A careful student of Mohammedanism, and especially its place in the life of India, he wrote The Religious Quest of India (Oxford Press), Islam in India, The Young Moslem Looks at Life, and A Primer of Islam. He was widely acclaimed by Christians and Moslems for the breadth and depth of his understanding and the accuracy and fairness of his writings.

He retired from missionary service on Nov. 1, 1951, and subsequently became professor of missions at WESTMINSTER SEMINARY (now Wesley Seminary) at Washington, D.C. He died on Oct. 31, 1964. The executive committee of the Board of Missions paying its tribute to him quoted him as saying, "The enduring values are not ended by life's earthly span."

TOASE, WILLIAM (1782-1863), British Wesleyan pioneer in the CHANNEL ISLANDS and FRANCE, was born Aug. 23, 1782, at Kilton, near Guisborough, Yorkshire, and entered the Wesleyan ministry in 1804. He spoke French, and after early home missionary service he worked among French prisoners of war in England, 1810-15. From 1815-22 he was appointed as general superintendent of the Channel Islands societies. From 1836-47, he did much to organize Wesleyan work in France. Superannuating in 1848, he returned to the Channel Islands, but in 1852 he was appointed to take charge of the work in Boulogne. He died there on Sept. 20, 1863.

TOCKER, ANNIE CONSTANCE (1889-), NEW ZEALAND deaconess, was born and brought up at Greytown in the Wairaparapa district. She served the Greytown Borough Council, first as librarian (1910) and later as assistant town clerk (1912). In 1914, she enrolled at Methodist Deaconess House, CHRISTCHURCH, and on completion of her training, became deaconess at Wesley Church, East Belt, Christchurch, from 1916 to 1918. She undertook training as a nurse at Christchurch in 1918, and in the following years, occupied important positions in that field.

In 1926, she joined the child welfare department at WELLINGTON as acting manager, and spent the rest of her active working years in that service. She worked for three years as district child welfare officer at Haveria from 1937 to 1940, after which she was recalled to Wellington as district manager. During these years she maintained a vital interest in many church and community organizations. She was a foundation member of the Public Health Committee (1928-49) and a member of the mayor of Wellington's Metropolitan Relief Committee (1940-49).

When ill health forced her retirement in 1949, she settled in Wellington.

TODD, EDWARD H. (1863-1951), American preacher and educator, was born in Council Bluffs, Iowa on April 2, 1863. He was received on trial in the DES MOINES

CONFERENCE in 1886. The following year he was married to Florence Ann Moore. In 1893 he moved to the State of WASHINGTON and served at Oaksdale; Colfax; Montesano; VANCOUVER; Epworth Church, TACOMA; and Grace, SEATTLE.

He became corresponding secretary of the College of Puget Sound (later University) in 1905, later becoming vice-president of WILLAMETTE UNIVERSITY. He was elected president of the UNIVERSITY OF PUGET SOUND in 1913, a position he held until he became president emeritus in 1942. He was designated official historian of College of Puget Sound in 1944 and wrote A History of the College of Puget Sound. His other published work was A Practical Mystic. While president of the College of Puget Sound, Todd increased enrollment, strengthened financial resources, changed the location and erected more substantial buildings.

The following colleges conferred upon him honorary degrees: SIMPSON COLLEGE, D.D.; Gooding College, LL.D., L.H.D.; and BOSTON UNIVERSITY, D.Sc. in Education.

TODD, LUTHER EDWARD (1874-1937), American minister, was born at New Franklin, Mo., Sept. 16, 1874, and died in St. Louis, Nov. 25, 1937. He was a graduate of CENTRAL METHODIST COLLEGE, and studied at VANDERBILT. In 1912 Central College conferred on him the D.D. degree.

Todd joined the MISSOURI CONFERENCE (MES) and was ordained elder in 1899. His appointments in that conference were: Fulton Circuit, 1897; Macon, 1898; Hundley Church, St. Joseph, 1899-1902; Macon, 1903. In 1904 he was transferred to the ST. LOUIS CONFERENCE, and from that time forward all of his appointments were in the City of St. Louis. He served First Church, 1904-05; Lafayette Park, 1906-08; Centenary, 1909-12; Wagoner Place, 1913-15; St. Louis District, 1916-17.

In 1918 Todd was elected General Secretary of the newly created General Board of Finance (PENSIONS) of the M.E. Church, South, with headquarters in St. Louis. He served in that capacity until his death.

Under Todd's leadership, the M.E. Church, South launched a church-wide campaign for a Superannuate Endowment Fund in 1924, the first major effort of the denomination to provide adequate pensions for its retired preachers. The QUARTERLY CONFERENCES of 6,400 pastoral charges accepted quotas aggregating $10,500,000 to be paid over a period of five years. Approximately $4,500,000 was realized on the pledges, the shrinkage being due in part to the economic depression which was casting its shadow over the land soon after the project got under way.

Todd was praised for splendid service rendered the church under trying circumstances. He was almost unanimously reelected as General Secretary of the Board of Finance at each succeeding GENERAL CONFERENCE. When he took office in 1918, the assets of the Board were about $500,000. At the time of his death in 1937, the figure was about $6,000,000.

Todd was the author of Evangelism Exemplified—or Pulpit and Pew in United Action, 1914; The One-to-One Helper, 1915; and The Child Church Member, 1917. In addition, he wrote several pamphlets on evangelism, and one pamphlet on the superannuated preacher entitled The Forgotten Man.

TOGO is a small country in West Central Africa on the Gulf of Guinea, a member of the United Nations since 1960. The area is 22,000 square miles with a population of 1,815,000. The capital is Lomé.

For decades Togo was a long, narrow, north-south strip, lying as a sort of buffer between the British Gold Coast and French Dahomey. The African chiefs of Togo ruled in a quasi-independence, owing direct allegiance to no one as actual overlord. This acceptable state of things continued until an International Council was held in BERLIN in 1884 to determine the colonial fate of Central Africa. GERMANY then received a "share" in possessions at various points. Her commissioner for West Africa, Gustav Nachtigal, came from Togo, and proposed that Germany assume sovereignty over this "no man's land." The Powers agreed, and Nachtigal signed a treaty with a king of Togo in 1884.

In World War I, British and French forces executed a simple "pinchers" and erased German Togo. The area was divided, Britain receiving a League of Nations Mandate to the western third and France accepting a mandate to the eastern two-thirds. When the surge for independence developed rapidly in Africa after World War II, British Togo joined with Gold Coast to form GHANA. Instead of merging with Dahomey, French Togo preferred to remain autonomous, becoming a member of the United Nations in its own right.

Early in 1843 the noted British Wesleyan missionary, THOMAS BIRCH FREEMAN, visited Togo. He possessed rare ability in gaining friendship with the local chiefs. When the king of Anécho granted permission for preaching and for schools, the work developed in an area radiating from the coastal towns, Anécho and Grand Popo. Following Freeman came John Milum, stationed as chairman at Lagos, E. J. Williams, and J. F. T. Halligey, who all built in the Togo field as zealously as in Dahomey and Lagos (NIGERIA). Since 1957 this work has been included in the Dahomey-Togo District. Methodist influence has been a definite factor in the affairs of independent Togo, though subordinate to that of the main Protestant Church of Togo, the Eglise Evangélique du Togo (formerly the Ewe Presbyterian Church). In 1968 the Church had five primary schools, with 1,140 pupils, and one secondary school with eighty-four students.

TOKYO, Japan, is the largest city in the world. Though a large part of the city was destroyed by the bombs of the Second World War, it has made a remarkable recovery, and it is hard to find any traces of the terrible destruction. The visitor who lands at the airport is whisked into the heart of the city by the monorail, completed shortly before the Olympic Games of 1964. The Imperial Palace is in the center of the city, near the Tokyo railway station, and not far away stands the beautiful Diet Building, symbol of the democracy of modern JAPAN. Wide avenues have been constructed, great buildings erected, and there is a network of subways taking one very quickly to various parts of the city, but it is still possible to find narrow little streets which give the flavor of old Japan. Railroads run out in all directions. On the new line to Osaka, the fastest trains in the world set out every thirty minutes during the day.

Tokyo is the center of the Christian work of the land. In the early days Tokyo became the headquarters of the missionary work of both the Methodist Episcopal and the Canadian Methodist Churches. They both worked here, though they spread out in different directions into the hinter-land, the M.E. work toward the north, the Canadian work across the island and to the west. Many of the churches in Tokyo were begun by these missions, for example, the Ginza Church in the heart of downtown Tokyo, founded by the M.E. Church; and the Chuo Kaido ("Central Tabernacle") begun by the Canadians and carrying on a special program of work for the university students. There are great churches founded by other denominations, too; Reinanzaka (Congregational), near the American Embassy, served by the famous Kozakis, father and son, for two generations; or Fujimi Cho (Presbyterian), the church of the famous Dr. Uemura. All of these are now included in the United Church of Christ in Japan. The Wesley Foundation is prominent among the organizations ministering to the tens of thousands of university students in the city.

In the very center of the city on a prominent corner of the Ginza, the famous shopping and business street of the city, stands the nine story building of the Kyobun Kan (Christian Literature Society), and adjoining it, really a part of it, is the building of the Bible Society. This building stands on the site of the former Methodist Publishing House. It was erected before the war, when S. H. WAINRIGHT of the Southern Methodist Church was the Executive Secretary of the Society. Besides the bookrooms and offices of the Society, this building houses the offices of the National Christian Council and of the United Church of Christ in Japan with various missionary and other organizations cooperating with it. Plans are under way, however, for the church to erect its own building.

Tokyo is the educational center of the nation. There are great government institutions, beginning with Tokyo University, the most highly regarded university in the land. There are a number of Christian schools of high grade, Protestant and Catholic. Probably the largest is AOYAMA GAKUIN UNIVERSITY, founded by the M.E. Church. It is a co-educational institution, and can carry the child all the way from kindergarten through university. Of its more than 12,000 students the great majority are in college and university departments. Other Methodist-related institutions dating from the pre-war period are Tokyo Eiwa College and High School for girls, founded by the Canadians, and the Tokyo Women's Christian College, a union institution with which Methodists have cooperated since its founding.

The International Christian University is located in Mitaka, a suburb of Tokyo. Methodists took a prominent part in the planning and establishment of this great union institution, which began work in 1953. It has an extensive campus and a number of modern and beautiful buildings. The number of students is strictly limited (about 1,000) and emphasis has been maintained on holding up high standards. Already the school and its graduates enjoy an enviable reputation. Not far away (and soon to move to part of the I.C.U. campus) is the Tokyo Union Theological Seminary, where ministers for the United Church are trained. Recently the American School, the school for English-speaking children which many missionary children attend, purchased land from I.C.U. and built a very up-to-date school plant there. A number of missionary residences have been built in the neighborhood.

There are a number of Christian Social Service Institutions in Tokyo. Aikei Gakuen, projected by Methodist women, Airindan and Kyoai Kan, supported by the Canadians, and the newer Bott Memorial, named in honor of a Canadian missionary, are among those giving important service to the poor of the great city. It is evident that Christians are seeking to minister to the physical, the intellectual, and the spiritual needs of the largest city on earth!

JOHN B. COBB, SR.

TOLAND, REBECCA (1859-1947), one of the first missionaries of the M.E. Church, South, was born in Artesia, Miss., December 1859. During her early childhood, the family moved to Chapel Hill, Texas, where she grew up and was educated. She belonged to an aristocratic Southern family that had migrated from SOUTH CAROLINA, although her maternal ancestors were from SCOTLAND.

She was among the early missionary women sent to foreign fields by the WOMAN'S FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY (MES). Her first appointment to Mexico was as teacher in Laredo Seminary, now Holding Institute, where she worked for nine years. Then for twelve years she worked at Colegio Ingles at San Luis Potosi. She was its founder and became its principal.

In 1902 she was transferred to CUBA, but previously (1898) her sister, Doctor Irene Toland, had volunteered to assist the American soldiers during the Spanish-American War as a trained nurse. Doctor Toland had had yellow fever in Texas in 1867 and was therefore immune from its repetition, hence her services were in great demand. Stationed on the hospital ship "Los Angeles" in Santiago de Cuba, she fell a victim to typhoid fever, and it was recorded that her funeral was the first Protestant one ever held in Santiago de Cuba. Later her remains were taken to the United States and interred with military honors.

The Woman's Board of Foreign Missions considered opening a boarding school for girls in Santiago de Cuba as a memorial to Doctor Toland, but instead the school was started in Habana. Under the leadership of Rebecca Toland, the school was relocated in Matanzas with the purchase of a beautiful old palatial home situated on a high hill overlooking the city and bay, and the Yumuri River.

Not long after, the Board helped her purchase more land and erect adequate buildings for dormitories and class rooms. Because of friendship with a wealthy family, there was included in their will an adjoining tract of land and a large dwelling known as the "Quinta Tosca." Later this was to become the site of the present UNION SEMINARY in Matanzas.

Through Rebecca Toland's able administration the school grew until it became one of the foremost boarding schools for girls in the island, and almost always there was a waiting list of applications. Although she was a stern disciplinarian her students and teachers revered her, knowing that they could always count on her as a friend. Her motto was, "Trust in the Lord with all thine heart," and often she was heard to say, "This is the Lord's work, not mine."

TOLD, SILAS (1711-1778), English Methodist schoolmaster and philanthropist, was born in Bristol on April 3, 1711, the son of a well-born but impoverished doctor. He was educated at Colston School. At fourteen he was apprenticed as a sailor and spent eleven adventurous years at sea. In December 1734, he married Mary Verney and two years later settled in LONDON as a clerk. Introduced to the Methodists by Charles Caspar Greaves in 1740, in 1744 he took charge of the Foundry Charity School. For over twenty years he administered in Newgate and other prisons, especially to those condemned to death, accompanying them to Tyburn and assisting their families. He died in December 1778.

TOLEDO, OHIO, U.S.A., a city of approximately 400,000 in 1970, at the northwest corner of the state and situated at the mouth of the Maumee River on Lake Erie, is the Lucas County seat. It is the only Great Lake's port with a foreign trade zone, which gives the city international interests. It also is the third largest soft coal port in the world and is known as the "glass capital."

Methodist preaching began in what was then Tremainsville (now the western part of the city) in 1825. Shortly after this two classes were formed and from one of these the present Collingwood Church developed. The second class later led to the establishment of Monroe Street Church. In 1836 the first building to house a Methodist congregation within the then city limits was erected on Huron Street; a larger one took its place in 1851 on a fine downtown lot and in 1865 this was replaced by a large Gothic structure which was named St. Paul's. These three early churches—Collingwood, Monroe Street, and St. Paul's—sent out missions over the years and these founded other churches. Following are the churches established from 1844 to 1907: Bethany (1844), Broadway (1859), Third Street Church (now Euclid Avenue since it moved to a new location; 1866), Asbury and St. John's (1872), Clark Street (1890), Spring Street (1891; which became Wesley Church in a new location in 1925), Epworth and Western Avenue (1894), Central (1896), St. James (1898). In 1904 Hamilton Memorial Church was started but no longer exists.

Ironville Church, begun in 1907, was closed recently when the entire neighborhood was taken over for an urban renewal plan. There were four German Methodist churches in Toledo, two of which no longer exist, and two which came into the OHIO CONFERENCE at the time of the merger in 1933. They are Emanuel, which started as a "house church" in 1848, and Zion (1858). In 1969 Emanuel merged its membership with neighboring churches and the building was sold. Zion Church has relocated on Anthony Wayne Trail, and carries on an energetic program in South Toledo.

As the city expanded and people moved out to suburban areas, two churches, Asbury and Epworth, relocated and built new buildings to extend a growing service to their communities. Three new churches have also been built in locations of strategic need: Aldersgate, Ottawa River and Church of the Cross. Trilby Church, once suburban, is now part of Toledo, and the immediately surrounding towns which are a part of the greater Toledo area have very active Methodist churches. Two churches, Epworth and Collingwood, have over a thousand members; and Monroe Street with more than three thousand is the third largest church in the Conference, and leads the Conference in its giving to Advance Specials.

In 1958, Dr. W. Arthur Milne, the district superintendent, led Toledo Methodists into a new venture: the establishment of an Inner-City Parish. Five churches in a changing area of the city, with membership declining, formed the nucleus of this parish: St. Paul's, for so long the leading downtown church which had struggled for years to serve the immediate neighborhood as it declined; Wesley; and three churches in the "North Corridor," Emanuel, St. John's and St. James.

In 1959 one of the pastors was designated as part-time director of the parish. Support came from the district through the Methodist Union and the Board of Missions. Shortly after the Central Jurisdiction's churches merged with the Ohio Conference, Braden Church, one of the largest Negro churches, became a part of the Inner-City Ministry, as it is now called. East of the river, Clark Street also joined this newer work. Toledo was one of the pioneers in the Inner-City movement. In 1969, in a complete restructuring, this work became the Toledo United Methodist Central City Ministry. A full-time director was assigned and it now comprises the North Parish: St. James and St. John's, Wesley, St. Paul's, Braden, Clark Street, Bancroft (formerly an E.U.B. church) and Broadway.

In 1905 the WOMAN'S HOME MISSIONARY SOCIETY leased a private hospital on Robinwood Avenue and called it Deaconess Hospital. From there deaconesses went out to work in the needy part of the city, and their early work started three Methodist agencies busily serving the city. In 1908 Steven W. Flower willed his home and land to the new hospital, and so there came Flower Hospital and Flower Esther Hall—the latter a residence for girls coming to the city for business or technical schooling. Flower Hospital has grown steadily since moving to new quarters in 1924 and has sponsored, since 1955, a new development in nearby Sylvania, known as Crestview Center. This consists of Crestview Apartments for Retired People; and Lake Park, a long-term nursing care hospital with modern facilities.

Friendly Center Community House is the result of a building campaign undertaken in 1940 by the WOMAN'S SOCIETY OF CHRISTIAN SERVICE of the Ohio Conference. A new building was begun in 1948, completed in 1949, and this houses a busy center working with the changing minority groups in this area.

It became necessary to divide the Toledo District when in 1968 the E.U.B. and Methodist Churches joined. The Toledo District is made up largely of churches in the greater Toledo area and nearby towns extending only as far south as Bowling Green. In 1969 the Toledo District had the distinction of raising the largest amount of money and the largest proportion above its asking of any district in the country for the Fund for Reconciliation. This is to be taken as a symbol of its growing concern for a relevant ministry not only at home but around the world.

TOLLAND, CONNECTICUT, U.S.A., is a small farming and residential community in the northeastern part of the state with approximately 2,000 inhabitants. Methodism came with JESSE LEE, the apostle to New England, when he preached there on April 2, 1790. The society became a part of the Hartford Circuit and on Aug. 11, 1793, was host to the first Methodist Annual Conference ever held in CONNECTICUT, and the second held in New England. Twelve preachers attended and Bishop ASBURY himself was present and presided. Nathaniel B. Mills was appointed the first preacher to Tolland in 1790. LORENZO Dow, whose home town was in neighboring South Coventry, was influenced by the Methodist preaching in Tolland.

The first church was erected in Tolland in 1793, and in 1807 a lease for land was given for 999 years. Tolland became a separate station in 1839 and the building being used in 1966 was erected in 1880. However, there was a federation with the Congregational Church in 1921 and Methodist work was disbanded there in 1959.

TOLLEY, WILLIAM PEARSON (1900-), American minister and university chancellor, was born at Honesdale, Pa., on Sept. 13, 1900, the son of Adolphus Charles and Emma Grace (Sumner) Tolley. He was educated at SYRACUSE UNIVERSITY, A.B., 1922; A.M., 1924; DREW UNIVERSITY, B.D., 1925; Columbia University, A.M., 1927; Ph.D., 1930; LL.D., 1955. He is the recipient of about thirty-five honorary degrees from universities of the United States, and in other lands, including state universities as well as those connected with the Church. On July 3, 1925, he married Ruth Canfield, and their children are William Pearson, Nelda Ruth (Mrs. Richard Preston Price, Jr.), and Katryn Diane (Mrs. Arthur J. Fritz, Jr.).

Dr. Tolley was received on trial and ordained a DEACON in the NEW YORK EAST CONFERENCE in 1924 and came into full connection the next year. He was the alumni secretary of DREW THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY in 1925-27; instructor there in Systematic Theology, 1926-28; assistant to the president, 1927-28; acting dean of Brothers College (of Drew University), and instructor in philosophy, 1928-29; dean, 1929-31; professor of philosophy, 1930-31. In that year he became president of ALLEGHENY COLLEGE in Meadville, Pa., but in 1942 was elected chancellor of Syracuse University, retiring Sept. 1, 1969.

He was a member of the UNIVERSITY SENATE of the Methodist Church, 1932-36, its vice-president, 1956-60, and was president after 1960. He holds a number of positions with business companies. Chancellor Tolley was decorated chevalier of the Legion of Honor in France and is a member of various honor societies in universities of the nation. In 1930 he published The Idea of God in the Philosophy of St. Augustine, was the editor with others of a Preface to Philosophy in 1946, and the author of The Transcendent Aim (1967). He has written rather extensively in the field of philosophy. He has been in demand as a speaker upon many university occasions.

TOLLS. The Turnpike Trust Act (1706) created bodies of trustees who were empowered to levy tolls on specified lengths of road. By 1838 there were over 1,100 trusts covering 23,000 miles of road in Great Britain. Unless they took byroads, Wesley and his preachers must have paid heavily in tolls (see Wesley's Journal, June 15, 1770). Conditions varied from county to county, but in general, people going to church were exempt; much depending on the interpretation given locally to "proper" or "usual" place of worship. Preachers gained exemption by producing their plan. Legal opinion, requested by the Wesleyan Conference in 1829, pronounced in favor of the preachers' claims. In 1870 a test case came before the High Court. The last toll was taken on Nov. 1, 1895.

TOMBIGBEE CIRCUIT, located in the southwestern part of what is now ALABAMA, was the first organized work of the M.E. Church in that state. When the SOUTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE met at CHARLESTON, Dec. 28, 1807, Bishop ASBURY, aware that white people were moving into the "Tombeckbee" (it was so listed in the General Minutes until 1839) region, called for volunteers to go there as missionaries. MATTHEW PARIHAM STURDIVANT, a young man who had joined the VIRGINIA CONFERENCE in 1805, accepted the challenge, and traveled over 400 miles from the seat of the conference to reach his appointment. He organized the circuit.

So far as is known, Sturdivant did not record his experiences in a diary, but apparently he made the people of the region aware that a Methodist preacher was working in their midst. During the first year he did not organize any Methodist societies or enroll any members. However, at the session of the South Carolina Conference, Liberty Chapel, GEORGIA, in December 1808, he gave such a stirring report of his year in Alabama that the conference, impressed with the possibilities of the new circuit, reappointed him for a second year and gave him an assistant, Michael Burdge. A year later they reported seventy-one white and fifteen colored members on the Tombigbee Circuit.

As new annual conferences were formed in the west and south, the Tombigbee Circuit fell successively in several of them as follows: WESTERN CONFERENCE (1811), TENNESSEE CONFERENCE (1812), MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE (1813-32), and ALABAMA CONFERENCE (beginning in 1832). For the first ten years, due primarily to Indian troubles, the Tombigbee was the only Methodist circuit in Alabama. At that time the circuit covered at least 1,000 square miles. It began below the converging of the Alabama and Tombigbee Rivers and extended up the latter into what is now Choctaw County, Ala., and westward a short distance into MISSISSIPPI.

Bethel Church, organized in 1809 about two miles south of the present town of Leaksville, Miss., was the first church on the Tombigbee Circuit to erect a building (1811). The location and name of the first church building on the Alabama part of the Tombigbee Circuit is not known.

By 1817 the Tombigbee Circuit had grown to 517 white and 100 colored members, and the next year the Mississippi Conference formed the Alabama District with two additional circuits, Whitesand Creek and Chickasawhay. Also, at that time the Tennessee Conference began work in the northern part of Alabama. In its last year, 1847, the Tombigbee Circuit, much smaller geographically than in earlier times, reported 288 white and 119 colored members.

TONGA, or Friendly Islands, are in the South Pacific, and enjoy the status of being an independent Polynesian kingdom, with a Treaty of Friendship with Great Britain. They have an area of 269 square miles, and the principal export is copra. The population (1969) is 83,000.

The missionary spirit implicit in the Evangelical Revival impelled the British Conference to send preachers to the South Seas. Captain Cook's fascinating descriptions of the Pacific Islands influenced the choice of Tonga.

Tonga has had a very strange missionary history: first initial failures, then resounding success, followed by an almost fatal disruption in 1885, incomplete reunion in 1924, and now the evils attending a multiplicity of sects. The Tongans are pure Polynesians, proud of their history of independence. Courteous, enthusiastic but often fickle, they were at first satisfied with their own heathen religion and treated missionaries with scorn.

The London Missionary Society left a number of unordained artisan-missionaries in 1797. The Tongans were interested only in stealing their tools. When three of these unfortunate missionaries were killed during tribal fighting, the rest of the party left Tonga without having won a convert.

WALTER LAWRY, Methodist missionary, was designated by the British Conference for Tonga. He was so eager that he did not wait for a colleague. He sailed from SYDNEY and landed in Tonga in 1822. He stayed only fourteen months. The "Friendly Islands" (as Captain Cook had named the group) proved distinctly unfriendly to Lawry.

In 1826 JOHN THOMAS and John Hutchinson resumed the mission. The opposition towards them gave them so much discouragement that Thomas sent his goods off to Sydney in a passing ship and asked for leave to retire. Fortunately the Committee in Sydney, instead of granting his request, sent NATHANIEL TURNER and WILLIAM CROSS, most capable reinforcements.

In Ha'apai, the central group, the ruling chief had become skeptical of his gods and interested in the new teachings. He was Taufa'ahau, afterwards to become King of Tonga under the name of George Tupou I, ultimately respected far beyond the bounds of Tonga as "The Grand Old Man of the Pacific." He quickly accepted Christianity and began to destroy idol-houses. In a crusading spirit he persuaded many people in all parts of Tonga to forsake heathenism.

In 1834 an extraordinary revival burst out in a northern island of the Tongan group during a service conducted by a Tongan preacher. It spread in a few weeks throughout Tonga. To the missionaries it seemed a veritable modern Pentecost. The greatest proof of the genuineness of the revival was the offer of many Tongan converts to accompany European missionaries to FIJI and SAMOA.

Taufa'ahau made the communion rail of the first church out of the spears he had used. He became a local preacher. The King (as he became in 1845) strongly encouraged education. In 1866 a new missionary, James Egan Moulton, founded Tupou College, named after the King. It was an ambitious project but Moulton was a syndicate of talents—classical scholar, skilled musician, writer of some of the most beautiful and inspiring hymns in any language. His success as a teacher swept the Tongans almost off their feet.

For two years before 1880 Moulton was absent in England working on the revision of the New Testament with his brother, W. FIDDIAN MOULTON, at CAMBRIDGE. During his absence troubles in Tonga began to fall thick and fast.

The Chairman of the Mission was Shirley Baker, an able and astute person. There had been unfortunate personal jealousies on the staff and Baker was criticized also because of his political activities and his personal influence with the King. This was a period when various Pacific Island groups were being annexed by foreign powers. It was to Baker's credit that he supported the Tongans' determination to remain independent, but he himself resigned from the Mission to become the Premier of Tonga.

Baker used his position as Premier to support a plan for ecclesiastical self-government which the King particularly desired. One can understand the belief in the Australasian Conference that Tonga, barely fifty years after Christianity first appeared in the land, was not mature enough to handle its own affairs. It was the same story as with the American Colonies' claim for independence, this time in a missionary setting, both in cause and effect.

In 1885 the King, at Baker's instigation, formed an independent church, generally called the "Free Church," that is free from any link with AUSTRALIA. A missionary, Jabez Watkin, was induced to become its President. Pressure soon becoming persecution developed against the loyal church members who supported Moulton. What had been a resplendent jewel in the crown of Methodist Missions was being virtually destroyed. Assaults, destruction of gardens, and finally the exile to Fiji of about 200 loyal Wesleyans followed.

The confused history of this sad period led to the deportation of Baker through the intervention of the British High Commissioner from Fiji. However, the division of the churches remained, although calmer feelings prevailed before long.

Forty years passed before reunion was effected. This had been the aim of Rodger Page who labored from 1908 with patience and an abiding love for the Tongan people. When reunion took place in 1924 it was, unfortunately, incomplete. Nearly one-third of the "Free Church" remained outside union, and they have divided into two churches since then. All three of the churches are Methodist in doctrine and polity, but the two dissenting churches have no connection with Australia, whereas the parent body is now an Independent Conference associated with the General Conference of the Methodist Church of Australasia. One reflects that if this status had been granted forty years before, the sad divisions would have been prevented.

Queen Tupou SALOTE who became ruler of Tonga in 1918, at the age of eighteen, was an influence behind the union movement. Her sagacity and her consistent Christian leadership won her the respect of her people. Yet, even with her advocacy of union, local quarrels and family disputes worked against the complete restoration of harmony and unity.

The Mormons and other sects who have entered Tonga in recent years have added to the sorry spectacle of disunity. The Mormons have now made Tonga the headquarters of their missions in the South Seas, and have spent great sums in educational institutions which attract many Tongans. The desire for better education has risen to feverish heights among Pacific Islanders, and this is readily exploited by proselytizers.

Before the fatal division in 1885, the Methodist Church had the allegiance of ninety percent of the Tongans, the rest being Roman Catholics. In a population of over 80,000 today, fifty percent belong to the Methodist Church.

CENTENARY CHURCH, NUKU'ALOFA, TONGA

King Taufa'ahau Tupou IV, who succeeded his mother in 1965, and his brother, the Premier, are both local preachers. They continue the support which their mother gave to Methodism.

In 1952 the Tongans built in the capital, Nuku'alofa, their magnificent church which seats over 2,000. It is the largest Methodist church building in the Southern Hemisphere.

The Chairman of the recently-formed Pacific Council of Churches is a Tongan leader, the Rev. Dr. John Havea.

Tonga has sent many of its best ministers to pioneer mission fields in other parts of the Pacific. Among the Methodist people there is a high quality of devotion and a strong determination to resist the encroachments of materialism by loyalty to the truths of evangelical religion.

TOPEKA, KANSAS, U.S.A., is the capital of the state of KANSAS. It was staked off Dec. 18, 1854 and incorporated in 1857. It was settled by anti-slavery men in the days of the Kansas-Nebraska struggles. The city was formerly a great railroad center, and by air travel and otherwise is yet dominant in its region.

Topeka Methodism started with the historic CLASS MEETING in the first settlers' cabin Dec. 23, 1854. The first church was organized March 21, 1855. It was first named in the M.E. Church records in 1855 as a mission connected with the MISSOURI CONFERENCE. J. S. Griffing was the pastor. In 1856 sixty members were reported. There were eighty-two members in 1861 and church property valued at $4,000.

As Topeka grew so did local Methodism. The North Topeka Church was organized in 1869 and became the Kansas Avenue Church in 1880. A decade later the East Topeka congregation was established, and in 1887 the Oakland Church came into being with JOSEPH DENSON, a former president of BAKER UNIVERSITY, as its pastor. The Lowman Memorial Church was chartered in 1885 and Euclid Church in 1888. Trinity, which began life as the Walnut Grove Sunday School in 1887, emerged with its new name in 1919 and is now combined with Euclid as the University Church. In 1915 the Highland Park Church was born and in 1953 two new churches, Crestview and Countryside, were organized to serve growing residential areas. The Sullivan Chapel, which opened in 1961 as the Topeka Methodist Indian mission, is one of the newest of the city's Methodist organizations and serves a unique parish.

Topekan also support a FREE METHODIST CHURCH and four WESLEYAN METHODIST congregations. The first of these was organized in 1876 following a six-week evangelistic meeting. The oldest Negro congregation is St. John A.M.E., organized in 1868 as a mission church. It assumed the name of St. John in 1878 and became one of the largest and strongest Negro church communities in Kansas. Other Negro congregations include Brown Chapel A.M.E. (1887); St. Mark A.M.E.; Lane Chapel; Mt. Olive, and Asbury.

During and following the great Kansas River floods of 1903 and 1951, and the devastating tornado of June 8, 1966, Topeka Methodist churches and their members, along with other denominational organizations, offered aid and shelter to thousands of Topekan.

Two former Topeka pastors are: HAROLD C. CASE, who has served as president of BOSTON UNIVERSITY for fifteen years; and Bishop EUGENE M. FRANK, a native of Kansas, in Topeka when elected bishop in 1956.

First Church is the historic downtown church in this capital city. Starting with a class meeting in the first settlers' cabin on the banks of the Kaw River on Dec. 23, 1854, the church was officially organized March 21, 1855, with J. F. Griffing as pastor. The church is probably best known for its long and continuous radio ministry which started when Harold C. Case was pastor in 1934, and has continued to the present without interruption, bringing the Sunday morning service to listeners in a five state area. In recent years First Church's Advent and Lenten services have also been televised.

The congregation has met in three different locations. Its first permanent building was a stone building at the intersection of Sixth and Quincy Streets, which was begun Oct. 16, 1860. Its completion was delayed by a famine, and by the Civil War. At one point the unfinished building was rented to the House of Representatives for the Legislative Session, and the rent paid for plastering of the interior.

In 1882 the congregation moved to a new stone building of Gothic design with two steeples, located at Sixth and Harrison. This building was destroyed by fire Aug. 9, 1921. It was replaced by another and more modern Gothic stone structure in 1922. The lighted tower of this building is now a distinctive feature of Topeka's downtown area. Since 1960 the facilities of the church have been expanded to include a two-store youth activities building, a street-level chapel seating 265 persons, a modern administration building, and a paved parking lot for ninety automobiles. For a number of years, the church has maintained a membership of more than 3,000.

Among the distinguished pastors of this church, have been two who had served as college presidents (Joshua Lippincott and JOHN T. MCFARLAND); one who became President of Boston University (Harold C. Case); and one who was elected a Bishop (Eugene M. Frank). The church has had three unusually long pastorates: Edmund Kulp (1916-26); Ormal L. Miller (1938-48), and Ewart C. Watts (1956-).

Known for its missionary outreach, the congregation has helped organize and given substantial financial support to three other Methodist churches in Topeka. It has consistently been the leader of its Conference, and among the leaders of the nation in World Service and Advance Special giving. One of its special projects was the purchase of a Methodist Student Center building adjacent to The University of La Paz in BOLIVIA.

TOPLADY, AUGUSTUS MONTAGUE (1740-1778), Anglican Evangelical, was the son of an army major and a graduate of Trinity College, DUBLIN. He was born at Farnham, England, Nov. 4, 1740. He was converted under James Morris, one of the Methodist preachers. After ordination to the ministry of the Anglican Church (1764), Toplady settled in the parish of Broadhembury, Devon (1768). He was the leading protagonist against JOHN WESLEY in the Calvinistic controversy of 1770 onward. Toplady was steeped in the learning of the Reformers and Puritans. His Historic Proof of the Doctrinal Calvinism of the Church of England (1774) is now widely assessed as one of the weightier statements to emerge from the debate. His hymn "Rock of Ages" is a priceless possession of the Church Universal. He died in London, Aug. 11, 1778.

TORONTO, Canada. In 1805 the Yonge Street circuit, which included the village of York, capital of Upper Canada, was organized by the M.E. Church. From that date services were held regularly in and around York, but the first chapel was not built until 1818. A frame building, about thirty by forty feet, it stood near the corner of King and Bay streets, on land now occupied by the massive headquarters of the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce. It was one of the many monuments of HENRY RYAN's untiring zeal as PRESIDING ELDER in Upper Canada.

The first services were held in November 1818, the preacher being David Culp. Among those who succeeded him in the early years were the future bishop JAMES RICHARDSON, EGERTON, WILLIAM, and JOHN RYERSON, and Franklin Metcalf. By 1832, however, the Society had grown so that a new church became necessary. The Adelaide Street Church, at the corner of Toronto and Adelaide streets, was opened in 1833. Regrettably, the old church became a theatre.

At this point, York, which was to become Toronto in 1834, was growing rapidly. Among the new settlers were many Wesleyan Methodists, who opened their first church in July 1832, on George Street. After the Union of 1833, the two buildings were used by the Canadian church as a whole. Rented temporarily to the Congregationalists in 1837, the George Street Church was reopened by the Wesleyans after the dissolution of the Union in 1840. It became the center of a highly influential congregation, including many merchants, and Richard Woodsworth, the father and grandfather of JAMES and J. S. WOODSWORTH respectively. So great was the increase of people that in 1844 a new chapel was erected on Richmond Street West.

With the reunion of 1847, two circuits were established in Toronto; the Richmond Street and Adelaide Street churches continued as the principal city congregations in the Canada Conference. Each church drew the ablest ministers in the Connection among whom were JOHN CARROLL, S. D. RICE, GEORGE DOUGLAS, ALEXANDER SUTHERLAND and JOHN POTTS. Each led in founding new churches in the expanding city and suburbs, including Yorkville, Davenport, Elm, Sherbourne and Gerrard Street churches. Richmond Street itself was closed in 1882.

Again, by the 1860's, the Adelaide Street Church was becoming obsolete. At the instigation of W. M. PUNSHON, president of Conference from 1868 until 1872, of Egerton Ryerson and ANSON GREEN, a block of land at the corner of Queen and Church Streets was purchased in 1870. On it was erected the Metropolitan Methodist Church, a handsome Gothic structure, modeled on Doncaster Parish Church (Yorkshire), Punshon's native city. Completed in 1872, the Metropolitan quickly became one of the principal churches in Canadian Methodism. To its pulpit came John Potts, WILLIAM BRIGGS, S. P. Rose, R. P. BOWLES, and in it were held many great Methodist events.

By the end of the century Toronto Methodism boasted a multitude of great and small churches, of which possibly the most influential were the Metropolitan, Sherbourne Street, Carlton Street and Trinity churches. Some of these have ceased to exist since the Union of 1925; others such as the Metropolitan have continued. The latter, especially, is now a great downtown church, serving not so much a congregation as the varied needs of the homeless and the transient in the commercial heart of the city. It remains, nonetheless, a visible embodiment of a century of Methodism in Toronto.

Riveria Church was organized Sept. 1, 1956. It has grown to 806 members. Central Church has 296 members, and Hope Church had 167 in 1970.

TORSEY, HENRY P. (1819-1892), American educator and preacher, was born in Monmouth, Maine, Aug. 7, 1819.

At age seventeen, while a student at Monmouth Academy, he joined the M.E. Church and was licensed to preach at nineteen.

Spending four years in Maine Wesleyan Seminary, he taught at East Greenwich Academy. Two years later he was assistant teacher at Kent's Hill. In 1844 Torsey was elected president of Maine Wesleyan Seminary, joining the MAINE CONFERENCE in 1848.

When Torsey took over the academy, it was financially embarrassed and ready to surrender its charter. During the thirty-eight years under the presidency of Torsey, students increased and the school became very successful. Resigning on account of poor health, President Torsey was retained on the faculty as professor emeritus until his death.

Torsey was honored with D.D. and LL.D. degrees. He was elected to three GENERAL CONFERENCES, 1860, 1868, and 1876. With a little time off during his presidency, he was twice a member of the State Senate. He was with the treasury department in the south for one year, and overseer of the Freedmen's interests in SOUTH CAROLINA for part of 1865. For health reasons he declined President Lincoln's appointment as Secretary of the MONTANA Territory.

His heavy educational load kept him from much preaching. However, his message was strong and clear on the great themes. For fifty-two years, he was a member of Kent's Hill Church near the Seminary, and was a liberal contributor and effective official.

He married a minister's daughter, Emma Jane Robinson, in 1845. She was a preceptress of the Seminary for several years.

Torsey had original and effective methods as a teacher and administrator. The Maine Conference obituary describes his teaching ability in these words: "He could win the confidence of the timid and retiring, cordially appreciate the faithful efforts of those not brilliant, keenly expose the slothfulness of the indolent, and effectually counteract them and at the same time make every student feel that he was the special friend of the president."

Henry P. Torsey died at Kent's Hill, Sept. 16, 1892.

TOTTEN, WILLIAM T. (1862-1936). American M.P. minister and educator, President of Yadkin Collegiate Institute (see YADKIN COLLEGE) for twenty-six years, was the eldest son of John Henry and Margaret Frances Smith Totten. He was born in Rockingham County, N.C., on Feb. 13, 1862.

William T. Totten attended local schools and Oak Ridge Institute, from which he graduated in 1881. Afterward, he graduated from Yadkin College and taught at Pilot Mountain, Yadkin College and at other places in NORTH CAROLINA. He was the last M.P. minister to obtain a degree from Yadkin College.

He was admitted into the NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE of the M.P. CHURCH in 1885 and ordained in 1888. He served the following charges: Albemarle, Spring Church, Halifax, LaGrange, Mecklenburg, Greenville, Shiloh, Catawba, Mocksville, Union Grove and Draper. In 1898 he personally assumed the responsibility for the indebtedness of Yadkin College and for the next twenty-six years conducted this institution as "Yadkin Collegiate Institute." Following the closing of Yadkin Collegiate Institute in 1924 (it was consolidated into HIGH POINT COLLEGE), Totten was again given ministerial assignments in the North Carolina Conference.

He married Mrs. Jeannette Barham Daniel of Pleasant Hill, N.C., in 1891; from this union there were three children. Following his wife's death in July 1923, Totten married Callie Tarkington of Chowan County, N.C., on Sept. 1, 1925. She died on April 7, 1929, and he married Mrs. Ellen Norman Cobb of Halifax, Va., in 1931. She died in 1938.

William T. Totten died on Nov. 26, 1936, at Yadkin College and was buried there.

TOWNSEND, ALONZO G. (1854?-1937), American minister and educator, was born in CHARLESTON, S.C., and educated in the private schools of Charleston and later entered the University of South Carolina from which he graduated. He was received into the SOUTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE of the M.E. Church on trial in 1878, coming into full membership in 1880 and ordained an ELDER in 1882. He served from some of the smallest to some of the largest appointments in the conference, including Centenary Church, Charleston, 1899-1901. He taught at CLAFLIN COLLEGE, Orangeburg, S.C., 1883-1891. Townsend served as presiding elder of the Florence District in the 1890's and as district superintendent of the Sumter District, 1921-27. He was first married to Emma L. Harleston of Charleston. To this union three children were born, two girls and one boy. This wife preceded him in death in the late twenties. His second wife was Mrs. Ocala Blume Trescot of Charleston.

Townsend was one of the leading scholars of his day, a true and loyal servant of God. After several years of retirement, he died in Sumter, S.C., in 1937.

TOWNSEND, WILLIAM JOHN (1835-1915), British Methodist historian, was born in Newcastle upon Tyne on Jan. 20, 1835, studied under JAMES STACEY, and entered the METHODIST NEW CONNEXION ministry in 1860. Townsend was elected president in 1886 and was president of the UNITED METHODIST Conference in 1908; he was president of the Free Church Council in 1902. He had a distinguished circuit ministry, but was most famous as a historian, writing the lives of ALEXANDER KILHAM and of James Stacey, The Story of Methodist Union, a Handbook of the Methodist New Connexion, and many other works, besides taking a large share in the production of the New History of Methodism (1909). He was editor of the Connexional Magazine for four years and missionary secretary for five. He died at Newcastle upon Tyne on March 7, 1915.

TOWSON, MARYLAND, U.S.A., is located a few miles north of downtown BALTIMORE. In 1839 the citizens of Towson town erected a building known as Epsom Chapel, to be used as a place of worship for any religious group in the community. A Methodist Society was promptly formed and the Chapel was dedicated on Sunday, Nov.

10, 1839, under Methodist Episcopal auspices. The church then became a part of the Summerfield Circuit.

Methodism grew rapidly in Baltimore County. The circuit was divided in 1854, and the Towson congregation became a part of the North Baltimore Circuit. A parsonage was built on Joppa Road in 1856 and served as the home of ministers' families until 1958.

A society of the M.P. Church was formed in 1861 and met in the Odd Fellows Hall in Towson. This group later moved to the Epsom Chapel and worshipped there until its own building was erected in 1909, at Allegheny and Bosley Avenues.

Towson Church was made a station appointment at the BALTIMORE CONFERENCE (ME) of 1869, with a membership of eighty-six persons. A new brick building was erected at 622 York Road and was dedicated on Oct. 26, 1871. Two committees were formed in 1951 to consider merger of First and Second Churches, so that the Methodists of Towson might become "one people." As a result the present Towson United Methodist Church was organized in May 1952. Worship was held in both churches until Easter Day, April 18, 1954.

With the construction of the Baltimore Beltway, land became available from GOUCHER COLLEGE and was purchased as a site for relocation of the merged congregations. In October 1957 a new church school building was consecrated and on May 11, 1958, Bishop G. BROMLEY OXNAM led the service of consecration for the new sanctuary. During the period of merger and relocation, Lewis F. Ransom was minister.

In 1970 Towson reported 2,507 members, property valued at $1,125,000, and $172,250 raised for all purposes.

JOHN BAYLEY JONES

TOY, JOSEPH (1748-1826), early American class leader, educator, and preacher in NEW JERSEY and MARYLAND, was born on his father's plantation, which fronted on Delaware River near the mouth of the Rancocas Creek, Burlington County, N. J., April 24, 1748. He came from a devout Swedish background, and was a cousin to Bishop White of the Church of England. He attended Thomas Powell's boarding school in BURLINGTON, N. J., until he was twenty years of age.

In 1770 Toy came under the influence of Captain THOMAS WEBB, who was preaching in Burlington. Webb induced Toy to form and lead a Methodist class in Burlington. The following year Toy moved to TRENTON, N. J., formed a new Methodist class in his house, and later led in the erection of a frame meetinghouse for the Methodist Society. Toy is also listed as a trustee of the Methodist Society in New Mills (Pemberton), N. J.

In 1776 Toy moved from Trenton to Maryland. In 1779 he sponsored a Methodist Society in Abingdon, Md., and was instrumental in building a meetinghouse there.

When COKEBURY COLLEGE was built in Abingdon in 1786, Bishops ASBURY and COKE requested Toy to become instructor in mathematics and English literature. When Cokesbury was destroyed by fire a few years later, Toy moved to BALTIMORE and continued his teaching in a substitute building. This, likewise, burned later.

As early as 1789 Toy began to preach regularly. Relieved of his duties as instructor, he was ordained a DEACON in 1797 and entered the "traveling connection" in 1801. He was admitted into "full connection" in 1804.

All of his itinerant ministry, except one year (VIRGINIA CONFERENCE, 1803-1804) was served in the BALTIMORE CONFERENCE. J. E. ARMSTRONG reports that at the age of seventy Toy was heard to say that he had not disappointed a congregation in twenty years.

He retired in 1819 and died on Jan. 28, 1826.

TRACTS AND TRACT SOCIETIES. JOHN WESLEY was a pioneer in spreading challenging religious literature written in such a way that ordinary people could understand and respond, and this was published at prices which they could afford. Many of his publications, indeed, occupied only four pages or so, and were advertised for sale at two or three shillings a hundred, so that they could be bought for free distribution. The first such tract was entitled A Word in Season: or, Advice to a Soldier; this was published early in 1743, and continued in print until Wesley's death. Because such ephemeral items were usually issued without the name of author or printer, and with no indication of the edition or the date, it is exceedingly difficult to secure precise facts about them. The most frequently reproduced appear to have been Secure not at all, of which at least twenty-seven distinct editions were published between 1744 and the end of the century; and Remember the Sabbath Day, of which twenty-nine are known. It is almost certain, however, that there were several more editions of each, for a number of those so far discovered are known only by a single survivor out of a complete edition of two thousand or more copies. On Dec. 18, 1745 Wesley recorded in his Journal that the London Methodists "had within a short time given away some thousands of little tracts among the common people." Some of the tracts were in fact printed on posters to be pasted up in public places (as is known from the ledgers of one of Wesley's printers, William Strahan), though in the nature of the situation it is unlikely that one of these will ever be discovered.

In January 1782, John Wesley issued proposals for establishing what appears to have been the first Tract Society known, and began canvassing donations towards it. Subscribers to the Society's funds were supplied with an appropriate quantity of tracts of their own choice, at cost. In commending this scheme, which may well have originated with THOMAS COKE, Wesley wrote:

I cannot but earnestly recommend this to all those who desire to see true, scriptural Christianity spread throughout these nations. Men wholly unawakened will not take the pains to read the Bible. They have no relish for it. But a small tract may engage their attention for half an hour, and may, by the blessing of God, prepare them for going forward.

The first "tracts" issued by this Society were much larger works than Secure not at all and its companions—skillful abridgments of JOSEPH ALLEINE's Alarm to Unconverted Sinners, and Richard Baxter's Call to the Unconverted, to which was soon added WILLIAM LAW's Serious Call to a Holy Life. These three works, however, although they contained a total of over 400 pages, each bore on its title page the words: "This book is not to be sold, but given away." Reissues of Wesley's earlier tiny tracts and of many of his sermons helped redress the financial balance a little, and furnished a more realistic hope that the recipient would read his gift. The first catalogue of this first Tract Society, issued in 1784, listed thirty publications thus available for free distribution. Maintaining stocks of these tracts continued to be one of the important tasks of Wesley's Book STEWARDS.

This was an idea which was suited to the times, and inspired imitators. In 1795 HANNAH MORE began to issue her "Cheap Repository Tracts," supported by subscribers all over the country. Her private efforts led to the formation in 1799 of the Religious Tract Society. Behind this new form of EVANGELISM lay both directly and indirectly the Methodist Revival, and speaking of her project to John Newton, Hannah More confessed that "my great and worldly friends are terribly afraid I shall be too methodical (a term now applied to all vital Christianity)."

Although soon far outstripped by the activities of the Religious Tract Society, Wesley's followers continued to expand their own efforts, and even broaden their purpose from specific evangelism to general uplift. Once again impetus for a new approach was supplied by Thomas Coke. In 1806, possibly earlier, he began publishing tracts independently of the Conference, employing his own printer and book agent, and setting up his own Tract Repository. Wesley's four-page tracts were by-passed for somewhat more substantial items, especially the Wesleys' sermons. Coke also went farther afield than the Wesleys' own publications, and probably wrote at least one tract himself—A Plain Catechism . . . for Children. Spurred to action by Coke's initiative, in 1808 the Conference officially accepted tract-distribution as a connective responsibility, taking over Coke's work. By that time he had forty separate tracts in his catalogue. The early "official" publications bore the imprint: "For the Methodist Tract Society, for Promoting Religious Knowledge," but this was later dropped. The 1811 Conference recommended the formation of auxiliary tract societies in the circuits, and the 1812 Conference authorized the appointment of a Wesleyan Tract Committee. The Society was reformed by direction of the Conference in 1828, and within ten years had published 410 tracts. Between 1825 and 1838 no fewer than 36,787,111 copies were issued, and by 1871 there were 1,250 separate titles. Tract libraries were established in the circuits, and the itinerancies of both local preachers and ministers greatly helped in the tract distribution.

In the smaller branches of British Methodism the book rooms were also responsible for the issue of tracts. The PRIMITIVE METHODISTS established tract societies in the areas of Cheshire under WILLIAM CLOWES, and in Derbyshire under HUGH BOURNE. In the early days of Anglican Tractarianism the Wesleyan Methodists produced their own "Tracts for the Times" in defense of the Methodist position. Also tracts were prolific in the internal Methodist controversies of the first half of the nineteenth century, but these so-called "tracts" were of a quite different genre from the inexpensive homilies distributed by the tract societies.

The same kind of thing happened in America. James P. Pilkington writes: "The tract—brief, pointed, anecdotal, and lively—could well be called the foundation of The METHODIST PUBLISHING HOUSE, since it was for the publication of such as these that the BOOK CONCERN was called into being in 1789. The Methodists were among the first in the field with these 'books for the poor,' which were the nearest thing to mass media the early nineteenth century had to offer, and 'covered the land like the leaves of autumn'" (The Methodist Publishing House: a History, Vol. 1, p. 194). At first the works were sold as cheaply as possible. In 1808 the GENERAL CONFERENCE ordered the Book Concern to appropriate $1,000 for the free distribution of books, and in 1817 an official Methodist Episcopal Tract Society was begun on similar principles to those in England, mainly under the auspices of the Book Concern in New York. The Address, Constitution, and By-laws of the New York Methodist Tract Society was published in 1818, and local branches varying in size and influence seem to have sprung up throughout the country. The text of many of the tracts was taken from their British predecessors, and the publishing houses in both countries offered special discounts to SUNDAY SCHOOLS, which thus served as among the more efficient and prolific tract-distributors. The most powerful organization rivalling the Methodists in this field was the interdenominational American Tract Society, founded in 1825, mainly from an amalgamation of the American Tract Society instituted in Boston in 1814, with a similar New York Society. The M.E. Church declined to affiliate with this body (as later with the American Sunday School Union) on the grounds that it was dominated by Calvinists.

In both Britain and America the tract societies experienced an ebb and flow in usefulness, the highest tide probably being during the 1820's, and another after the halfway mark of the century. Simpson's Cyclopaedia of Methodism notes that at the General Conference of 1876 it was reported that during the previous year almost 36 million pages of Methodist tracts had circulated in the United States, and a further 36 million in foreign missions.

From Wesley's small beginnings the publication and distribution of helpful pamphlet literature at low cost or none at all has never dried up. Sometimes this has been due to private enterprise, as in the case of Wesley himself and of Thomas Coke. During the century following Wesley's death the official publishing house was usually the sponsor. During the present century this function has largely been taken over by connective organizations, sometimes independently, sometimes in collaboration with the Methodist Publishing House. Noteworthy in this respect have been the HOME MISSION DEPARTMENT in Britain and the General BOARD OF EVANGELISM in America, but many other bodies might be named in this fruitful enterprise which continues to follow Wesley's lead in adjusting a tried method to the needs and tastes of the changing generations.

TRADE UNIONISM and British Methodism. Continental labor movements owed their inspiration largely to Proudhon and Marx, but in England, in the words of Morgan Phillips, the debt was "more to Methodism than to Marx." When organized labor movements began to appear in Industrial Revolution England, Methodism was sweeping through the working classes, and it was natural that the two movements should interact upon each other. The more sober and responsible Methodism made English workingmen, the more likely they were to be trusted by their fellows with the organization of their unions and the administration of their funds.

It was not only that many of the early trade union leaders were Methodists; the constitution of many of the unions was modeled upon the CLASS MEETINGS and BAND meetings and CIRCUITS of Methodism. Men who had seen how effective could be such organization for the spreading of the gospel and the control of the members adapted it to the needs of men who had to find some means of giving expression to their corporate voice in dealing with their employers and government. Particularly in the Durham coal fields was the parallel close, and here many of the most effective and prominent leaders were PRIMITIVE METHODIST local preachers, many of whom spread trade union membership among their congregations as they traveled round the Methodist chapels in the mining villages.

One major consequence of this phenomenon was that, although many of the Methodist trade unionists were vigorous and militant in pursuit of their social and economic aims, there has been a tradition of conciliation machinery in industrial disputes in England, and a respect for negotiated agreements on the part of the men that may owe more than a little to the recognition that both masters and men might belong to the same church or even class meeting, or at any rate that both sides were Christian.

TRANSPORTATION OFFICE of The United Methodist Church, U.S.A., is an agency of that Church which is directed "to represent the Church in its relation with responsible persons or concerns operating all modes of transportation." The office is under the supervision of the Council on World Service and Finance and is supported by the general administration fund of the Church.

Prior to unification, in 1939, the M.E. Church had established a Transportation Committee to serve the needs of the traveling minister. In 1912, E. K. Copper, a District Superintendent from the Northern Minnesota Conference, opened the Transportation office in Chicago. In 1916, this office was under the jurisdiction of the Council of Secretaries headed by THOMAS STAFFORD. E. K. Copper was assisted in his office by his daughter, Joyce.

The M.E. Church, South, also had a Transportation Committee headed by William Cassetty. Cassetty was a layman and had offices in Nashville. At the time of union, in 1939, and when E. K. Copper retired, Cassetty became the travel representative for the United Church, and maintained his offices at The Methodist Building on Rush Street in Chicago until his retirement in 1952. In that year in the general reorganization of almost all church agencies by the General Conference, the Transportation Committee experienced a redefining of its work. The functions of the former Committee were given to the COUNCIL ON WORLD SERVICE AND FINANCE, with the Transportation Office becoming a department of the Council.

In carrying out its work, the Transportation Office endeavors to be skilled in the routing, shipping, and rate structure of both passenger and freight costs. Personnel specializing in the field of air transportation and rail transportation are employed.

The railroads, in addition to granting passes through this office, also issue clergy certificates which allow special rates for ministers. The office processes the major portion of clergy applications. With the reduction and consolidation of rail passenger transportation, the office is being increasingly concerned with all forms of air transportation—that of the individual minister on official duty, giving assistance in securing charter flights, as well as for tours both domestic and foreign. The office also processes bus clergy certificate applications which allows a reduced rate for motor coach travel.

In 1963 the Transportation Office developed a service presently called the Convention Bureau, which concerns itself with the seeking out and publishing of a list of hotels that grant clergy rates. Another facet of the Convention Bureau is assistance rendered various church agencies, boards, commissions, and committees in planning and successfully conducting a large meeting.

For the Church to maintain a helpful mutual relationship with hotels, clergy bureaus, passenger associations, airlines, etc., an aggressive public relation program is continually maintained. In May 1966, the Transportation Office opened a branch in Nashville, which serves the general agencies of the Church located there in expediting their travel.

James Hoge succeeded Mr. Cassetty as director in 1952. The present director is Harlan E. Lance. Headquarters offices are in Evanston, Ill., and a branch office in Nashville.

TRAVELING PREACHER. In English usage this was an eighteenth century full-time preacher of the Gospel who had been taken into the "Connexion" by JOHN WESLEY and worked and preached as Wesley directed. The term "travelling preacher" helped to distinguish such a person from the "LOCAL PREACHER," who preached in a single locality in his spare time.

In America, pretty much the same usage prevailed. The present definition in the glossary of terms, published in the appendix of the Discipline of The Methodist Church (1944-1964) was: "Preacher, traveling. One who is on trial or in full connection in an Annual Conference." A note is appended to this definition stating that it has an interesting historical background; that the minister in early Methodism who devoted his full time to the work of the ministry and was therefore subject to appointment in first one place and then another, was called a "travelling preacher" in contradistinction from the local preacher, who because he served only part-time and earned his livelihood by other means, was tied to local communities and unable to travel or itinerate. A good definition of a traveling preacher may be that such a one is "under appointment in the itinerancy." This will probably be true in any special branch of the world-wide Methodist Connection.

TRAVIS, JAMES (1840-1919), British Methodist, was born March 6, 1840. He entered the PRIMITIVE METHODIST ministry in 1859, and eventually became one of its foremost administrators. Deeply concerned for ministerial education, he was one of the founders of HARTLEY THEOLOGICAL COLLEGE, MANCHESTER, and, as a trustee, raised large sums for its erection. He was a pioneer (with JOHN ATKINSON) in missionary legislation at the LIVERPOOL CONFERENCE of 1888 and creator of the Missionary Committee. At the Reading Conference of 1885 Travis became the architect of the CHAPEL AID ASSOCIATION. In 1892 he was elected president of the Primitive Methodist Conference. An exponent of Free Church principles, he was the first Primitive Methodist to become president of the National Free Church Council. He was an eloquent and informed preacher. A portrait in oils hangs in the library, Hartley Victoria College, Manchester.

TREFFRY, RICHARD, JUNIOR (1804-1838), British Methodist, was born at Camelford, Cornwall, England, on Nov. 30, 1804, the son of a minister, and also RICHARD TREFFRY. He was educated at KINGSWOOD SCHOOL, and entered the Wesleyan Methodist ministry in 1824. Owing to ill health he retired from circuit work in 1830; and during his retirement he published, among other writings, An Enquiry into the Doctrine of the Eternal Sonship of Our Lord Jesus Christ, which was a reply to the criticism of this doctrine by ADAM CLARKE. He died at the age of thirty-three, in Penzance, Cornwall, on Jan. 20, 1838.

TREFFRY, RICHARD, SENIOR (1771-1842), British Methodist, was born at Newton, near St. Austell, in Cornwall, on Nov. 25, 1771, and became a Wesleyan itinerant in 1792. Largely self-taught, he acquired considerable theological knowledge, and published numerous sermons, tracts, and biographical studies, including the standard life of JOSEPH BENSON. Treffry often served as a Chairman of District, was elected president of the Wesleyan Methodist CONFERENCE in 1833, and in 1838 was appointed house governor of the new theological institution which was being established for the training of the ministry at Hoxton, in London. He resigned this office, the conferring of which was a mark of great confidence on the part of his brethren (1841), and died at Maidenhead on Sept. 19, 1842.

JOHN NEWTON

TREMBATH, JOHN (? -c. 1793), British Methodist, became one of WESLEY's assistants in 1743. In 1747 he accompanied Wesley on his first visit to Ireland and was left in charge of the DUBLIN society. Trembath's eloquence and zeal won him great popularity, but he was also vain and untrustworthy. He later married a wealthy and accomplished wife, left the itinerancy, and took up farming. After his wife deserted him, he sank into poverty. Wesley met him in Cork in 1756, and again in Cornwall in 1782. He died of paralysis in Cork around 1793.

TRENTON, NEW JERSEY, U.S.A., county seat of Mercer County and the capital of the state, situated on the Delaware River, thirty miles north of PHILADELPHIA, was founded about 1720 by Colonel William Trent, formerly of Philadelphia.

On Nov. 21, 1739, GEORGE WHITEFIELD preached in the courthouse in Trent-town. He did not, however, establish either classes or a Society. Methodism was introduced into Trenton by Captain THOMAS WEBB in 1766. He preached to the people in a stable located near what is now the corner of Broad and Academy Streets.

In 1768 a Methodist Society was formed and a frame chapel erected. JOSEPH TOY served as the first class leader. This original chapel was taken down in 1772 and a frame chapel was erected on the same site. The Trenton Society, consisting of nineteen members, among whom was John Fitch, the inventor of the steamboat, secured subscriptions from some 122 persons for the erection of this "meeting house." Bishop ASBURY laid the cornerstone on April 22, 1773. The building was known as the "Plank Church" because of the material used in its construction. Many historians believe this building to be the third Methodist church built in North America and the first in New JERSEY. Through the years it has been known as the "Mother Church of Trenton Methodism." By 1894 eleven Methodist churches had grown from it.

The first Annual Conference held in New Jersey met in the "preaching house" in Trenton on May 23, 1789. Eleven other sessions of the Annual Conference have met in the city of Trenton (1839, 1844, 1852, 1857, 1865, 1872, 1877, 1891, 1897, 1904).

The 1970 General Minutes show eight United Methodist churches in Trenton (Asbury, Broad Street, Cadwalader Heights, First, Greenwood Avenue, Hamilton Avenue, St. Pauls, and Wesley).

TRIBOU, DAVID HOWARD (1848-1922), was an outstanding figure of New England Methodism and distinguished CHAPLAIN of the U.S. Navy. He was born at Hampden, Maine, Sept. 16, 1848, died in PHILADELPHIA, May 31, 1922, and was buried in Hampden. His education was at Hampden Academy, the East Maine Conference Seminary, Bucksport, Maine, and BOSTON UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY. He received the honorary D.D. degree from WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY in 1901. He married Katherine Davis of Ellsworth, Maine, March 6, 1873, and they had one child, Frances, who was married to H. S. Tinsman.

He was a descendant of Thomas Tribou, a Frenchman, who appeared in MASSACHUSETTS early in the eighteenth century. Through his paternal grandmother he was descended from Elder Brewster of Mayflower fame, and also from Stephen Hopkins, another Mayflower passenger.

He joined the EAST MAINE CONFERENCE in 1872 and was admitted into full membership in 1876. During the period of his retirement, 1909-1917, while living in Bucksport, Maine, Chaplain Tribou was Secretary of the Conference, Conference Historian, and served on numerous boards and committees. He was a member of the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1908. In the years when he was stationed in or near Boston, he was a staff member of Zion's Herald and a regular contributor to its columns. He was a delegate to the second ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCE, held in Washington in 1891, and also to the fourth, held in Toronto in 1911. At the beginning of World War I, Chaplain Tribou was called back to active duty by the U.S. Navy, at his own request, though he was then sixty-nine years of age.

His appointment to the chaplaincy, Feb. 5, 1872, was on the recommendation of Senator Hannibal Hamlin. He was appointed by President Grant and the appointment was confirmed by the Senate. He served as chaplain on ten ships in home, European and South American waters. The Navy Department consulted him on matters other than those concerning the work of a chaplain. In addition to his regular work he was a member of the Board of Medals of Honor for World War I, meeting in Washington 1919-1921.

Chaplain Tribou was known as a powerful preacher. His language was rich in descriptive phraseology, rugged and convincing, virile with all the virility of the sea. Among his ministerial friends he sometimes startled those who did not know him well, by his natural brusqueness and abruptness of speech. In The History of the Chaplains Corps we find this evaluation of him:

"The loving nickname by which he is known among his friends is 'Roaring Bill Tribou', a name gained by his habit of bursting forth in thunderous denunciation or approbation when stirred. . . . The Corps knows him as its 'Grand Old Man' and honors him as one whose years of labor and accomplishment have won for him an imperishable place. But the Corps loves him for the splendid catholic humanity and tender sweetness of his personality."

One of the Chaplain's much quoted words of advice to young chaplains was, "Go right on and bring things to pass. Never mind who is for you or against you, and especially never care who gets the credit."

On the occasion of the seventy-fifth and final session of the East Maine Conference, which was also the fiftieth year of the Chaplain's membership, he delivered a remarkable historical address, Seventy-Five Years of Methodism in East Maine. Following the address he returned to his duty as Chaplain at the Naval Home in Philadelphia and died a month later.

TRIMBLE, HENRY BURTON (1885-1962), American pastor and theological dean, was born at Hot Springs, Va., on Dec. 26, 1885, the son of Stephen and Matilda Jane (Rucker) Trimble. He attended Roanoke College at Salem, Va., where he received the A.B. degree in 1907, and the same institution awarded him the D.D. degree in 1923. He was a B.D. of VANDERBILT UNIVERSITY in 1909, an A.M. of Columbia in 1913, and a B.D. of Union Theological Seminary in 1913. Other honorary degrees were awarded by HENDRIX COLLEGE in 1922 (D.D.); and by BOSTON UNIVERSITY in 1939 (LL.D.).

He married Mattie Lorena Cargille in 1914. To them were born three daughters and a son. Trimble was ordained in 1909, and served at Heber Springs, Ark., 1909-11, Clarendon, 1911-12; Central Church, Hot Springs, 1914-15; First Church, Fort Smith, 1915-17; Lakeside Church, Pine Bluff, 1918-22; McKendree Church, Nashville, Tenn., 1922-28; Central Church, Asheville, N. C., 1928-31; Professor of Homiletics, 1931-37. In 1937 he became Dean of the CANDLER SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY at EMORY UNIVERSITY. He served in World War I as CHAPLAIN in the U.S. Army, and was the Chairman of the General Conference Budget Commission (MES), 1926-28. Among his books are Motive and Method in Stewardship, 1938; Methodists at Work, 1935; To Every Creature, 1940.

His outstanding work was as Dean of the Theological School at Emory University where he became known as an able administrator, a wise counselor to the students, and the scholarly director of the various functions of that school. He retired in 1954 and died in Atlanta in 1962.

TRIMBLE, (MRS.) JANE (1755-1839), distinguished American pioneer, was born in Augusta County, Va., March 15, 1755. A Presbyterian in early life, she moved to KENTUCKY and in 1790 joined the M.E. Church whose doctrines pleased her better. At age fifteen she had memorized the four Gospels and though living in the backwoods this pioneer mother was familiar with the great English poets.

An extraordinary woman, she was familiar from childhood with the warwhoop of the Indian, and several of her family perished in the Revolutionary and Indian wars. In 1784, she emigrated to Kentucky (her husband having gone ahead to build a log-cabin), traveling on horseback, carrying her oldest child behind her, and Allen, eleven months old and a future governor of Ohio, in her lap. She crossed the dangerous swollen Clinch River amid the shouts and prayers of those who watched her. She and her husband freed their slaves. Her husband purchased land in Ohio but died before the family started for their new home there. She took her eight children to Ohio.

In Highland County, Ohio, she organized one of the first Sunday schools in the state. Instrumental in organizing a Methodist Church, she visited the poor, the prisoners, and had preaching in her own house. "Elect lady of the church in the wilderness," she adorned her church and country as few women of her day did.

Mrs. Trimble possessed a vigorous mind and was one of the ablest and best women in Methodism for almost fifty years. She was the mother of Governor Allen Trimble of Ohio and grandmother of J. M. Trimble of the OHIO CONFERENCE. She died in 1839 in the home of her son, Ex-Governor Trimble.

TRIMBLE, JOHN BROWNLEE (1850-1929), American minister, missionary executive and church builder, was born at Malakoff, Ontario, CANADA, Jan. 30, 1850. At age eleven he was converted and felt called to preach. He attended Victoria College, Cobourg, Ontario, and entered the ministry of the Canadian Methodist Church. He married Mrs. Catherine Donaghue. In 1881 he joined the NORTHWEST IOWA CONFERENCE, where he served successively at Rockwell City, Galva and Odebolt. In 1893 he became PRESIDING ELDER of the Sheldon District with such success that this district was conspicuous over the entire Church in missionary giving. In 1898 he was assigned to the Sioux City District. In this and a subsequent term on this district five new churches were founded and four houses of worship built, all in Sioux City. One church bears his name.

In 1903 he was chosen Field Secretary of the Board of Foreign Missions with offices at New York City. He was a capable speaker on the urgency of world evangelism but his greatest strength lay in the field of management. He was a member of the GENERAL CONFERENCE in 1896, 1900, 1904, 1908 and 1912. In 1913 he was made Executive Secretary of the General Conference Commission on Finance.

In 1916 he returned for a second term as Superintendent of the Sioux City District. In 1922 he became Executive Secretary of the Methodist Hospital in Sioux City. He retired in 1924. His death occurred June 27, 1929. He is buried in Graceland Cemetery, Sioux City, Iowa. His sister, Lydia Trimble, was head of the Hwa Nan missionary school at Foochow, CHINA, under the WOMEN'S FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

TRINIDAD and TOBAGO—a two island unit—is an independent member of the British Commonwealth occupying islands located seventy-five miles south of Grenada at the southern limit of the Caribbean Windward Islands, and ten miles from the northeast coast of VENEZUELA. The capital is Port-of-Spain. The area of Trinidad is 1,864 square miles and Tobago has 116 square miles. Several other islets are in the group. The total population is over a million, of which over ninety percent reside on Trinidad.

The economy has been based on tropical fruits, sugar, and molasses. The pitch lake at La Brea is said to be the world's chief source of supply for natural asphalt.

Trinidad was visited by Christopher Columbus on July 31, 1498, and the islands were held by Spain for decades. The competition of the European powers brought about the capture and recapture of the islands by Spanish, Dutch, French and British forces. Progress toward responsible self-government accelerated after 1900, the first parliamentary elections being held in 1924. The two-island unit achieved autonomy and membership in the United Nations in 1962. Trinidad maintains an Allied strategic military position, providing naval and air bases commanding the open passage between the Caribbean Sea and the South Atlantic Ocean.

It was not until 1809 that a British Wesleyan Methodist minister, Thomas Talboys, was stationed in Trinidad. He found there a few Methodists at scattered points. Upon receiving his report, THOMAS COKE agreed that he might remain and establish work. By 1812 he had built a chapel for a congregation of about 140 members, practically all Negroes. John Dace succeeded him, enlarging the membership to over 200 by 1814.

In 1811 Trinidad was included in a new Methodist District of St. Vincent. During the period of the autonomous West Indian Conference (1883-1903), Trinidad became a separate district. When these West Indian districts reverted to the control of the British Wesleyan Methodist Conference, a Barbados and Trinidad District (which for a time included British Guiana) was set up. This was renamed the South Caribbean District in 1967, when the autonomous METHODIST CHURCH IN THE CARIBBEAN AND THE AMERICAS was inaugurated.

In early years there was a language barrier among the French-speaking Negroes, and there had been a strong Roman Catholic tradition since the days of French and Spanish control. The British governors were frequently changed, and the license and privileges granted by one governor for the missionary were often revoked by his successor. Opposition to Methodism reached a peak in 1818-20, and it was not until 1827 that the first permanent Methodist church was opened in Hanover Street (now Abercromby Street), Port of Spain. By 1839 the Circuit had three ministers, but after 1845 there was some retrenchment, and membership stagnated or declined. It was not until 1870 that a new period of expansion began, with the opening of new churches in Port of Spain and San Fernando. In 1874, a minister was stationed at Savannah Grande, where work among East Indians had recently begun. (This area was later handed over to a Canadian Presbyterian mission.)

In 1919 a Methodist Oilfields Mission was opened to help in giving pastoral care to those who were coming into La Brea from other parts of the West Indies to find work.

The first West Indian chairman of the district was a Barbadian, Errol S. M. Pilgrim. He was appointed in 1942.

The first British Methodist preacher to visit Tobago was WILLIAM TURTON. Son of a Barbados planter and a local preacher, he landed in 1795, finding the only other Christian leader to be a Moravian preacher named Montgomery, whose son, James, was to be the noted hymn writer. Turton organized a small society but he suffered exposure and illness during a French raid and was compelled to abandon the work. Early in 1817, John Brown and James Catts touched at Tobago en route to HAITI. There was interest in their preaching. In 1818 the first British Wesleyan minister, Jonathan Raynar, was stationed on the island for a few months, several planters having pledged their support. A church was built in Scarborough in 1824-26, almost entirely from local funds, including a grant from the Legislative Council. By 1833, however, there were still only seventy-four members. The Wesleyan schools were the first on the island, and in 1854, Gilbert Irvine, the first Tobagonian minister, began work.

In 1967 the year of autonomy within the Methodist Church in the Caribbean and the Americas, there were 18,300 full members in Trinidad and Tobago. The church was responsible for twelve schools.

Since before 1916 the American based A.M.E. CHURCH has been at work in Trinidad. Another strand of the Methodist tradition is woven into the UNITED CHURCH OF CANADA. Methodism is the third largest denomination after the Roman Catholic and Anglican churches.

TRINITY, THE HOLY. The Methodist Church joins with the general body of the universal Church in proclaiming this doctrine as a cardinal article of the Christian faith. There is thus no distinctive Methodist doctrine of God. The first Article of the American United Methodist Church set forth this belief. See ARTICLES OF RELIGION.

God has three ways of being God—the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit. This doctrine is a mystery of revelation disclosed in the experience of the Church, and witnessed to by scripture and tradition. Though a reality disclosed to us from beyond man's rational calculation, yet the triune nature of God is not foreign to the rational appraisal of man's mind or to his religious experience.

The formulation of the doctrine arose out of the religious experience of the early Christian community. The first Christians shared the faith of Israel in a Creator God in covenant with his people (I Chronicles 29:10-19). They knew him as the holy one far beyond them, the mysterious source of all things, visible and invisible. The greatness and grandeur of His nature was reflected in "the starry heavens above and the moral law within" (Psalm 19). God disclosed himself to them as the personal Father of all, the Creator (Isaiah 64:8; John 14:6-11; II Corinthians 1:3-4).

God was not only beyond. He also came to confront them in Jesus Christ. The disciples of Jesus, all Jews convinced of the oneness of God, came to the conviction that the God they had known through Israel was uniquely present in their master of Galilee. In Jesus of Nazareth they were challenged and claimed for discipleship by and with a new covenant by this same Father God (Ephesians 1:3-8). The authority, nature, and work of God were manifest in Jesus. His patience under suffering, his compassionate forgiveness to those who crucified him were no less than the love of God. The assurance of his living presence with them after the death and entombment were enough to convince them he was God. "God was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself" (II Corinthians 5:19), they said. He was the Son of the Father, the concrete example of the mysterious beyond. They called this manner of his nature, Redeemer, Saviour.

Beyond and before, God was also within them. After Jesus' physical departure, they experienced a continuing sense of his abiding presence in their fellowship, the Christlike presence of God bringing a faith in Christ and a love of the Father, bringing pardon and power for moral transformation in their personal and corporate life. The creation stories of Genesis (Gen. 2:7) spoke of God breathing his breath into the creatures he had made and thereby giving them life. The Hebrew word for spirit is ruah which also means breath or wind. Ancient man knew that where there is breath in man there is life. When the breath goes, so does the life. God was understood to be present in all men as the animating principle of life. That presence was called the Spirit. Later the Nicene Creed was to speak of the Holy Spirit as the Lifegiver, the activating, personal Spirit by whom and in whom we live, move, and have our being.

But as the Spirit was present in all men by birth, he was understood to be uniquely present in some men to direct and complete their lives. His personal inspiration and direction of the prophets enabled them to speak forth the judging and renewing message of God to their day and its needs. The Spirit was present in the kings of Israel to assist them in the ruling of the nation. The High Priest was led by the Spirit in his offering of the people's worship to God. The tragedy of the prophets, priests and kings of Israel was that they never fully knew who it was who was so working in them. God the Creator beyond, and the Spirit within, was clouded in a mystery, a mystery which would be illumined in Jesus of Nazareth. Yet the prophets spoke of a day in the future when God would pour out his personal spirit upon everyone. Not simply upon prophets, kings and priests; "your sons and daughters shall prophesy, your young men shall see visions and your old men shall dream dreams" (Joel 2:28f). Another prophet of Israel, the great Jeremiah, anticipated a new covenant written on the human heart (Jeremiah 31:31). Men would no longer live by the outer direction of the law; they would have the inner direction of the Spirit of God. With the clarification that Jesus Christ gave to the nature of God, the Holy Spirit could come to all men in a fuller way. Men could open themselves to his inspiration with greater understanding and cooperation. The prophet's dream of a universal outpouring of God's Spirit into the hearts of men could be fulfilled. This is the promise of the Spirit we read of in the Gospels and in the Acts of the Apostles. The early church believed it came to this fuller awareness of the Holy Spirit at Pentecost. This personal presence of God called and equipped leaders, converted sinners, and established fellowship in the church.

In its own experience the church knew God in three ways—God beyond, God before, God within. It gave expression to this as it invoked the blessing of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit upon one another (II Corinthians 13:14). How was it to explain this experience of knowing God in three ways? This threefold nature of God was not simply limited to man's experience, three modes of revelation for the convenience of his own understanding. The church insisted that God himself had three ways of being God, that the threeness was intrinsic in His very nature. So the biblical record points to the presence of the Holy Spirit in man prior to Pentecost, even at the dawn of creation. And the redemptive, revealing Christ of God was present before the foundation of the world, and "all things were made through him" (John 1:3, Col. 1:16, Heb. 1:2). Now how were the early Christians to hold their Jewish inheritance of monotheism, and yet give honest expression to their conviction that Jesus was divine? How were they to express their experience of God's presence within while maintaining that he was beyond and before them as well? After many attempts to solve the doctrinal problem by compromising the testimony of experience, the Church formulated the theological definition we know as the doctrine of the Trinity.

At first the church affirmed its faith by and in doxologies and such confessions as the Apostle's Creed without regard to the theological problems involved. Many of the early attempts to define the trinitarian doctrine suffered from one extreme or another. At the Council of Nicaea

(A.D. 325) and at Constantinople (A.D. 381) the doctrine was defined in its simplest outlines in the face of pressing extremes or heresies. The real distinction, yet the co-equality and co-eternity of the three divine Persons was there affirmed. The eastern Church tended to interpret the doctrine from the standpoint of the difference of the three Persons. In the West, however, the unity of the Divine Substance, safeguarding the co-equality of the persons, was strongly stressed. With different emphasis, the universal Church has thus taught the unity and the trinity of God.

Methodist teaching has historically followed the traditions of the Western church. John Wesley used every instance possible to stress the doctrine of a triune God, and its immediate importance for religious experience. This is clearly demonstrated in his Explanatory Notes on the New Testament and in his Sermons. Wesley's sermon, "On the Trinity," insists it is the fact of the Trinity given by revelation which is the object of belief. We are not expected to believe a mystery, how "these Three are One," but rather, the fact that they are one. This fact of the Trinity is verified in genuine Christian experience and is vital for man's salvation. According to Wesley, salvation means acceptance by God the Father on the basis of the Son's merits. This divine acceptance is communicated to man by the Holy Spirit. The Holy Spirit within brings us to acknowledge Jesus as the Christ, and the Son shows us the Father. Wesley acknowledges that the words "trinity" and "person" are not to be found in scripture; hence he will not insist on these words as necessary to orthodoxy. But if one will use the direct words and experiences as witnessed to in scripture, he will necessarily come to an understanding and experience of the God who has three ways of being God. Like Luther, Wesley declined to speculate about the metaphysical constitution of the inner trinity of God. His stress was upon the revealing and redeeming work of the triune God.

This trinitarian heritage was passed by Wesley to the American Methodists. The Notes on the New Testament and the Sermons of John Wesley were considered the doctrinal standards of American Methodism. Alongside the Articles of Religion revised from the Church of England these standards are referred to as permanent doctrinal foundations in the first RESTRICTIVE RULE of the Constitution of The United Methodist Church in America. The first four Articles of Religion affirm Methodist belief in the doctrine of the Holy Trinity, and creeds used in the worship services of contemporary Methodists affirm the same. The "Foundations of Christian Teaching in Methodist Churches" affirm the same trinitarian doctrine—God as Creator, Redeemer, and Life-giving Spirit.

Today the trinitarian language of the 4th century—three Persons and one Substance—is by some considered inadequate. Our concept of personhood has changed radically. It is perhaps better to speak of a threefold eternal determination of the divine Being, of the God who has three ways of being God. Though Methodism has been concerned primarily with the revealed and redemptive Trinity, the latter must never be separated from the inner reality of the transcendent God. The doctrine of the Trinity contains within it the most crucial affirmations of the Christian faith—the sovereignty and self-revelation of God; the redemption of sinful man through the divine Saviour, Jesus Christ; the living presence of God in his creation and in his Church. Compromise at any point, as do the Unitarians, the Divine Science groups, the Mormons and others, and the whole theological edifice of the Christian faith begins to crumble. The doctrine of the Trinity is a safeguard against false deistic conceptions of a "supreme being," far removed and now uninvolved in his creation and church. Against pantheism the doctrine insists upon the transcendence as well as the immanence of God.

TRINITY HALL SCHOOL, British Methodist. One of the first references to Trinity Hall School, is to be found in the City Road Magazine of 1872. In an article on "The Education of Wesleyan Ministers' Daughters," T. P. BUNTING speaks of the opening of "the beautiful house in Southport, provided by Mr. Fernley's far-seeing and wide embracing bounty," John Fernley (see FERNLEY-HARTLEY LECTURES) did, in fact, meet the entire cost of the building, about 8,000 pounds, and was conspicuous in organizing the appeal for 2,500 pounds needed for the furnishings and equipment. The school opened with its full complement of fifty pupils, on Oct. 1, 1872, though the "official" opening was celebrated on November 7, with a special service in Trinity Church, and a dinner at the school.

The school within recent years catered to about 260 girls, of whom about one-fifth were the daughters of ministers. It occupied about five acres in the pleasant, residential area of Birkdale, and had twelve acres of playing fields close by. The primary function was always the provision of a grammar-school education, leading up to the General Certificate of Education and university entrance—and its first concern was for the daughters of ministers and missionaries. However, the Conference regretfully decided by official action that the school, because it was too small and financially unviable, would have to be closed as from 1969-70.

MARJORIE LONSDALE

TROMMER, KARL SIEGFRIED (1920-), missionary to South America and one of the founders of the Patagonia Provisional Annual Conference, was born in Netzschkau, Vogtland, GERMANY. He was first educated in the art of bookbinding. Then, deciding for the ministry, he became an assistant minister in the Methodist Church of Germany in 1939. During the Second World War, he was a member of the German army, serving with Rommel's Afrika Corps. During the years 1943-46 he was a prisoner of war, and was called to be a CHAPLAIN to prisoners in the United States.

After release and repatriation, he undertook theological studies at the Methodist theological seminary (PREDIGER-SEMINAR der Methodisten Kirche) in Frankfurt, Germany, and at GARRETT THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, Evanston, Ill., where he was a CRUSADE SCHOLAR. He also studied at SCARITT COLLEGE and VANDERBILT UNIVERSITY in Nashville, Tenn., and was trained in counseling at Ohio State University Hospital.

Siegfried Trommer held two pastoral appointments in Germany, 1949-54. He had been accepted as a missionary by the Board of Missions of The Methodist Church (New York) in 1949, but political conditions delayed his assignment until 1954, when he was appointed to ARGENTINA. In 1955 he became pastor of the trilingual church (Spanish, German, English) at San Carlos de BARILOCHE in Rio Negro Province, at the northern edge of the region known as Patagonia. Under his direction a new, well-appointed church building was erected and opened in 1964, in Bariloche.

He was also named to the Field Committee for Argentina. In 1961, while continuing as pastor at Bariloche, he was also made superintendent of the Patagonia District. Upon formation of the Patagonia Provisional Annual Conference in 1963, he became general secretary of the conference and superintendent of its southern district, while still serving as pastor at Bariloche. He is vice-president of its Coordinating Committee. He was a delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1964 and its adjourned session in 1966.

He was a member of the General BOARD OF EVANGELISM, 1956-64, and of the General BOARD OF CHRISTIAN SOCIAL CONCERNS, 1960-64. Also he was a member of the Commission on Ecumenical Consultation, 1956-64, Commission on Ecumenical Affairs, 1964-68, and of the ad hoc committee on union of The Methodist Church and The E.U.B. Church established in 1964; he holds membership in the United States conference, WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES; consultant on church union since 1960. He has served as a member of the board of trustees of GOUCHER COLLEGE, the American University, Eye Research Foundation of Bethesda, Maryland General Hospital; also he has served as a member of the board of the Church Executive Development Board, Inc., and Asbury Home for the Aged. In 1918 he served with the U.S. Army.

He is a member of the Association of Methodist Theological Schools (past president). He is the author of What Church People Think, 1937; Teen Agers Tell, 1948, and is contributor of articles and verse to church periodicals.

TROUNSON BENEVOLENT TRUST BOARD, was set up by the NEW ZEALAND Methodist Conference of 1929 to administer a gift of £11,000 of New Zealand Inscribed Stock given by James and Martha Trounson, Auckland Methodists, as a benevolent fund for the following categories of Methodists: (1) widows or children of deceased Methodist ministers; (2) supernumerary ministers or retired home missionaries; and (3) lay people. While ministers in active work are excluded, grants can be made under exceptional circumstances to deaconesses, home missionaries, and divinity students.

Both Mr. and Mrs. Trounson have died since their original gift was made. The secretary of the trust in 1966 was E. E. Sage.

ERNEST E. SAGE

TROUSDALE, SAMUEL WHITNEY (1853-1909), American minister, was born in Fayette, Wis., on Nov. 12, 1853. He grew up in a home of devout Christian parents. He graduated from the University of Wisconsin in 1877, taught Greek and Elocution there for one year and graduated from BOSTON UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY in 1882. He received the B.A. and M.A. degrees from the University of Wisconsin; a D.D. from LAWRENCE UNIVERSITY, and the Ph.D. degree from OHIO WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY. He was a half-brother of Bishop BASHFORD.

His ministerial life was spent in the WEST WISCONSIN CONFERENCE which he joined in 1882. His pastorates were at Delton; Hudson; First Church, Eau Claire; Platteville; First Church, LaCrosse; presiding elder of Platteville District, 1898-1903, and presiding elder of Madison District, 1903 until his death. He was head of his conference delegation to GENERAL CONFERENCE in 1896, 1900, 1904, and 1908.

Trousdale was greatly interested in the SUNDAY SCHOOL and worked in General Conference toward the formation of the Sunday School Board. Also chief among his interests were the superannuated ministers and their support. He was for many years a leader in his conference. He passed away at Wesley Hospital in Chicago, Ill., on June 4, 1909. The funeral was held in Madison, Wis., and Bishop WILLIAM FRASER McDOWELL preached the funeral sermon.

TROY CONFERENCE was carved from the NEW YORK CONFERENCE by the 1832 GENERAL CONFERENCE. The new conference held its first session in connection with the New York Conference which convened in New York City, June 7, 1832 with Bishop ROBERT R. ROBERTS presiding. The next session of the Troy Conference was at Troy, N.Y., Aug. 28, 1833 with Bishop ELIJAH HEDDING presiding. The territory of the conference was north-eastern NEW YORK and western VERMONT. In 1833 it had four districts, fifty charges, sixty-six preachers, and 18,492 members.

PHILIP EMBURY organized the first Methodist society within the bounds of what came to be the Troy Conference. He formed the society at ASHROVE in 1770 and served as its leader until his death in 1775. A church was built there in 1788, the first to be erected in the conference. FREEBORN GARRETTSON was appointed presiding elder in 1788, and, with other preachers to help him, he brought Methodism from New York City up the Hudson and Champlain valleys as far as CANADA. Garrettson rode a one-thousand mile circuit four times a year to visit the work.

By 1860 the Troy Conference had grown to seven districts and about 32,000 members including probationers. At that time the Burlington and St. Albans Districts in northwestern Vermont were taken from the Troy Conference and attached to the VERMONT CONFERENCE which had been formed in 1844 and which desired to have all of Vermont within its bounds, though the preachers and churches west of the Green Mountains seemed to prefer alignment with the Troy Conference. Part of the Vermont territory passed back and forth between the two conferences several times. In 1868 the Burlington District came back to the Troy Conference, was transferred to the Vermont Conference again in 1880, and back to the Troy Conference once more in 1884. Thereafter there was little change in the boundaries of the Troy Conference until 1940 when the Vermont Conference, which then embraced the Vermont work east of the Green Mountains, merged and became a part of the Troy body. In 1964 a few churches in extreme northwestern MASSACHUSETTS which had been in the Troy Conference were transferred to the NEW ENGLAND CONFERENCE. In 1941 the Troy Conference reported about 69,000 members.

In the early years the Troy Conference supported a number of schools and academies. In 1853 the conference decided to establish Troy University, secured subscriptions of $200,000, and soon opened the school. It continued four years and was forced to close for lack of money. Today the conference supports GREEN MOUNTAIN and VERMONT (junior) COLLEGES, strong Methodist related schools with adequate plants, modest endowment, and good enrolments. In addition, the conference helps to maintain campus ministries at state institutions of higher learning.

Service institutions supported by the conference include the Saratoga Retirement Center, and the Charlton Home for teenage girls. The conference joins other conferences in supporting Gateway which is the Methodist Home for Children at Williamsville, N. Y. and the Methodist Hospital in BROOKLYN.

In 1970 the Troy Conference reported four districts, 232 charges, 279 ministers, 87,452 members, property valued at $53,733,284, and $5,416,834 raised for all purposes during the year.

LAWRENCE R. CURTIS

TRUEMAN, GEORGE JOHNSTONE (1872-1949), Canadian educator, was born on Jan. 31, 1872, in Point de Bute, a small village near the New Brunswick town of Sackville. He was a descendant of that valiant band of Yorkshire Methodists who settled in the area in 1774.

George Trueman attended local schools and subsequently the normal school in Fredericton to prepare for teaching, his chosen profession. He then taught at Upper Sackville (1891-94), after which he was principal of St. Martin's Superior School (1895-1900). Then he entered MOUNT ALLISON UNIVERSITY, graduating with the B.A. in 1902 and the M.A. in 1904. He served as principal of Charlotte County Grammar School, 1904-5, and Riverside Consolidated School, 1905-8, before accepting a call to the principalship of STANSTEAD WESLEYAN COLLEGE in the province of Quebec where he remained until 1920. While there he spent vacations at the Universities of Berlin and Heidelberg in Germany, and at Columbia in New York, obtaining the Ph.D. degree from Columbia in 1919, his thesis being "School Funds in the Province of Quebec." For the next three years he was associate secretary of the Board of Education of the Methodist Church in Canada, and traveled from coast to coast visiting schools and colleges.

In 1923 he was invited to be president of MOUNT ALLISON UNIVERSITY, with which he was associated until his death in 1949, the last three years being in retirement. His years in the college on the hill by the Tantramar were not easy ones. He had barely assumed office when the United Church of Canada came into being, bringing administrative changes to all its institutions. One of these was the union of the Mount Allison Faculty of Theology with the Presbyterian College in Halifax to form Pine Hill Divinity Hall in that city. Soon the depression began to make itself felt, and financing became most difficult. For years no buildings of any size had been erected to meet the needs of the growing enrollment, and when the Memorial Library was erected in 1926-27, a very heavy burden was laid upon the president because of building difficulties. Three bad fires resulted in the destruction of four buildings, the last being the "fireproof" Men's Residence, with the loss of several lives. These buildings were replaced with better ones. During his presidency the Ladies' College, which in some departments ran parallel with the university, was incorporated in the latter institution.

Despite his heavy load at the college, Trueman took a leading part in educational advances in the Maritime Provinces and across CANADA. He helped to set up, and for years was chairman of, the Common Examining Board of the Maritime Provinces and Newfoundland. He was president of the Mental Hygiene Council of New Brunswick, chairman of the Maritime Religious Education Council, and a member of the executive of the New Brunswick Museum, to mention but a few of the many agencies to which he gave leadership. He often attended General Council and served on its boards and committees. Immediately before his death he was elected mayor of Sackville by acclamation. His hobbies included gardening and golf.

He was a true man in the best sense. Though strict and severe at times, his students respected him and grew to love him. In 1897 he married Agnes Fawcett of Upper Sackville, who survived him. He died on Feb. 18, 1949, after a short illness, and was buried in Sackville.

E. A. BETTS

TRUSCOTT, THOMAS A. (1870-1941), missionary to South America, was born in Devon, England. Truscott arrived in BUENOS AIRES, ARGENTINA, in April of 1906. Within a week he was asked to supply the First Church (English-speaking) of Rosario. He built up the church and erected the present building.

In MONTEVIDEO, URUGUAY, in 1920 he was appointed to Emmanuel Church—at the time not known by that name, but as the English-speaking congregation of Central Church. In April of 1921 four lots were purchased at auction across the street from the administration building of the University of Montevideo. No money was in hand, but Truscott proved a good money-raiser. Plans were made, and on April 5, 1925, the cornerstone was laid by Bishop WILLIAM F. OLDHAM. In 1927 funds were exhausted but the big basement was finished and the congregation moved in. Truscott kept up his money-raising, and in 1933 the present building—a large stone structure with four magnificent stained-glass windows—was ready for full occupancy. It was dedicated in the presence of the U.S. Secretary of State, Cordell Hull, who was then attending the Pan-American Congress in Montevideo.

Aside from the building, which Methodists owe largely to him, Truscott laid enduring spiritual foundations. He was minister of the church until 1940, when he retired. He died in Lomas de Zamorra, Argentina.

TRUST CLAUSE. (See DEEDS OF TRUST.)

TRUSTEES are, as the name indicates, persons who are empowered to hold in trust property for the benefit of other persons or corporations—for instance, for a church, annual conference, circuit, district, or general Church, as the case may be. In American Methodism, trustees are church officers appointed for the purposes of holding the legal specific title to church property, of taking care of it, and of following out certain duties and responsibilities outlined for such trusteeship in the Discipline. In the different branches of world Methodism, there are some differences in provisions regarding trustees, but in a general way these provisions are much the same in all the Churches.

Trustees of a local charge or church in The United Methodist Church are elected by the charge conference (formerly the QUARTERLY CONFERENCE) or by a "church conference" if the charge conference wishes it. From earliest days the quarterly (now the charge) conference, has exercised this elective power. In all cases where the law of the state, or in some instances of a Territory, directs the mode of election, that mode must be strictly followed out. It is presently the law in The United Methodist Church that the Board of Trustees of a local church shall consist of not fewer than three nor more than nine persons, each of whom shall be over twenty-one years of age and at least two-thirds of each Board must be Methodists. Such Board is divided into three classes. Each year the term of one of these classes expires and an election is held to elect trustees for the next three years in place of those whose terms have expired. Trustees, however, may be reelected to succeed themselves. By keeping two-thirds of the Board over for each new year, a more stable Board of Trust is obtained. (Discipline, 1968, Paragraph 1528-29.)

Trustees of a local church are directed by the Discipline to make an annual report. As the Deed of Trust ("trust clause") is very important, information regarding this, the amount and value of the property, the title by which it is held, the expenditures and liabilities, and the amount of monies which have been raised during the year for building or improvement are all usually a part of the trustees' formal reports.

Trustees are held amenable to the charge conference for the manner in which they perform their official duty. Before the trustees may make any sale either to pay debts or for reinvestment, they must be authorized to do so by the charge conference. In certain instances the preacher-in-charge and district superintendent must consent to financial or important moves.

Disciplinary regulations have been carefully drawn up as to what is to be done with Church property when it is abandoned or can no longer be used for the purpose originally planned.

Trustees who are members of a local church and have been elected by the charge conference are recognized as members of that body, and as such usually serve upon the Administrative Board. Trustees of parsonage property may be appointed, or elected, in the same way, and perform the same general duties as those of church building property. Disciplinary regulations regarding all these matters vary from time to time in any one church and vary somewhat in the different branches of Methodism, so the current Discipline of these bodies is to be referred to for exact information upon all points.

Trustees in the M.E. Church previous to Church union in 1939 seemed to have been more dominant in managing the affairs of the local church than were the STEWARDS. The contrary was the case in the M.E. Church, South, the trustees acting more as passive custodians of property. It was noticed at the UNITING CONFERENCE in 1939 that it was always "trustees and stewards" when a delegate from the north was reporting; always "stewards and trustees" when a southerner reported.

Trustees of the Annual Conference must be elected by each respective Conference and will hold the property devised to them. They must be incorporated unless the Conference itself is incorporated. The Discipline gives rather complete directions regarding their qualifications and duties.

There are also District trustees, which have obligations and duties with reference to District property, such as the District parsonage, or property left to a District. Present regulations call for these to be nominated by the District Superintendent and elected by the District Conference, and where there is no District Conference, they may be elected by the District Board of Stewards or by the Annual Conference on nomination of the District Superintendents. (Paragraph 716.2.)

For the church itself there is a general Board of Trustees which must be incorporated under the name of the Board of Trustees of The United Methodist Church. Regulations are outlined as to how they may be elected by the GENERAL CONFERENCE, the extent of their terms, how the personnel of the Board is to be divided between lay and clerical, with provisions and empowerment similar to that having to do with trustees of the Annual Conference and local church.

Since Church union in 1939, the Board of Trustees of The Methodist Church, now The United Methodist Church, has been the successor in trust of the Trustees of the M.E. Church, of the Board of Trustees of the M.E. Church, South, and of the Board of Trustees of the M.P. Church. For fear that certain rights and entrustments might lapse, successive General Conferences have been continuing to elect Boards of Trustees of the three Churches above named. These meet in a pro forma manner from time to time and make what moves are necessary to perpetuate their trust. However, insofar as is possible, the trustees of the general Church take over these former responsibilities where they may.

In the organization of The United Methodist Church in 1968, trustees of The Methodist Church were continued as were also trustees of The E.U.B. Church for the purpose described above—that is, to continue to hold property devised to these institutions, as there may be a fear that the taking of a new name, or merging into another church or control may jeopardize such holding. General trustees of The Methodist Church were nominated by the COUNCIL OF BISHOPS of that Church and elected by the Uniting Conference in 1968.

See successive Disciplines and General Conference Journals.

TRUSTEES FOR METHODIST CHURCH PURPOSES, British, is an incorporated board established under the provisions of the Methodist Church Act, 1939. It holds in perpetuity, generally as custodian trustee, such special Methodist property as colleges, schools, homes for the aged, hostels, and the like, which are not settled on the ordinary Model Deed Trust (see DEED, TRUST). The main work of the board is the custody of many thousands of invested funds arising from gifts, bequests, proceeds of sale and accumulations, including recovery of income tax on behalf of local trustees, committees, and institutions.

Tsuchiyama, Tetsuji (1885-1946), a Japanese elder of the FREE METHODIST CHURCH, Japan Conference. His secondary education was in Kumamoto, JAPAN, and he graduated from a United States high school in 1911. He attended college in Tokyo and also Pasadena University and received the B.D. from DREW THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY in 1918. He received the M.Th. from Princeton University, where he was also awarded the honorary D.D. degree, and did special studies in Israel.

Tsuchiyama secured a new campus and buildings for Osaka Seminary (now Osaka Christian College), of which he was president, 1918-38. He was pastor of Third Free Methodist Church in Osaka for four years; a delegate to the North America General Conference, 1935. He made an extended speaking tour in the United States including Japanese churches on the Pacific Coast. His college campus was destroyed during the second World War. Tsuchiyama, paralyzed and near death, was located by Free Methodist Chaplains and given medical assistance. After his death, funds were raised and the college rebuilt. A thorough scholar, he was an able administrator, and an unusually effective gospel preacher. He is the author of From Darkness to Light, 1927; Victory of the Cross, 1945; and contributed a section to Heroes of Other Lands by H. F. Johnson.

TSUI, H. H. (Ts'ui Hsien-hsiang) (1895-), CHINA church administrator, was born in Shantung province and studied at Yenching University in Peking, where he received the baccalaureate degrees in arts and divinity; and then at DREW UNIVERSITY, where he received the Th.D. He joined the Shantung Annual Conference, and was appointed associate professor of systematic theology at Che-loo University in Tsinan, Shantung. From 1931 to 1935 he was secretary of the National Christian Council, Shanghai. In 1935 he became executive secretary of the Church of Christ in China and has continued. (A hint of Chinese attitudes toward denominations is offered by the fact that he could hold this top administrative position in a sister denomination for over thirty years without giving up his membership in the Shantung Conference.)

He was an active participant in the Three Self Movement (see article on CHINA) since its organization, and thus has been able to continue work under the Communist regime. In 1962, at a reorganization of the Board of Managers of Nanking Union Theological Seminary, he was made vice chairman of the board. That is the last definite word that has been heard of him by 1967.

TUBMAN, WILLIAM VACANARAT SHADRACH (1895-1971), president of the Republic of LIBERIA, was born Nov. 29, 1895, the son of Rev. Alexander Tubman and Elizabeth Barnes Tubman. His grandfather, William Shadrach I, had migrated to Liberia in 1834 from Augusta, Ga. The Tubman family were very strict Christians, and the day began with prayers at 4:00 a.m. The boys tended their own gardens, and were not allowed to sleep on mattresses because their father believed it made a person soft and lazy!

William Tubman finished his high school education in 1913 and continued to study privately until he passed his bar examination in 1916 and was admitted to the bar in 1917. In 1923 he was elected to the Senate; at the age of twenty-eight he was the youngest senator in Liberian history.

In 1937 he was appointed Associate Justice of the Supreme Court. The conservative element in the True Whig party were afraid of his liberal ideas and his tremendous popularity. However, he was astute enough to use this time to secure support from the tribal leaders in the party, and in 1943 he was asked to stand for election to the presidency.

Since that time he served as a national leader, famous for his "Unification Policy" which made progress in overcoming the century-old animosity between U.S. settlers and the indigenous African peoples; and for the "Open Door Policy" which encourages foreign capital and investment. This has made possible the development of Liberia's huge iron ore deposits. He was re-elected president six terms. His story was featured in a special section of the New York Times, Nov. 27, 1966, the section terming President Tubman "pace-setter for a democratic and stable government in Africa." This was upon his seventy-first birthday and was material underwritten by certain international advertisers. He was serving his sixth term as president when he died suddenly in London on July 23, 1971, following a severe surgical operation.

TUCKER, CHARLES EUBANK (1896-), American bishop of the A.M.E. ZION CHURCH, was born in BALTIMORE, Md., Jan. 12, 1896, the son of William A. and Elvira (Clark) Tucker. In 1922 he married Amelia Moore. One daughter was born to this union, Bernice. He was educated at Beckford and Smith College, JAMAICA, B.W.I., completing this work in 1913. He attended Lincoln University in Pennsylvania, completing his work here in 1917, after which he attended Temple University for the next two years. He studied law under the Hon. Charles Gogg at Point Pleasant, Va. He began the practice of Criminal Law in LOUISVILLE, Ky., in 1929 and was a candidate for the Assembly of that state in 1933. He began pastoral work early in life serving the following churches: Middletown, Delta and Williamsport, Pa.; Hilliard Chapel, Montgomery, Ala.; Sharon, Miss.; Augusta, Ga.; Key West, Fla.; Stoner Memorial, Louisville, Ky.; Jones Temple, New Albany, Ind.; and as presiding elder in the Philadelphia and Baltimore Conference, the Kentucky Conference and the Indiana Conference. From this last assignment he was elected to the bishopric at Pittsburgh in 1956.

TUCKER, FRANK CORNELIUS (1892-), American historian and one of the leaders in MISSOURI Methodism, who has served important churches and districts in his conference including Francis Street, St. Joseph; Centenary, St. LOUIS; the St. Louis District; and the CAPE GIRARDEAU District. He was a member of eight GENERAL CONFERENCES (1930-1956), and of the General Board of EDUCATION (1934-1956). He was a determined advocate of the unification of the Methodist Churches from 1920 onward; and his wider ecumenical efforts brought him to the presidency of the Missouri State Council of Churches, and the Metropolitan Federation of Churches of St. Louis. A curator of CENTRAL METHODIST COLLEGE, he is presently Chairman of the Board.

Frank Tucker was born in Farmington, Mo., and was educated in Central Methodist College (A.B., D.D.) and the Divinity School of Yale University (B.D.). He married Elnora Lamar Cunningham and has two children, Frank C., Jr., and Elnora Elizabeth. He retired in 1960 and is the author of three histories: Old McKendree Chapel; The Methodist Church in Missouri, 1798-1939; and Central Methodist College, 110 Years. He has contributed several articles to this Encyclopedia. He resides in Cape Girardeau, Mo.

H. C. TUCKER

TUCKER, HUGH CLARENCE (1857-1956), American preacher and missionary to BRAZIL, was born in a two-room farmhouse near NASHVILLE, Tenn., on Oct. 4, 1857, the fourth of eleven children of deeply religious parents. Hugh Tucker joined the church at the age of thirteen. Eager for an education, he worked on his father's farm and on those of neighbors, did odd jobs, and one summer made a survey for the AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY. The day finally came when he rode horseback to Nashville to live with an older brother while he studied in the academic and Bible departments of VANDERBILT UNIVERSITY, where he graduated in 1879. He was received at once on trial in the TENNESSEE CONFERENCE and for several years served as circuit rider. By 1885, however, he had decided that he wanted to be a missionary.

As if in answer to this desire, he received a letter one day from the Board of Missions of the M.E. Church, South, saying that an English-speaking congregation in RIO DE JANEIRO, Brazil, was looking for a pastor. He must be single, as they could not afford a married man. Tucker gladly responded and with Bishop J. C. GRANBERY and daughter Ella, he sailed for Brazil, arriving there after twenty-six days, on July 4, 1886. When Bishop Granbery organized the Conference, Tucker was one of the three charter members. Thus began a long, varied, fruitful, and extraordinary career of service in Brazil.

A year or so later, Tucker accepted an additional position with the American Bible Society, which position he held for forty-seven years. He traveled to Brazil's cities, villages, and hinterland—on muleback, in oxcart, by canoe or steamboat up its rivers, by ship or train, and finally by plane. He trained colporteurs, preached the Gospel to thousands who had never heard the Word of God; distributed over the years, through the Bible Society, 2,500,000 copies of the Scriptures; prayed and begged until at last he secured funds for the building of a splendid nine-story Bible House in Rio de Janeiro. Though often in danger from accidents, wild animals, tropical diseases, and enemies of the Gospel, he was always miraculously saved.

His record of service for the Bible Society was matched by an amazing list of other activities. Tucker founded a mission for American and other seamen and was one of the founders of both the Evangelical and Strangers' Hospitals in Rio, was a member of the board of trustees of several Methodist colleges and other institutions: Tucker founded in Rio the INSTITUTO CENTRAL DO POVO (Peoples' Central Institute) in 1906—the first social service project of its kind in Brazil; and he also started the first public playground for children in Rio de Janeiro. He worked with the Federation of Evangelical Churches; with the Society for Combating Leprosy; and was the negotiator in the purchase of the COLEGIO BENNETT property in Rio.

Tucker was a delegate to the INTERNATIONAL MISSIONARY CONFERENCES of Edinburgh and Jerusalem, and to the Panama Conference on Christian Work in 1916. Four times he was a delegate to World SUNDAY SCHOOL Conventions. Nonofficially, he aided the Brazilian government in its campaigns against yellow fever and for the control of flies and mosquitoes. With all these multiple activities, Tucker found time to write numberless articles, a biography of the prominent Brazilian newspaper editor, José C. de Rodrigues, and in 1902 a book, The Bible in Brazil.

From SOUTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY in Texas, he received a D.D. degree in 1920; and later an LL.D. from RANDOLPH-MACON COLLEGE, Virginia. Helping him tirelessly in church and community activities was his wife, Ella, (known as Dona Elvira in Brazil), whom he had met aboard ship on his first trip to Brazil. They had two children, Elvira and Clarence. The latter died as a little boy, of yellow fever. Mrs. Tucker would meet incoming ships to welcome and help new missionaries and visitors to Brazil; she was a gracious hostess both to the distinguished and the humble. Hers was an unforgettable life of serving and blessing others. She died on Jan. 11, 1953, and was buried in the family plot in Petersburg, Va.

When Tucker was to retire to the United States in 1934, the government of Brazil honored him with the Order of the Southern Cross. After retirement he continued active, writing and speaking on Brazil. In November, 1953, at the age of ninety-six, he was given a trip to Brazil to attend the formal inauguration of a new building at the Peoples' Institute to be named in his honor. This service was attended by high dignitaries both of Brazil and the United States.

Hugh C. Tucker died on Nov. 4, 1956, at the age of ninety-nine in Media, Pa., at the home of his daughter. Survivors included this daughter, Mrs. L. A. Estes, and three grandsons. He was a world citizen, a true and worthy ambassador for Christ.

TUCSON, ARIZONA, U.S.A., population 265,000 is a popular health and winter resort. "Tucson" is the Spanish form of Papago name, Tuqui Son, meaning "black base" or "water at foot of black mountain." It was acquired by the United States in the Gadsden Purchase of 1853. Tucson is the home of the University of Arizona and the Davis-Monthan Air Force Base.

Arizona became a Territory in 1863. Tucson served as the capital from 1867 to 1877. The first Protestant ministers arrived in 1870, representing the M.E. Church. One was Chaplain Alexander Gilmore of the NEW JERSEY CONFERENCE assigned to Fort Whipple near Prescott. The other was Charles H. Cook of the ROCK RIVER CONFERENCE who, inspired by a series of magazine articles, reached Fort Bowie on his way to Pima Village to preach to the Indians. In 1872 Glezen Asbury Reeder of the NORTH OHIO CONFERENCE was appointed first superintendent of the Mission. In 1875 Rev. and Mrs. D. B. Wright arrived from New York and the first CAMP MEETING in the Territory was held in a mesquite grove near Tempe (thirty conversions reported). In 1877 Rev. and Mrs. J. J. Wingar and family came by covered wagon from KANSAS.

The appointment (1879) of George H. Adams of the COLORADO CONFERENCE to serve as superintendent brought about the organization of the ARIZONA Mission at a meeting in Tucson on July 8, 1881. Soon a four page quarterly, The Arizona Methodist, was being published. This was followed by an abortive attempt to establish Arizona Wesleyan University. In 1880 land was purchased in Tucson for the start of First Church. The second pastor appointed was JOSEPH F. BERRY who, for reasons of health, arrived on Sept. 30, 1882. Later elected to the episcopacy, Berry was for many years the senior bishop of the M.E. Church. Another pioneer Arizona pastor was M. M. BOVARD, named superintendent (1890-96), who later became the first president of the UNIVERSITY OF SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA.

The M.E. Church, South responded to the challenge of the new Territory when the Los Angeles Conference met in 1871 and appointed Alexander Groves as missionary to Arizona. Among the pioneer preachers was a school teacher from Missouri, L. J. Hedgpath, whose grandson, Herschel, was to serve as district superintendent for Arizona (1955-61), and who is currently on the staff of the National Division of the BOARD OF MISSIONS. Not until 1921, one year before Arizona became an Annual Conference, was any effort made to organize work in Tucson. J. C. MCPHEETERS (later pastor of Glide Church, SAN FRANCISCO, and president of ASBURY THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY) came from MONTANA (1922) to be the first pastor of what is now Catalina Church (see below), which is currently the largest church in the SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA-ARIZONA CONFERENCE. From the college department Margaret Billingsley went as a missionary to KOREA, later to serve as an executive secretary of the Board of Missions. Among the ministerial leadership of this day were J. E. Harrison, W. J. Sims, J. L. Lyons, S. Douglass Walters and E. Clyde Smith. Pioneer lay families of Southern Methodism have given two governors to the State, Sidney Osborn and Paul Fannin, the latter becoming a U.S. Senator.

The unification of Methodism greatly strengthened the work in Arizona. Abandoned appointments recall Methodism's march with the people in developing a vast and difficult Territory. Men like Paul F. Huebner, Frank S. Williams and Frank M. Toothaker maintained the tradition. In 1961 the State was divided into two administrative units. The Tucson District of the Southern California-Arizona Conference extends south from the city limits of PHOENIX. Chilton C. McPheeters was in time appointed superintendent and returned to his childhood home. Expansion continued with the acquisition of ten church sites, the start of seven new churches, and plant construction valued at over three million dollars. The twelve churches in Tucson reported in 1970 a membership of 8,985. The forty-seven churches in the District reported a total membership of 21,293. Tucson also has two C.M.E. CHURCHES, one A.M.E. CHURCH and one EVANGELICAL METHODIST congregation.

Catalina Church is the largest Methodist church in Arizona, numbering 3,681 members. It has become known for sponsoring a Sunday Evening Forum which is the largest in the nation. Originally it was known as University Church. Organized April 16, 1922, near the University of Arizona, it is now in its second location in Tucson functioning under its present name.

Prior to the organization of the University Church. W. J. Sims was appointed to open up work in Tucson and to serve as presiding elder of the Safford District. Property near the University of Arizona campus was purchased in 1921 for the development of the church. A charter membership of fifty persons constituted the church at its organization.

A Woman's Missionary Society was organized Sept. 14, 1922 with Mrs. L. E. Wyatt as president. George B. Pottorff, a layman with preaching experience, assisted Sims in the early days of the church. The first unit of the church was completed and occupied by the congregation on Feb. 1, 1924. A few months prior to this Julian C. McPheeters was appointed pastor, and led the congregation in a period of great growth and activity until 1930.

Catalina has proved missionary-minded from the very beginning. Miss Margaret Billingsley and Miss Grace Thatcher were among the first young people to commit themselves to full-time missionary service. Within two and a half years of its organization, the church had over 400 members and by the time it was five years old the number had grown to 735. During the first six years of its life, University Church licensed six young men for the ministry, led seven men to enter the Conference for full-time service and two others for missionary work.

Moffett Rhodes was appointed pastor in 1930, followed by Donald Householder in 1932 and R. C. Cantrell in 1936.

In 1942 the Fellowship Class of the church developed a discussion group which first met in the living room of the parsonage, outgrew that and then moved to the sanctuary, outgrew that and then moved to the high school auditorium, and finally to the auditorium at the University of Arizona. This activity came to be known as the Sunday Evening Forum and is now the largest forum of its kind in the United States, averaging more than 1,800 persons in attendance during the twenty-week season each year. Mary Jeffries Burt has been its director since its inception. The Sunday Evening Forum celebrated its twenty-fifth anniversary in 1967.

The missionary interest of the church inevitably led to the sponsorship and development of a community center in Tucson which has continued throughout the years. Maurice C. Ballenger was appointed pastor in 1942. During his ministry University Church established an outpost mission and moved to its present location at 2700 East Speedway Boulevard. The church assumed the name Catalina Church after moving to its new location. A complex of new buildings began to take shape at this site, first a barracks building, then the Fellowship Hall and administration unit, followed by the youth building, the sanctuary and the music building.

The city of Tucson grew rapidly during the decade of 1950 to 1960 and Catalina Church grew with it. Hayden S. Sears was appointed pastor in 1953 and during his tenure the church grew to more than 4,000 members, with a church school average attendance of more than 1,300 and a full choir program of twelve choirs, including more than 600 voices.

TULOVONI, SETAREKI (1916-), was the first president of the autonomous Methodist Church in Fiji within the fellowship of the Methodist Church of Australasia. He was born on Matuku, an island in the Lau Group of Fiji and was trained as a school teacher, but after war conditions had kept him in NEW ZEALAND where he endeavored to study, he suffered for a time tuberculosis in an advanced form. After his recovery, he commenced serious work in the ministry, and had larger and larger involvements in the general work of the Christian churches. The American Methodist Church offered him a scholarship so that he might study at DREW THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY in NEW JERSEY, and he returned to Fiji with a B.D. degree and in 1951 was appointed director of the Methodist Young People's Department. He had married in his home village during the period following his illness and his wife, Sera, has greatly helped him in his career. They have six children. In 1960 Queen Elizabeth II honored him by creating him a Member of the Order of the British Empire. In 1961 he was appointed a member of the executive committee of the Department of World Mission and Evangelism of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. For the past five years, Setareki Tulovoni has been executive secretary of the Pacific Conference of Churches, traveling throughout the entire Pacific area and exercising a progressive and stimulating influence on churches of all denominations. He represented the Pacific Churches at the INTERNATIONAL MISSIONARY COUNCIL at GHANA and at the Assembly of the World Council of Churches at UPPSALA.

TULSA, OKLAHOMA, U.S.A., a city of over 328,000 inhabitants and a metropolis of the South Central region of the United States. Over half a hundred churches and

BOSTON AVENUE CHURCH, TULSA, OKLAHOMA

Methodist institutions serve its Metropolitan area. The first Methodist Church there was the second religious organization founded in the city—in 1889. The present building is one of the finest examples of pure Gothic architecture in America.

The Boston Avenue Church, erected in 1925, was one of the first adaptations of modern architecture to church building. The edifice has drawn the admiration of architects from all over the world. Tourists go through the building daily.

The Tulsa churches are among the foremost in evangelistic endeavor and benevolent giving in the entire denomination. Four Methodist institutions are presently located in Tulsa; Methodist Manor for the Aged; Frances Willard Home for young women; WESLEY FOUNDATION at Tulsa University, and the GOODWILL INDUSTRY for the Handicapped.

Boston Avenue Church is one of the six largest churches in world Methodism, with a membership of 6,756. It is located in the heart of the city of Tulsa, sometimes called "The Oil Capital of the World," where sixteen percent of the population affirms a Methodist preference and where there are more college graduates, in proportion to the general population, than in any other city in the United States with a population of more than 200,000. Boston Avenue is one of fifty churches in the Wesleyan tradition in this city. Its unique architecture is said to be the first attempt on a major scale at unconventional or non-traditional design in the twentieth century. The entire building was designed by Adah Robinson, an art teacher at the University of Tulsa, who was assisted by a nineteen-year-old student who later became a famous architect. Atop the seventeen story spire is a tower chapel of prayer, but in the main sanctuary where all of the symbolism is indigenous (except the cross) one finds color, form, and other appointments blended in a circular room, affording a place of worship both unique and practical. The Italian glass mosaic behind the choir stalls contains over 700,000 individual pieces of Byzantine and Venetian tile. These, pointing to the cross through Osage Indian symbolism, speak a word of faith and strength. The church plant is valued at more than $6,000,000. Visitors find points of interest in the circuit rider statuary, the court to the Irish Methodist pioneers, the History and Archives Room depicting early Indian days with accompanying church history, and the Rose Chapel. There are two pipe organs in the building. The educational unit is said to be the second largest cantilevered building in the country at this time. Dr. FINIS A. CRUTCHFIELD, Jr. is presently senior minister and leads a staff of twenty-three full-time members, of whom four are ordained clergymen.

First Church is noted for its architectural excellence, as well as the strength and vigor of the congregation. In 1924 Bishop ERNEST L. WALDORF appointed Charles Drake Skinner of New York as pastor of First M.E. Church, Tulsa, to further a building program. He was the youngest clergyman to receive the D.D. degree from SYRACUSE UNIVERSITY except S. PARKES CADMAN. He sought advice from Bishop CHARLES H. FOWLER on building plans. Bishop Fowler said, "Only stone is suitable material from which to build a church to God." Bishop Waldorf and Skinner envisioned at that time for Tulsa the largest Gothic Cathedral in the Southwest, wishing it to be artistic, beautiful and useful. This was to be the third church of stone for Skinner to sponsor. This church was dedicated in 1928. The type of masonry is known as Range Ashlar. Masons hammered the rough, hard, variegated stone into shape for the two-foot thick walls. This stone does not absorb stains and is cleaned by weather action. Trim is of Indiana Limestone. The body of the church is cruciform and so appears both from interior and exterior views. Entering the sanctuary the eye is led by a procession of stone arches and traceried windows to the vaulted room and massive trusses of solid oak, then downward to the chancel of tile and marble to the great rich multi-colored window in the background. The stained glass windows, combined with the especially designed lighting fixtures with coronas of metal and open tracery work, is in keeping with ancient churches and the lighting effect is pure Gothic. A handsome chapel with seating capacity of 200 opens off the south transept. Adjoining the sanctuary is the four-story educational building which contains five auditoriums; it also houses the library and offices. The community hall on the lower level seats 1,200 and has facilities for seating and serving 400 people. The little formal garden in the courtyard is landscaped with shrubs of Bible nomenclature. When S. Parkes Cadman preached in the pulpit of the sanctuary he told the congregation, "This is the most beautiful church in the world but one, and I know them all."

Bishop W. ANGIE SMITH and Bishop PAUL E. MARTIN were consecrated at this church's altar in June 1944. A plaque commemorates the occasion. Heritage Hall, a two story masonry building acquired recently with twenty rooms now in use for Sunday school classes, brings the number of rooms in the church complex to over 100. The landscaped parking area with a foundation located across the Avenue is enclosed with a low rock wall from the same quarry as was used for the Cathedral.

The forerunner of this great church was an Indian Mission organized in Tulsa, Creek Nation, Indian Territory, in December 1886 by Wiley F. Bowden of the ARKANSAS CONFERENCE, under James Muttay in KANSAS, Superintendent of Indian Missions. In 1887 a note was signed to the CHURCH EXTENSION Society by a Delaware Indian and a Creek Indian woman and others for $500, one-half a gift. Services were held in the summer of 1887 under a brush arbor while church building progressed. This church was the first formally dedicated M.E. Church in the Indian Territory (Nov. 27, 1887). Population of the settlement then was about 100 Indians and whites. This little church had the honor of being the seat for the ninth and last session of the Indian Mission and the first session of the INDIAN MISSION CONFERENCE, with Bishop JOHN M. WALDEN presiding, March 21-23, 1889. This congregation built a larger structure of brick to keep up with this fast growing southwest frontier town, and this was dedicated on May 20, 1906, about one year before statehood.

First Church offers a variety of services to the traveling public, as well as to its own congregation and the large city. The 1970 membership was 3,531.

Frances E. Willard Home. This home for underprivileged girls has been a Methodist institution since 1958 when Mrs. Josephine M. Buhl, the founder and president of its Board of Directors, presented the forty acre tract and buildings of the Home to the OKLAHOMA CONFERENCE of The Methodist Church. Bishop W. Angie Smith formally accepted this property, valued at $350,000 for the Conference. It is located in the hill region of the old Osage Nation. The complex includes Willard House—the original residence—Buhl House, Mabee House, Lyons House and a superintendent's residence. The girls are from various areas and range in age from ten years through high school. They attend Tulsa public schools.

The start of this Home was in 1917 when Mrs. Buhl called a Woman's Christian Temperance Union meeting on Feb. 17, the birthday of FRANCES E. WILLARD, to found a home for needy girls (not delinquent). The first home was soon outgrown; a forty-acre tract was purchased southeast of town with brick and concrete buildings. Care of livestock and gardening was routine for the girls in addition to schooling. In 1955 this property, now encroached upon by the city, was sold to the Conference for a Methodist Manor, and the present Willard Home for girls was purchased. The Oklahoma Conference has carried forward a building program at the Manor, including a fifty-bed infirmary, nine cottages, and the new Lyons building housing 160 residents in all. These come from many parts of the country.

Wesley Foundation Student Center, adjacent to the campus of the University of Tulsa, serves out of town students primarily. A full time director offers counseling, Bible study, and communion services.

Memorial Drive Church began as a non-denominational Sunday school which met at 8310 East 15th Street in the Memorial Drive Community Center. In this non-denominational fellowship more than 400 attended Sunday school. The group did not have a minister; no worship services were held in the morning. A Vesper Service was held in the evening with approximately fifty-five persons in attendance.

Through the influence and encouragement of L. C. Clark, Chairman of the Tulsa District Board of Missions, land was purchased at 15th and 79th East Avenue for the purpose of organizing a Methodist church. Memorial Drive was the first project of the Tulsa District Board of Missions. Bishop W. Angie Smith appointed E. E. Holmberg to this situation on Sept. 28, 1950.

Twenty-six persons attended a first service in the pastor's home on April 19, 1951. On May 6, 1951 the first membership and organizational service was held at Will Rogers Church with forty-four persons as full members and twelve as preparatory members. The WOMAN'S SOCIETY OF CHRISTIAN SERVICE was organized May 3, 1951 with Mrs. W. E. Diron as president.

In April 1951 the Tulsa District Board of Missions pledged $20,000 to erect a new building. The opening service in the new building was on Sept. 23, 1951, with 164 in the Sunday school and 170 in the worship service.

On Sunday evening, June 24, 1951, the Community Sunday Evening Vesper Service, at which E. E. Holmberg had been presiding and preaching, was discontinued. Funds belonging to the Vesper Service congregation were divided equally between the Community Center and the Methodist church. The new church met on the parsonage lawn the first Sunday evening of July.

The first QUARTERLY CONFERENCE was held June 25, 1951, with H. BASCOM WATTS as district superintendent. E. E. Holmberg named the church, The Memorial Drive Methodist Church. Roger Prim was the treasurer. The Chairman of the Board, Joe Daugherty, was elected at an OFFICIAL BOARD meeting following the Quarterly Conference. Additional buildings have been constructed as needed. To date, total evaluation of all church property is in excess of $750,000. The church has continued to grow and in 1970 there was a membership of 2,046.

Oklahoma Methodist Home For The Aged, Inc. was established in 1956 on forty acres of land near the residential center of the city of Tulsa. The Home is owned and operated by the Oklahoma Conference of The United Methodist Church.

At the date of March 15, 1968, the Home had served a total of 334 members, with a present family of 152, its total capacity. There are cottages for completely independent living, apartments for semi-dependent living, private rooms for semi-dependent living, and fifty beds for the care of bed patients in the Health Center.

University Church is adjacent to the University of Tulsa. In March 1922, a broken down car and a muddy road prompted two families to hold Sunday school for their children in their own home. There the Johnsons and the Henrys began what is now University Church. Fourteen years later in 1936, having used first a tent, then a roughly constructed tabernacle, the congregation moved into the first unit of the present structure located at 5th and South College. Over a period of eleven years, 1933-44, the men of the church acquired a stone quarry, dug the stone, hauled them to the site, and, in many instances, put them in place to build a Gothic structure of rustic stone. After the first unit was built the men labored for two years building the seventy foot tower which they completed as "a testimony of faith" before beginning the sanctuary. The first two units and the tower were constructed and then a third unit consisting of a basement and three floors was completed on Dec. 17, 1950, and was dedicated by Bishop W. Angie Smith.

The original congregation was known as Kendall Methodist Church, which was then the name of the University of Tulsa. In 1929 the Grace Church sold its property and united with the Kendall Church to constitute what is now the University Church. The membership in 1970 was 2,507.

Will Rogers Church is named after the famous Will Rogers of Oklahoma and is located in the area of Tulsa that is now called the Will Rogers Area. The litany of its consecration service was led by Will Rogers, Jr., when the church was consecrated.

In the fall of 1943, eight dedicated Methodists, with no place to meet but a family home, took the first preliminary steps toward organizing this church. Its charter was given on Easter Sunday, 1944, with fifty-two members uniting with the church. Within a period of fifteen years, two fine educational buildings, a chapel, and sanctuary seating over 900 people, had been constructed. In the past ten years, four additional plots of real estate have been added to the church, including two new parsonages, and two houses that are being used for church school classes. Three of these plots of property are adjacent to the present church property.

Will Rogers Church has been a church of service both inside and outside the church building itself, and has been unusually blessed with an exceptional number of able laymen and women. During its short history, eight persons have gone into full-time work of the church.

In 1970 the church had a membership of 2,672, property valued at over $700,000, two well attended services on Sunday morning, ten choirs, four bell choirs, and over 300 young people participating in the youth program.

TUNNICLIFFE, JOHN (-1948), Methodist layman in CALIFORNIA. An orphan in County Sligo, IRELAND, he was apprenticed to the keeper of a general store. He came to SAN FRANCISCO empty-handed. By hard work and careful management he built up a successful grocery chain in that city. Then his physicians called a halt. He must play golf. Instead he began to walk the streets of Grace Church parish in the Mission District for his church. Increasing his activity year by year, he walked into the councils of the Annual and the GENERAL CONFERENCES. In 1924 he was appointed Western Representative of the Board of Foreign Missions (ME). For twenty years he gave full time volunteer service. He met steamers, secured and forwarded supplies, and raised three-quarters of a million dollars for the Board. Having no children, his estate was divided between home and foreign missions and the retired ministers. He lavished a gracious personality on Kingdom goals.

TUNSTALL, England, is the most northern of the former six towns of the potteries, Staffordshire, England, now united as the city of Stoke on Trent. In the early nineteenth century Tunstall was the center of the PRIMITIVE METHODIST revival movement associated with the name of WILLIAM CLOWES, who was himself born there, and who was the leader of a group which was at first called the Clowesites, but soon became one of the formative elements in Primitive Methodism itself. The first written plan of the new Primitive Methodist denomination was issued from Tunstall in 1811, as the head of a circuit extending into four counties, Staffordshire, Cheshire, Derbyshire, and Lancashire. The first Primitive Methodist chapel was set up at Tunstall in 1811 and consisted of two cottages transformed into a meetinghouse. The second Conference of the METHODIST NEW CONNEXION was held there in 1821 and so was the Jubilee Conference of 1860.

TURNER, HENRY McNEAL (1834-1915), American founder and organizer of the A.M.E. CHURCH in the state of GEORGIA, and in West and South Africa, was born near Newberry, S. C. on Feb. 1, 1834, of free parents. He was educated at Trinity College, BALTIMORE, Md. Turner was licensed to preach in 1853 by the M.E. Church, South. In 1858 he was admitted to the Missouri Conference, ordained DEACON in 1860 and ELDER in 1862. Following a brief career in the pastorate he received an appointment from President Abraham Lincoln as U. S. Army CHAPLAIN. He served as presiding elder in Georgia and as founder-editor of Southern Recorder, 1882.

Turner was a leader of considerable influence in both church and state. Beginning with his bishopric (1880-1915), there was a shift of power in his Connection from North to South. An advocate of African colonization for the Negro, his position of influence greatly aided that ill-fated movement. He rightly deserves the title of Father of the church of Africa, as he organized it in SIERRA LEONE, LIBERIA and SOUTH AFRICA. Bishop Turner died at Windsor, Canada, on May 9, 1915.

TURNER, NATHANIEL (1793-1864), New Zealand Methodist minister, was born at Wednesbury, England, and entered the ministry in 1821. He was appointed to NEW ZEALAND and arrived at Wesleydale (Whangaroa) in 1823 with his wife, just as Samuel Leigh was forced to leave through ill health. Work proved difficult, and the Maoris were unresponsive. Early in 1827, the station was destroyed by hostile Maoris, and the Turners, along with other missionaries, were forced to flee for their lives. Turner was next appointed to the Friendly Islands (Tonga) and after that to Hobart. From there he returned to New Zealand as chairman in 1836, until succeeded by John H. Bumby. After terms in Tasmania and NEW SOUTH WALES, he died in Brisbane on Dec. 5, 1864.

TURNER, PETER (18? -1873), British Methodist missionary pioneer to the South Seas, was born in MANCHESTER, England, about the beginning of the nineteenth century and entered the Wesleyan ministry in 1829, leaving for Polynesia the following year. His twenty-three years of service were outstanding in length and quality. From 1830-36 and, again, 1841-54, he spent in the FRIENDLY ISLANDS, during the last period sharing in the great revival which swept the islands. In 1836-41 he pioneered Wesleyan missionary work in SAMOA, at the request of Friendly Islanders who were at work there, but after considerable inter-mission difficulties, the Wesleyan work was in part handed over to the London Missionary Society, and in part recommenced by the Australian Methodist Conference. In 1854 Turner returned to NEW SOUTH WALES, and died at Windsor, AUSTRALIA, Nov. 2, 1873.

TURTON, H. HANSON (1818-1887), New Zealand minister, was born at Bradford, England, where his father, Isaac Turton, was a Wesleyan minister. He was ordained in 1839, and arrived in NEW ZEALAND on the mission vessel "Triton" on May 8, 1840. After some months spent at Mangungu, Turton went in 1841 to open the Aotea station. In 1844, he was appointed to Ngamotu, Nev Plymouth, where he stayed ten years. While travelling along the coast to take up work at Ngamotu, the whole Turton family almost lost their lives, when cut off by the tide.

Turton founded a Maori training center at Ngamotu, which was named the Grey Institute (in honour of Governor George Grey). "He distinguished himself subsequently," writes Morley (p. 83), "by a public controversy with Bishop Selwyn (first Anglican bishop of New Zealand) on 'Sacerdotal Assumptions,' and had not the worst of the argument." Short appointments followed at Kawhia (1857) and Manukau (1858).

In 1858, Turton retired from the ministry and commenced business as a house and general agent. Later he became an interpreter in government service. He represented New Plymouth in Parliament during 1863 and 1864, and then resigned in order to act as commissioner to investigate Maori land titles under the New Zealand settlements act. He worked for the Native Department in Wellington from 1874 to 1883, and died on Sept. 18, 1887.

TURTON, WILLIAM (1761-1818), British Methodist pioneer missionary in the WEST INDIES, was born in Barbados, and converted under THOMAS COKE, 1788, becoming a Methodist preacher. Apart from a brief visit to America, when he preached in Long Island churches, Turton's whole distinguished career was in his own islands. In 1795 he pioneered in TOBAGO; in 1796 he worked in the Swedish island of St. Bartholomew; in 1799 he became the first pioneer in the Bahamas at Turks Island and Nassau. When James Rutledge was appointed his colleague, he spent his time in the "out-islands." Turton was appointed chairman and general superintendent of the Bahamas District and found additional opportunity of pioneering in Rock Sound, Eleuthera, Abaco, etc. He died, after twenty years of hard service, much of it in new areas, on May 7, 1818, at Nassau.

TUSCALOOSA, ALABAMA, U.S.A. First Church was founded in 1818 by EBENEZER HEARN. Tuscaloosa was the focal point of the CIRCUIT which then covered an area from forty to sixty miles wide and roughly 200 miles long. The time of its founding was very significant—ALABAMA was just becoming a state. LAZENBY gives three reasons for the rapid growth and the fine type of Methodism produced within the bounds of this circuit. First, "the circuit was served by far-seeing and consecrated men"; second, "this section was settled by men of high character"; and third, Tuscaloosa early became the locale of culture and the home of Sims Female Academy, and of the University of Alabama. In January 1826, the legislature moved the capital of the state to Tuscaloosa, which was already the seat of Tuscaloosa County.

Tuscaloosa became a station in 1824. It was at that time an appointment of the MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE as was much of western Alabama. John Kesterson was its first station pastor. The ALABAMA CONFERENCE was organized later in Tuscaloosa in 1832. In 1870 First Church became a member of the newly organized NORTH ALABAMA CONFERENCE. Under the leadership of some of the ablest men of Methodism, both laymen and preachers, the Tuscaloosa church has played a vital part in the progress of Methodism and the Kingdom throughout the years. The record shows that four men who later became bishops had served First Church, Tuscaloosa; ROBERT PAINE, 1820-21; JOHN C. KEENER, 1845-46; J. H. MCCOY, 1895-97; CLARE PURCELL, 1924-26. Two laymen of the church have served as governor of the State of Alabama, Henry W. Collier and William W. Brandon. J. H. CHITWOOD had a long and distinguished pastorate in this church, and was a member of the JUDICIAL COUNCIL, as well as its pastor when he died in 1966.

In 1824, as it became a station, Bishop SOULE held the Mississippi Conference in Tuscaloosa. This was the second Annual Conference held in Alabama. Tuscaloosa First Church is presently, with its 1,594 members (1970), the center of a metropolitan area of twelve Methodist churches having an enrollment of over 6,000 members. The Tuscaloosa District is one of the twelve districts of the North Alabama Annual Conference.

GEORGE F. COOPER

TUSKEGEE, ALABAMA, U.S.A. Butler Chapel. In the year 1865 when the Negro slaves were freed, some were anxious to own their homes. In the ALABAMA community now known as Zion Hill were a few scattered houses which had been occupied by former slave holders. These were purchased by Negroes. There was also a one-room log cabin that had been used as a schoolhouse. This was used as a meeting place and schoolhouse by Zion Hill's new residents. They were taught by white teachers. With the settling of the Negro families, the whites began to move out. The most of the homes bought by Negroes were sold to them by a man named Phelps.

It was in this settlement that Butler Chapel A.M.E. ZION CHURCH was organized during the fall of 1865 by Rev. J. M. Butler. Butler had been sent to Tuskegee by Bishop JOSEPH J. CLINTON from the First Alabama (AMEZ) Conference, held in MOBILE. The first church was built in 1867. It was renovated and extended in 1869 and 1875. The plans were made in 1887 for a new edifice. Improvements to this church have been made during various administrations.

J. M. Butler was succeeded by Solomon Derry, who was also Macon County's first Negro teacher.

R. F. Thweatt was the first superintendent of Butler Chapel's Sunday school. He was succeeded by Lewis Adams who held this position until his death, April 30, 1905. Adams' death came suddenly on Sunday morning near the end of the Sunday school when he collapsed at the altar.

During these early years, Adams operated a shop where tin utensils were made. He was a skilled craftsman in metals. He never had any formal training, but his owners had taught him to read and write. His training as a mechanic was also learned while in slavery. Later, he opened a shop in the town of Tuskegee where he made shoes, harness and tinware. Lewis Adams was not only resourceful, but was interested in improving his church and community. He dreamed of industrial education for his people, and was alert to every opportunity to translate his dreams into reality. He was the leader of his people. During this period Negroes in the vicinity were voting without restriction. Adams was approached by one Colonel Foster, and A. L. Brooks. Both sought the support of the Negro voters during their campaign. Adams pledged to them his support with the understanding that if elected they would use their influence to help establish a normal school for Negroes in Tuskegee. Both men were elected; Colonel Foster to the State Senate and Brooks to the House of Representatives. At the request of Senator Foster, Brooks introduced a bill asking for an appropriation of $2,000 to pay the salaries of teachers for a Normal School for Colored to be located at Tuskegee. No provision was made, however, for land, building, or equipment. These were to be furnished by persons who would benefit from the school. After the bill was passed, the next step was to secure a teacher. Adams was appointed to the committee that would make this selection. Requests were sent to Talladega and Selma, Ala., and to Atlanta, Ga., and Hampton, Va., for recommendations. Booker T. Washington, having been recommended by General Armstrong of Hampton, was agreed upon, and was destined to earn world renown in what he did in Tuskegee during the subsequent years.

When Washington arrived at Tuskegee, he went first to the office of George Campbell, the chairman of the committee that had made selection of him. Campbell sent Washington to Adams, who arranged for his lodging and the use of Butler Chapel's facilities for the beginning of his work. So it was that on July 4, 1881, the Tuskegee Normal School was established.

The membership of Butler Chapel and the community were proud of the contribution that it had been able to make toward the establishment of this institution. And during its formative years they assisted the school by sponsoring suppers, festivals and making contributions of money as far as they were able.

As the school grew, the demand for skilled labor was in evidence. Adams closed his business to become a part of the school where he taught his trades.

Among its many contributions, Butler Chapel entertained the first meeting of the Bishop's Council of the A.M.E. Zion Church ever to be held in the South. The pews that are now in use in the church were built at Tuskegee Institute, and installed for this meeting.

Butler Chapel has always enjoyed a creditable ministry. J. T. McMillan was the first pastor to serve for an entire quadrennium. He was followed by such noble clergymen as C. W. Turns, D. C. Pope, William A. Stewart and many others. Two of these former pastors are now bishops: D. C. Pope and WILLIAM A. STEWART.

During the year of 1939, William E. Carson was appointed to this charge. His ministry, lasting over a seventeen-year period, was a most constructive one. Many improvements were made to the church, and the membership grew to the point that Butler Chapel is now the first appointment in the Alabama Conference. Also during Carson's administration an Alabama marble marker was placed on the spot where Washington taught his first classes. The church has continued to make progress and with the cooperation of the membership has grown to even greater proportions. K. L. Buford succeeded W. E. Carson in 1956.

In honor of the work of Booker T. Washington, who from such an humble beginning gave to the world Tuskegee Institute, and Lewis Adams, whose love for his church, his community, and his people, helped to make Washington's work in Tuskegee possible, The Booker T. Washington-Lewis Adams Memorial Building has been erected.

Tuskegee United Methodist Church was organized in 1835 at Tuskegee. The town itself was named in honor of Creek Chief, Tuskegee. General Thomas Woodward, whose wife was a Methodist, built the first house at Tuskegee. The first court house, made of logs, was used in 1835 as a preaching place. Later a schoolhouse was used by the Methodists and others for religious worship. In 1841 the Methodists completed a house of worship and through the years the church has been kept up and supported by the white families living in Tuskegee. At present the congregation worships in a churchy building and the last reported membership was 343.

TWENTIETH CENTURY FUND. A scheme inaugurated at the British Wesleyan CONFERENCE of 1898 to raise "one million guineas from one million Methodists" by the beginning of the new century. It was to be allocated as follows: 300,000 pounds for general building developments, 250,000 pounds for building Westminster central buildings, 200,000 pounds for education, 100,000 pounds for home missions, 100,000 for overseas missions, and 50,000 pounds for the National Children's Home. It was completed by 1902, and the historic roll of a million signatures is deposited at the Westminster Central Hall.

TYERMAN, LUKE (1820-1889), British Wesleyan Methodist, was a notable Methodist historian. He was born on Feb. 26, 1820, at Osmotherley, near Thirsk, Yorkshire, and entered the Wesleyan Ministry in 1844. A Methodist preacher of the old school, he was particularly intense in his attacks on popery. Ill health forced him to superannuate in 1864, and he devoted the rest of his life to his scholarship.

Although much had been written about eighteenth-century Methodism before his time, Tyerman was the first historian to produce serious, scholarly biographies of JOHN WESLEY, GEORGE WHITEFIELD, and JOHN FLETCHER (the "designated successor"). Tyerman's life of John Wesley has only been superseded in recent years, and there is still no other important study of Fletcher. He might properly be called the father of modern historical studies. His publications included: Life and Times of the Rev. Samuel Wesley, 1866; Life and Times of the Rev. John Wesley, 1871; The Oxford Methodists, 1873; Life of the Rev. George Whitefield, 1876-77; Wesley's Designated Successor, 1882. He died on March 30, 1889.

TYLER, JAMES (1877-1952), prominent Methodist layman of AUCKLAND, New Zealand, was connected as a young man with the Helping Hand Mission. Later he joined Pitt Street Church and, after serving for some years as Sunday school superintendent, he transferred to the Mount Eden Church where he occupied a similar position. Altogether he served fifty years as a Sunday school superintendent.

As a young man he joined the engineering staff of the Auckland City Council and supervised the construction of such major works as Grafton Bridge and the Waitakere Dam. He rose to the position of city engineer, where he served fifteen years.

During retirement he was a most valued member of many official boards, and gave special service to the Overseas Mission Department. He was elected vice-president of Conference in 1946.

TYLER, TEXAS, U.S.A. Marvin Church is the historic downtown church and a famous landmark of the city. The church was first organized in 1845 as First Methodist and located on a lot not far from the present site.

The cornerstone of the present building was laid in 1890 and inscribed "M.E. Church South, Erected 1890," indicating the church fathers were contemplating a new name for the church. In 1891 the church was named Marvin Methodist Church in honor of Bishop ENOCH MARVIN, then presiding bishop over the EAST TEXAS CONFERENCE. Marvin Church was completed and first occupied in early 1892. It was then known as the cathedral church west of the Mississippi and is still an imposing structure with its steeples, tall roof lines and spires. The handsome colored glass picture windows are the originals depicting many biblical scenes, characters and Christian symbols.

In June 1898 the church was sold to satisfy a mortgage. Mrs. John Douglas bought the property and rented it to the congregation for twelve months and it was then bought back by the congregation in 1899. The sanctuary was remodeled in 1950, making it more useful for present day worship; but none of the original structural lines were changed. The auditorium now seats 986 persons comfortably. A beautiful chapel and educational building were added at this time. Also several additional city lots were purchased and a youth center was built to add to facilities and activities of the church. In 1970 Marvin Church had a membership of 2,530 persons.

TYREE, EVANS (1854-1921), American bishop of the A.M.E. CHURCH, was born in DeKalb County, Tenn., on Aug. 19, 1854, as a slave. He received the A.B. degree from Centenary Tennessee College and the M.D. degree from MEHARRY MEDICAL COLLEGE. He was converted in 1866, licensed to preach in 1869 and admitted to the Tennessee Annual Conference in 1872. He was ordained a DEACON in 1875 and an ELDER in 1876. He held all of his pastorates in TENNESSEE. He was elected bishop in 1900 from the pastorate of St. John's, NASHVILLE. He served in the southwestern part of the United States. Bishop Tyree was one of three A.M.E. bishops holding medical degrees in his generation.

U BA OHN (1918-), president of the Conference of the Methodist Church in Upper BURMA, was born July 6, 1918, in Magyo village, Chaungu Township, Monywa District of Upper Burma. His father was a converted Muslim and after a time became head of a Methodist elementary school.

U Ba Ohn's early years were spent in this school at the Ma-u-ale-ywa village in the Pakokku District. At the age of ten he went into the Wesley Anglo-Vernacular High School at Monywa as a hostel student. His father died when he was fourteen years old, and he went into the employment of the Burma Oil Company to support his widowed mother and family. He married at the age of twenty while in the employ of the Burma Oil Company, but later became interested in the studies of the Bible and became a local preacher. During the second World War, he and his wife moved to his wife's village to take refuge and there under the Japanese occupation endeavored to hold together the scattered groups of Christians and also hold services of worship. After the war, on May 30, 1947, he resigned from the Burma Oil Company and went into the Theological Training Institution of the Methodist Church in Mandalay. He was accepted in 1950 as a probationary minister and sent to Pakokku. He later went into full connection and was ordained in January, 1954. In 1964 he became chairman of the Mandalay District. When the Methodist Church in Upper Burma became an autonomous body, he was elected as the first president of the Methodist Conference. His term as president ended in November, 1970, but he continues at work in Upper Burma.

UDGIR, a town in the Osmanabad Civil District in Maharashtra, INDIA, is the headquarters of an ecclesiastical district of the same name in the BOMBAY ANNUAL CONFERENCE. Methodist work in and around the town was started in 1932 as a home missionary project by the churches of the Bombay Conference. The area was selected because of its proximity to the Bidar District of the SOUTH INDIA CONFERENCE, in which a strong movement had produced many converts and a vigorous upsurge of Christian worship and witness. The group that was turning to Christ was known as Madigas, and their language was Kanarese. But their relatives in Osmanabad District were called Mahars, and their language is Marathi. They were essentially the same people, with a common origin, common social institutions, and a depressed position in the social system and economy of their villages.

In 1942 Udgir was made a district headquarters. The total Methodist community was 301, but there were many seekers. The district now reports more than 5,000 Methodists, including baptized children. The revival movement conquered the barriers of language.

Education and healing are emphasized among these people. The literacy rate among Christians was only two percent in 1942. In 1966 it was thirty-one percent, despite the fact that almost all converts are illiterate until they make contact with the church. A coeducational boarding school, with the Hindi name Prakashalaya (Place of Light), has produced twenty-one teachers, nine pastors, two doctors, eight nurses, two laboratory technicians, a pharmacist, a secretary, a paramedical organizer of leprosy treatment, eleven machinists, five motor mechanics, and many who are profitably employed in other useful work. More slowly, a medical service is being developed. Five centers for medical service have been opened. A survey has revealed a larger incidence of leprosy than had been estimated, as high as five percent in some villages.

A self-help program is digging new wells, improving housing, and introducing smokeless chimneys, ventilation, and sanitation, and is constructing roads.

UMBREIT, SAMUEL J. (1871-1945), American Evangelical missionary, bishop, editor, was born Feb. 22, 1871 in Manchester, Wis. He studied at NORTH CENTRAL COLLEGE where he received the Ph.B. and Ph.M. degrees. He was licensed to preach in the Illinois Conference of the EVANGELICAL ASSOCIATION in 1895, and ordained ELDER in 1905. He served several pastorates in WISCONSIN before being appointed missionary to JAPAN in 1905. He was district superintendent in the Japanese Conference for fifteen years and Mission Superintendent for thirteen. In the later office he also served as Superintendent for three years of the newly established CHINA Mission.

In 1926 the GENERAL CONFERENCE elected him bishop with residence in Europe. He served eight years at this post until the European bishopric was discontinued. The GENERAL CONFERENCE then elected him editor of the German periodical, Der Christliche Botschafter, the oldest publication in the denomination and the oldest German religious weekly paper in the United States. Although he retired in 1942, he continued to edit this paper by special arrangement until his death in Harrisburg, Pa., Jan. 27, 1945.

While serving in Japan, Umbreit was a member for several years of the faculty of the Aoyama Gakuin Theological Seminary, a Methodist institution. EVANGELICAL SEMINARY conferred upon him the D.D. degree. In addition to editorial duties Umbreit wrote several books. Two of these in Japanese were From Darkness to Light and Three Conversions. One book was written in German, Twenty Years in Japan.

June 29, 1899, he married Miss Amanda Bauernfeind, sister of the well-known Evangelical missionary, Dr. SUSAN BAUERNFEIND. Following her death in 1937 he married Mrs. Anna M. Kolb. He was acquainted with outstanding religious leaders of the Orient and Europe and had come to possess a global-minded spirit that lifted him above anything partisan and sectarian.

UMPQUA ACADEMY, Wilbur, Oregon, was established in 1854. It was sometimes referred to as Wilbur Academy. At the organizing session of the OREGON CONFERENCE of 1853, Bishop E. R. AMES appointed JAMES H. WILBUR to the Umpqua Mission, as superintendent of the work in southern OREGON. He established his headquarters by taking a land claim, building a residence, and erecting a log schoolhouse.

In 1854 J. H. B. Royal was appointed the first principal. About that time the school moved to a new and more imposing building, high above the surrounding valley where it could be seen for several miles. Incorporation was in 1857, and for many years this was the only school of its grade between SACRAMENTO, Calif., and SALEM, Ore.

The building burned in 1873. The trustees decided to locate at a new site a half mile from the center of the village, and there a commodious building was erected. In 1881 the enrollment was 130. There was no further report to the conference until 1884. Only two terms had been taught during that year, and there was no principal. In 1887, the last year in which reports were made, the institution was free of debt, but the enrollment was only ninety-nine. The work of the academy was being superseded by the public schools. It was voted June 30, 1888, to lease the premises to the public school district for ten years for $500.

On Oct. 30, 1900, a resolution was adopted to sell to the district for $400. The building no longer remains.

UNGARETTI, ADOLFO MELCHIOR (1855-1943), Brazilian preacher, was born in Cachoeira do Sul, state of Rio Grande do Sul (then a province), on Jan. 6, 1855. He was the son of Italian parents who had emigrated to BRAZIL when quite young. His name appears first in Methodist annals in 1904, when he was licensed to exhort and named assistant to Mateo Donatt, for work among Italian colonists in Rio Grande do Sul.

In 1906 he entered INSTITUTO GRANBERY as a ministerial candidate. After returning to his native state in 1910, he taught briefly at a school in Uruguaiana, founded by Aleixo Vurld, an evangelical Frenchman. This school was soon acquired by the Methodist church and renamed Colegio União, now INSTITUTO UNIÃO. There Ungaretti met and in 1912 married Luiza Vurld, daughter of the school's founder; and they had seven children, of whom Erasmo, the youngest and only son, became a distinguished Methodist minister. The eldest daughter married JOSÉ PEDRO PINHEIRO, a Methodist preacher who in 1955 was elected bishop of the church. The other daughters became active in Christian work.

Ungaretti was admitted on trial in 1913; received his first appointment that year to Cruz Alta; and in 1915 was ordained ELDER. While pastor in Cruz Alta, he visited many adjacent areas, founding churches in Palmeira das Missões, São Gabriel (on the border with URUGUAY), and Caxias do Sul—a region populated by Italian colonists, where he suffered severe persecution at the hands of the fanatics and Roman Catholic clergy. He also served in important city charges—Alegrete, Uruguaiana, the Institutional Church in PORTO ALEGRE, and in SANTA MARIA.

While pastor in Santa Maria, he founded in 1939 the Lar Metodista (Methodist Home) for orphans and abandoned children. In this project his wife, Dona Luiza, gave great assistance. He died in 1943, while pastor of Gloria Church in Porto Alegre, at the age of fifty-nine; thirty years of these he had given to the Master's cause in South Brazil.

UNIFICATION OF AMERICAN METHODISM. The Protestant Reformation's emphasis on the priesthood of all believers and the right of the individual to think for himself has resulted in a process of division and subdivision in Protestant history. Both in England and in North America the Methodist people followed this usual Protestant pattern. Within fifty years after the death of JOHN WESLEY there were several Methodist churches in the British Isles. These separate churches sent organizers to areas of the British Empire, and in the colonies in time were to be found the same churches as in the home land. The WESLEYAN METHODIST CHURCH, and the PRIMITIVE METHODIST CHURCH, planted in the United States by their mother churches in Great Britain, are still in existence in the United States, in spite of union movements on both sides of the Atlantic.

Several divisions took place in the M.E. Church previous to the great one of 1844. These are described in the article on the M.E. Church. A different issue presented itself in 1844. Then the SLAVERY issue was agitating the whole country. When the GENERAL CONFERENCE of the M.E. Church met, it had before it two cases involving this issue. Francis A. Harding of the BALTIMORE CONFERENCE had been suspended without trial, by a vote of his Conference, for holding slaves. He had married a young woman who owned five slaves, and the laws of MARYLAND forbade the freeing of these or any slaves. He appealed his case to the General Conference, and that body voted two to one to sustain the Baltimore Conference in its suspension of Harding.

The other case attracted far more attention because it involved a bishop. Bishop JAMES O. ANDREW of GEORGIA had been willed a slave whom he was to send to LIBERIA when she became of age. She refused to go and the laws of Georgia did not permit the freeing of slaves. Also Bishop Andrew had married a woman who owned slaves. He followed every legal way to make these slaves solely his wife's, and not his own property. This was to no avail, and since a Methodist bishop was a slave holder, what was to be done? Bishop Andrew was popular throughout the Church, admittedly a gentle, good, kind man. The General Conference after long and heated debate voted by a vote of two to one that Bishop Andrew should "desist" from the exercise of his office. The debate was acrimonious, and finally a committee was appointed which recommended a PLAN OF SEPARATION. This Plan was adopted, and the M.E. Church, South, subsequently organized.

It was decided a few years later that both bodies (the M.E. and M.E. South) came from the same Church and that each was as much entitled as the other to claim that it was a continuation of the mother church. Since the United States was soon involved in war between the North and the South, it seems to have been a wise decision that was made by the General Conference of 1844. The M.E. Church could better serve the North, and the M.E. Church, South, the South in the years of strife. It was to be almost 100 years before the two main currents of American Methodism came together again under a PLAN OF UNION adopted by a constitutional vote in both Churches and their UNITING CONFERENCE convened in KANSAS CITY in 1939.

The Southern delegates at the General Conference of 1844 called a Convention in LOUISVILLE, May 1, 1845, and that Convention set the first General Conference for May 1, 1846 at PETERSBURG, Va. This was the beginning of the M.E. Church, South. As the Civil War came, there was a growing tendency in the North to refer to the Plan of Separation as a document of secession, and the M.E. Church, South, as a secession church. From the day of the setting up of the Southern Church, there were very decided differences between the two sections in their understanding of the authority of the General Conference.

In 1848, four years after the separation, a representative of the M.E. Church, South, the distinguished LOVICK PIERCE of Georgia, went to the General Conference of the M.E. Church at PITTSBURGH as a fraternal messenger, but that Conference refused to receive him. The southern General Conference of 1850 therefore passed a resolution that no fraternal gesture would be made again from their side until the M.E. Church should take the initiative in asking for one. That initiative was taken in 1869.

The bishops of the M.E. Church, South, were in session in ST. LOUIS during May of 1869 when Bishops E. S. JAMES and MATTHEW SIMPSON appeared before them with a communication from the bishops of the M.E. Church. The message contained these sentences: "It is fitting that the Methodist Church which began with disunion should not be the last to achieve the reunion which the providence of God seems to render inevitable at no distant date." The bishops, who came as messengers of good will, had been instructed to discuss with their Southern brethren, "propriety, practicality and methods of reunion."

The bishops of the M.E. Church, South, in their reply, expressed their deep satisfaction in receiving the overture, but called attention to some of the controversies and disputes over boundaries that had arisen in preceding years. The General Conference of the M.E. Church in 1868 had authorized the appointment of a Commission to negotiate for union with other Methodist bodies. The year 1872 saw the renewal—or beginning—of the exchange of fraternal messages, and to the General Conference of the Southern Church in Louisville in 1874 came three fraternal messengers from the M.E. Church. Their addresses stirred enthusiasm and warmed hearts. Fraternal delegates were thereupon sent from the South to the Northern General Conference of 1876. The most important action of that General Conference was the appointment of a Commission of Five to meet with a similar commission, authorized by the previous session of the Southern Conference in 1874. The two Commissions were authorized to do what they could to remove obstacles to union. These two Commissions met in Cape May, N. J., Aug. 17-23, 1876. A tablet unveiled at Cape May within quite recent years serves to emphasize for today's Methodists the importance of the CAPE MAY COMMISSION.

At the Cape May meeting the first business was the passing of this resolution: "Each of said churches is a legitimate branch of Episcopal Methodism in the United States, having a common origin in the Methodist Episcopal Church organized in 1784." The Commission then considered many conflicting claims and made certain adjustments. Before adjournment it adopted rules for the settlement of claims in the future.

Later action by the two General Conferences made final the conclusion in the resolution adopted by the Cape May meeting, and there was removed the stigma of secession from the M.E. Church, South.

In 1888 the General Conference of the M.E. Church, South passed a historic motion that a Commission on Federation of Methodism be appointed, composed of three bishops, three other ministers and three laymen, to act with a like Commission of the M.E. Church, with a "view to abating hurtful competitions, and the waste of men and money in home and foreign fields." The Joint Commission met in WASHINGTON, D.C., Jan. 7-8, 1898. This meeting decided on the preparation of "a common catechism, a common hymn-book, and a common order of worship." Both General Conferences approved. Joint Commissions were appointed.

The mission work in BRAZIL and CUBA was allocated to the Southern Church, and that in PUERTO RICO and the PHILIPPINES to the Northern Church. A common publishing house was established in CHINA.

In 1907 the two Churches and the Methodist Church of CANADA united in the setting up of the Methodist Church of JAPAN. The Joint Commission in its meeting at BALTIMORE, April 18, 1906 decided to organize the Federal Council of Methodism. Both General Conferences approved this decision. One of the phrases which disturbed the Church, South, was "reunion of the churches." Reunion seemed to imply the coming back, or return to a former status. Union could come only in the organization of a new governmental structure.

In 1908 the General Conference of the M.E. Church authorized the appointment of a fraternal deputation to visit the General Conference of the METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCH, inviting consultations with them on union. The M.P. General Conference responded cordially but proposed that the M.E. Church, South be invited to the discussions. THOMAS H. LEWIS, President of the M.P. General Conference, visited the Southern Methodist General Conference in 1910, and created great enthusiasm for union. The Commission of the M.E. Church then issued a statement "tendering a brotherly invitation to the Commissions of the other two churches to consider with us at this time the desirability and practicability of organic union." That action really started the negotiations that never ceased until union was consummated.

Each Commission representing one of the three Methodist Churches decided on a joint Committee of Nine, three from each Commission, to prepare a suggested plan for discussion. This Committee met in Cincinnati, Jan. 18-20, 1911. Each member of the Committee set forth in a paper or address his conclusions regarding plans for a united Church. The Committee of Nine suggested two names for this church—the "Methodist Episcopal Church in America," or the "Methodist Church in America." This and other proposals were considered by the Joint Commission. This approved the report of the Committee of Nine with two important additions: "We suggest that the colored membership of the Methodist Episcopal Church, the Methodist Protestant Church, and such organizations of colored Methodists as may enter into agreement with them, may be constituted and recognized as one of the Quadrennial or Jurisdictional Conferences of the proposed organization." The other item was this: "We suggest that the Quadrennial Conferences shall be composed of an equal number of ministerial and lay delegates to be chosen by the Annual Conferences within their several jurisdictions according to some equitable plan to be provided for."

The General Conferences of the M.E. and the M.P. Churches met in May 1912. The General Conference of the M.E. Church declared: "We heartily approve the action of our Commission on Federation in proposing the question of organic union to the Commissions in joint session in Baltimore, believing that the membership of the Methodist Episcopal Church would welcome a corporate reunion of the Methodisms of America." However the General Conference did not press for the creation of a definite plan, probably because there was a feeling that the M.E. Church, South, was not yet ready to proceed.

The General Conference of the M.E. Church, South, met in OKLAHOMA CITY in May 1914. After an address by Bishop E. E. Hoss on "Unification," the General Conference enthusiastically and unanimously approved a move to continue negotiations for union by reorganization. It continued to place members on the Federal Council of Methodism, and authorized them, in case the General Conference of the M.E. Church in 1916 should appoint a Commission on Unification, to increase their number to twenty-five and to act as a Commission on Unification. This was done.

One of the most important efforts to get the mind of the two Churches was the presentation of thirty-four papers by Methodist leaders from over the country at a "Working Conference on the Union of American Methodism," held in Evanston, Ill., Feb. 15-17, 1916. This was under the auspices of the John Richard Lindgren Foundation for the promotion of International Peace and Christian Unity.

The General Conference of the M.E. Church in 1916, with Bishop EARL CRANSTON of the M.E. Church and Bishop E. R. HENDRIX of the M.E. Church, South, clasping hands, declared itself in favor of unification of the two churches in accordance with a "general plan of reorganization"—the idea of union by reunion was laid aside.

The Joint Commission on Unification met Dec. 29, 1916 to Jan. 2, 1917 in Baltimore. It was a historic place for such a meeting, and the ablest leaders of Methodism were there. Visits to the graves of early Methodist leaders, services in the church which was the successor of LOVELY LANE CHAPEL, and a traditional WATCH NIGHT Service created an atmosphere never to be forgotten. After fruitful days of discussion the Joint Commission adjourned to meet June 27, 1917 in Traverse City, Mich.

The Traverse City meeting concerned itself with discussions of the nature and responsibility of Conferences. These questions were faced: (1) What powers shall the General Conference have? (2) What powers shall be assigned to the Jurisdictional Conferences? (3) How can there be a general superintendency which may be jurisdictionally elected? A broad substantial basis of agreement was reached, though no one thought of the agreement as setting forth final conclusions. The Joint Commission adjourned July 3 to meet Jan. 28, 1918 in Savannah, Ga. The Savannah meeting lasted two weeks—the longest ever held.

A JUDICIAL COUNCIL—new in Methodism—was approved as the body to pass finally on constitutional and legal matters. The status of the Negro membership in the United Church was discussed under these headings: (1) Should the Negro membership be given an Associate Regional Conference such as was proposed for foreign countries? (2) Should it be given an Associate General Conference of its own, with some representation in the larger General Conference? (3) Should the Negro membership be given a full Regional or Jurisdictional Conference such as was proposed for the several sections of the white membership? Eight days were given to a discussion of those plans. Then the Joint Commission adjourned to meet in St. Louis, June 10, 1918. After four great meetings and twenty-eight days of discussion a plan was worked out. It was not entirely acceptable, but a way to union had been found. The Joint Commission recommended to the General Conferences that their Commissions be continued.

The General Conference of the M.E. Church, South met in Atlanta in May 1918, expressed its appreciation of the work of its Commission and voted to continue the Commission.

The Joint Commission met in Cleveland, Ohio, July 7-10, 1919. The meeting concerned itself with the status of Negro membership in the reorganized church. The Northern members proposed "that the colored membership of the Church shall be constituted and recognized as a Quadrennial or Regional Conference, with proportionate representation in the General Conference." A Committee was appointed to work out a plan for union. The Committee met in Richmond, Va., Nov. 7, 1919. The plan worked out by the Committee was presented to the Joint Commission at a meeting in Louisville, Ky., Jan. 15, 1920. On insistence of the Southern group, the Negro membership was set up as a Regional Conference, but this proposal proved a divisive influence in the Northern Church. Largely for that reason the Plan was rejected at the General Conference of the M.E. Church at DES MOINES in 1920.

It must be said that many in the Southern Church were also dissatisfied with the Plan. The Northern General Conference proposed a joint Convention with 200 to 400 members from each Church. What would the Southern General Conference do? Many Southerners who were opposed to union said, "We had a plan. The Northern General Conference turned it down. Let us forget the whole thing." The Committee dealing with unification had sixty percent for union and forty percent against union, and a Committee of Nine was appointed to recommend the action to be taken by the larger Committee and the General Conference. IVAN LEE HOLT was Chairman of that Committee of Nine, and there were meetings each night for a week. The real turning point in the unification discussion in the South came when the Chairman of the Committee of Nine persuaded Judge John Candler of Atlanta, and the three other antiunificationists on the Committee, to vote for a proposal to recommend the creation of a new Commission on Unification. That recommendation was approved and the General Conference named a new Commission. This was in 1922. It voted also that the bishops be empowered to call a special session of the Southern General Conference, in case a plan should be worked out, and the General Conference of the M.E. Church in 1924 should approve that plan.

The General Conference of the M.E. Church met in Springfield, Mass., in May 1924, and voted 802 to 13 for the Plan of Union. A majority of the bishops in the Southern Church (nine to five) thereupon called a special session of the General Conference of the M.E. Church, South, to meet in Chattanooga July 2, 1924.

At Chattanooga the minority group of five bishops presented to the General Conference a protest against the legality of the call for a special session. In conformity with their argument, a resolution was introduced to call a session of the General Conference in 1925 to consider the Plan of Union. This in effect became a minority report and was voted down.

Then the Plan approved by the Northern General Conference was overwhelmingly approved. Since this was a constitutional change it had to go to the Annual Conferences for their approval. A church-wide debate and widespread agitation resulted, and the Plan did not receive the constitutional majority required in the Annual Conferences—especially those of the deep South.

Years of acrimonious dissension then ensued in the South. When the General Conference of the Southern Church met in Memphis in 1926, many of the delegates had been elected on the strength of their attitudes, pro or con, on unification. Feeling ran high. While the unificationists were in majority, it seemed best at the time to recommend no new Commission. Instead a Committee was appointed to write and publish the history of the unification movement. FRANKLIN N. PARKER, of EMORY UNIVERSITY, was made Chairman, and the report was written by Ivan Lee Holt and V. C. Curtis, of Mississippi. It contained a full history of proceedings to date and was published.

When the General Conference of the M.E. Church, South, met in Dallas in 1930, a resolution was adopted creating a Committee of Fifteen on Interdenominational Relations. Similar action had been taken by the General Conference of the M.E. Church and by the General Conference of the M.P. Church in 1928. On July 1, 1930 the Committees of the M.E. Church and the M.P. Church held a joint meeting, but they did not care to go too far with discussions until the Southern Church could enter the meetings. When the General Conference of the Southern Church met in 1934 it authorized the appointment of a Commission on Unification to negotiate with Commissions of the other two Churches appointed by their respective General Conferences in 1932. In 1935 the Joint Commission held meetings—at Louisville in March, and at Evans-ton in August. A Plan of Union was adopted and recommended to the General Conferences. The Plan of 1920 had never been adopted by the Joint Commission, but simply recommended to the General Conferences for their consideration.

The General Conferences of the M.E. Church and the M.P. Church gave overwhelming approval to the Plan, and their Annual Conferences in voting gave the constitutional majorities. Twenty-five of the thirty-eight Annual Conferences of the M.E. Church, South, asked the bishops of the church to submit the Plan to the Annual Conferences in 1937. This was done, and the vote in the Annual Conferences was 7650 for and 1247 against the adoption of the Plan. So the Plan had the constitutional majorities in the Annual Conferences before the General Conference met in Birmingham in 1938. There the Plan was finally approved though its constitutionality was challenged. The Judicial Council of the M.E. Church, South, just established, in one of the great documents in American Methodist history, held the Plan to be constitutional and constitutionally adopted. All was now in readiness for the Uniting Conference.

This was held under the direction of the Plan of Union itself in the heart of the nation, at Kansas City, in May 1939. Committees had been set up before to harmonize the respective disciplines, and to work out an organization for the General Conference and the Boards of the United Church.

The Chairmen of their Commissions in the closing months had been Bishop EDWIN HOLT HUGHES for the M.E. Church; Bishop JOHN W. MOORE for the M.E. Church, South; and Dr. JAMES H. STRAUGHN of the M.P. Church. They were the three presiding officers. Bishop John M. Moore had a genius for working out details, and of his work Bishop Hughes said, "He is the real author of the Plan."

At the Uniting Conference the Holy Communion was celebrated at the Cathedral of the Protestant Episcopal Church, as the conference began. The final and climactic act of this Uniting Conference was the adoption of the Declaration of Union. It brought into being The Methodist Church. Fourteen thousand people were crowded into Convention Hall for the final service. Bishop John M. Moore presided. OSCAR T. OLSON led the worship service, prepared by him and by Bishop Holt. Bishop Holt announced the first hymn, "The Church's One Foundation." Bishop E. C. RICHARDSON gave the invocation and the collect, Bishop ROBERT E. JONES announced the hymn, "O For a Thousand Tongues to Sing." Bishop ARTHUR J. MOORE led in prayer, and Bishop FREDERICK D. LEETE led in the Cantic of the Church. Bishop PAUL B. KERN read the Scripture lesson, the Seventeenth Chapter of John, and Bishop JOHN C. BROOMFIELD, just elected bishop by the M.P. delegates, announced the litany hymn, "Jesus With Thy Church Abide." Bishop EDGAR BLAKE gave the profoundly impressive commemoration of the faithful.

Many men deserve credit through the years for their work looking toward this Methodist Union, but Bishop Blake chose these six for special recognition: ALBERT NORMAN WARD and THOMAS HAMILTON LEWIS of the M.P. Church; EUGENE RUSSELL HENDRIX and EDWIN D. MOUZZON of the M.E. Church, South; EARL CRANSTON and WILLIAM F. McDOWELL of the M.E. Church. Bishop Edwin H. Hughes made an impassioned and eloquent address with the moving refrain, "The Methodists are One People."

The Declaration of Union was thereupon read by Bishop John M. Moore, the 900 delegates standing and repeating after each of the five declarations, "We do so declare." Bishop A. FRANK SMITH led a liturgical prayer of thanksgiving, the formal vote was taken and Bishop Moore declared, "The Methodist Church now is! Long live The Methodist Church!" It was 8:59 P.M., May 10, 1939. The benediction was pronounced by Bishop JOHN L. NUELSEN, the senior bishop of the M.E. Church.

No one who was fortunate enough to be present can ever forget the inspiration of that hour. It will go down in Methodist history with the Uniting Services of the Methodist Churches of Great Britain at City Road Chapel and Albert Hall in 1932. The Methodist Church from these services went forth in majesty and power.

UNION, BRITISH METHODIST. The first sixty years after the death of JOHN WESLEY in 1791 were marked by divisions which resulted in there being five main branches of British Methodism during the second half of the nineteenth century. These were Wesleyan Methodism, the unbroken stream from the days of Wesley; METHODIST NEW CONNEXION, 1797, in opposition to Conference authority; PRIMITIVE METHODISM, 1812, organized from aggressive revivalism; BIBLE CHRISTIAN, 1819, from evangelism in the West Country; and the UNITED METHODIST FREE CHURCHES, formed from the incorporation in 1857 of the LEEDS PROTESTANT METHODISTS, started in 1827, the WESLEYAN METHODIST ASSOCIATION, started in 1837 (both opposed to Conference authority), and the WESLEYAN REFORM CHURCHES, which dated from 1849, a large secession due to public criticism of alleged bureaucracy.

The idea of a fuller union of British Methodism gained ground, encouraged by the ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCES, the first of which was held in Wesley's Chapel, LONDON, in 1881. The union of the three smaller branches, the Methodist New Connexion, the Bible Christian Methodists and the United Methodist Free Churches, in 1907 created the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH.

At the invitation of the Wesleyan Methodist CONFERENCE in 1918, the remaining two conferences (Primitive and United Methodists) joined in appointing representatives to a large committee to work out a scheme of union. During ten years of committee work the respective conferences discussed the broad policy of union. The final votes of the different conferences approving of union were taken in 1927 and 1928.

The first necessary step was the securing of an act of Parliament, under the powers of which a united body could take over the properties and funds of the three separate churches. The Methodist Church Union Act of 1929 was an enabling act. It did not itself secure union, but gave power to a uniting conference, if and when it so determined, to bring together the three churches into a unity by creating a new church to be named The Methodist Church.

The Uniting Conference was held in the Albert Hall, LONDON, on Sept. 20, 1932. The three churches were represented by their respective conferences. The numbers approximated to their membership relationships in the ratio of: Wesleyan, 10; Primitive 4; United, 3; the total slightly exceeding 1,600. Methodist and other visitors crowded the Albert Hall to its full capacity of 12,000. When constituted, the Uniting Conference elected JOHN SCOTT LIDGETT the first president and ROBERT W. PERKS the first vice-president. The voting for union was unanimous, first by the separate votes of each conference and the Wesleyan LEGAL HUNDRED, and then by a solemn standing vote of the Uniting Conference as a whole. The resolution thus passed under the act of Parliament created one united church "under the name of 'The Methodist Church'." The Deed of Union which had been prepared, setting up the constitution, forms of government, doctrinal standards, and basis of membership of the united church was then adopted. The MODEL DEED for the trust property was likewise presented and adopted.

After the completion of the formal and legal acts and the signing of the related documents, a message from King George V was presented by the Duke of York, who also spoke for himself. Messages were presented from all the Protestant churches, including personal words from the two archbishops of the Church of England, and from the prime minister and other political leaders.

In accordance with the Constitution the united Conference assembled in the Central Hall, Westminster, to confirm the stationing of the ministers, appoint the Chairmen of Districts and departmental and other committees, and to transact all other necessary business for the first year of The Methodist Church.

[Editor's Note: The historical study of the subject was shifted to a new level by the publication of The Age of Disunity, by John Kent (1965) and Methodism Divided, by Robert Currie (1968). Both books were based on sociological analysis rather than on conflicts of personalities, and endeavor to set Methodist union in a wider historical perspective. They should be consulted.]

was formed in 1850 by members of the Union Church of Africans who withdrew to form a church with an episcopal polity. Their doctrine is Wesleyan, although they require their ministers to give assent to the APOSTLES CREED only as a doctrinal standard. The chief difference in polity from the rest of Methodism is that a general conference is not called except to deal with proposed changes in polity or name.

There are two schools: the Local Preachers' Training School in Camden, N. J., and the Union College and Seminary, Philadelphia. Foreign work is carried on in CANADA.

The last year for which statistics are available was 1957, when the church reported 27,560 members and 256 churches.

UNION CATALOG OF METHODIST HISTORICAL MATERIALS

is a compilation of Methodist historical materials prepared by librarians in Methodist theological seminaries, the UPPER ROOM library, and the library of the METHODIST PUBLISHING HOUSE in cooperation with the American Association of Methodist Historical Societies. Preparation of this catalog consisted of microfilming thousands of library shelf list cards and the filing of these for reference and publication. The preliminary edition, published in 1967, is to be kept up-to-date in its card file. A second edition, under the direction of Kenneth Rowe of DREW UNIVERSITY, is planned for late 1972. Information concerning the publication, or materials located in its file, is available from the COMMISSION ON ARCHIVES AND HISTORY, Lake Junaluska, N. C., and from Rose Memorial Library, Drew University, Madison, N.J.

UNION COLLEGE, Barbourville, Kentucky, was founded by citizens of Barbourville in 1879. The name was chosen to indicate its spirit and purpose—a school brought into being by the united efforts of local citizens, to be open to all, without regard to religious creed or political affiliation. In 1886 the property was purchased by the Board of Education of the KENTUCKY CONFERENCE of the M.E. Church. Its first president under Methodist auspices was DANIEL STEVENSON, a distinguished educational leader of the Kentucky Conference. While the school was operated as a college from the beginning, it did for many years include elementary and secondary work. Since 1930 its academic offerings have been limited to those of a senior college. In 1932 it became the first fully accredited Methodist college in Kentucky.

After unification in 1939 it was related to both the KENTUCKY and LOUISVILLE Conferences of The Methodist Church. A fully accredited graduate program in teacher education was instituted in 1960. Degrees offered are the B.A., B.S., B.M. (Music), M.A. in Education. The governing board has twenty-seven trustees, eighteen elected by the Kentucky and Louisville Conferences, three by alumni, six by the board.

UNION COLLEGE OF BRITISH COLUMBIA (Vancouver).

The territory which is now British Columbia was first entered from the northwest by fur traders at the end of the eighteenth century, when forts and trading posts were established in the interior. In the mid-nineteenth century the south, and particularly the southwest (Vancouver Island and the Lower Fraser Valley, where today the bulk of the population resides), was opened up, chiefly because of the discovery of the Fraser River and Cariboo gold fields. The story of the territory throughout these years is a romantic one of prospectors and explorers, pack trains, wagon roads, and riverboats, culminating in the completion of the transcontinental Canadian Pacific Railroad in 1885. The territory became a unified Crown colony in 1866 and a province of the Dominion of CANADA in 1871.

Settlers in British Columbia were early provided with the services of the churches to which they were accustomed by ministers from eastern Canada and the British Isles. It was soon decided, however, that the new province should provide and train its own ministry. The Methodists founded Columbian College in New Westminster in 1892, providing a full program in arts in affiliation with the University of Toronto, and the full bachelor of divinity program in theology. Columbian College was the first institution of higher education in British Columbia, and the only such institution west of Winnipeg.

In 1906 the Presbyterians established Westminster Hall in Vancouver for the teaching of theology. By holding its classes in the summertime, Westminster was able to attract as visiting lecturers, eminent scholars who could not otherwise have been available—such as George Adam Smith, Shailer Matthews, James Moffatt and many outstanding Canadian theological professors.

The University of British Columbia was founded in 1908 and began work in Vancouver. To be near the university, the theological department of Columbian College moved to Vancouver and became Ryerson College. Ryerson, Westminster and the Anglican Theological College entered into affiliation with the university, an affiliation which continues to this day. Shortly after the first war the three colleges began to teach some subjects in cooperation; this association has continued to be an important factor in the strength of theological education.

In 1925 church union occurred. In the same year the University of British Columbia moved to a new campus at Point Grey. Hence, in 1927 Union College of British Columbia came into being in a new building situated on the new university campus. The Anglican Theological College also moved, and the earlier cooperation continued.

The additions to the original building have been principally these: tower section with offices and chapel, 1934; married students' apartments and principal's residence, 1959; new academic wing, 1962. The buildings are now complete and modern, containing all the facilities necessary for operation of a theological college, including residence accommodation for ninety students.

being its leader. Three years later this was moved to Union College, one of eight theological colleges of The United Church of Canada, provides for students the training necessary prior to ordination by the church. It grants a testamur in theology at the conclusion of three years' study, and, after appropriate additional work, grants the degrees of bachelor of theology, bachelor of divinity, and master of sacred theology. It is an associate member of the American Association of Theological Schools.

UNION SCANDINAVIAN THEOLOGICAL SCHOOL,
GOTHENBURG, SWEDEN

UNION SCANDINAVIAN THEOLOGICAL SCHOOL

(Överås), Gothenburg, Sweden. As early as 1881, J. M. Reid, the missionary secretary, on a visit to Scandinavia pleaded for a Union Scandinavian Theological School in Gothenburg. The SWEDEN Conference had already in 1873 started a theological school in Örebro, A. H. Berg being its leader. Three years later this was moved to STOCKHOLM with Gustaf Fredengren and then, from 1881, John E. Edman as its directors. The latter gave more than thirty years of his life to the school as teacher and director. In 1883 it was moved to UPPSALA and remained there for forty years under the leadership of able men. Besides Edman there were Albert Hallen (born in 1858, he had been in America several years, and was rector in Uppsala, 1892-95); K. A. Jansson (1854-1933); August Strömstedt (1880-1944); and Jonathan Julen (1887-1963). John Edman was both a learned and very modest man.

During all these years the scheme of a Union Scandinavian School was much discussed. Economic difficulties hindered the accomplishment, as perhaps did also the disruption of the political union between Sweden and NORWAY. In 1920 Scandinavia got its first native bishop, a Dane, ANTON BAST, and a closer cooperation between the Scandinavian countries began to prevail. The church in America favored the school plan and promised considerable help. A special committee found a suitable building in Gothenburg. "Överås" had been built by the family of James Dickson, originally from SCOTLAND, in 1864. Now in possession of the city, it was sold to the Methodists for the considerable sum of 250,000 Swedish kronor ($50,000). Another 100,000 kronor were spent on rebuilding and renovation. The world-wide depression in the 1930's made difficulties. The American mission board could not for several years do anything. Discussions were meanwhile going on about the apportionment of the purchase money and the current expenses among the Scandinavian conferences. In 1939, however, a considerable sum was sent from America, and in 1946 about 200,000 Swedish kronor, thus clearing the heavy burden of the debt, and making it possible to buy an estate, the income of which helped the finances of the school. In 1965 an ultimate and equitable decision and agreement concerning the ownership and apportionment as between the different Scandinavian conferences was concluded.

In January 1924 the Union School started its work at Överås under the leadership of Jonathan Julen, who served until 1940; then Josef E. Ruthen from 1940-46; Axel Lager, 1946-47 and 1953-56; ODD HAGEN, 1947-53, elected bishop in 1953; Alf Lier from 1957-63; and from 1963, Thorvald Kallstad. Odd Hagen and Alf Lier were Norwegians, so also is E. Anker Nilsen, now one of the teachers. The other members of the present faculty are Gunnar Larson and Arne Widegård.

The students are associated with the several Methodist churches in Gothenburg, thus participating in practical church work. The courses of study have been revised from time to time. Special courses have been carried through for those preparing for missionary work. More than fifty young men and women have already gone from Överås as missionaries in faraway lands. "A School of Prophets" is the aim and ideal of Överås according to the late rector, Josef E. Ruthen.

UNION THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, MANILA, PHILIPPINES

UNION THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, Manila, Philippines. In 1905, George E. Nicholson of Iola, Kansas, gave $10,000 for the erection of the seminary. In 1907, Rev. Harry Farmer was put in charge of the Florence B.

Nicholson Seminary which was opened in July. The Presbyterians furnished class and dormitory rooms and gave valuable help with the teaching force. In 1908 the school opened in the Ellinwood Seminary in Malate and transferred on August 15 to the new Florence B. Nicholson Seminary at Caloocan. On October 15, 1912, the school moved back to the Ellinwood Seminary in MANILA. In June 1926, the school moved into a new building of reinforced concrete, three stories high on Taft Avenue. By this time the work was supported jointly by the Methodists, Presbyterians, United Brethren, Disciples, and Congregationalists. Students from other groups have always been welcome. In June, 1962, the seminary moved to its present location at Dasmariñas, Cavite, twenty miles south of Manila.

In the beginning years all the instruction was given in Spanish, but due to the rapid changes brought about by the public schools, English was introduced in 1912. In 1919, the standard of the school was raised until only high school graduates were admitted. At the present time two years of liberal arts are required for the B.Th. and B.R.E. degrees and four years of liberal arts are required for the B.D. degree. Graduate courses are also available under the Southeast Asia Theological Association.

The late Bishop BENJAMIN I. GUANSING was the first Filipino president of the seminary and he was succeeded by President Jacob Quiambao. There is an average of about eight-five students in the seminary.

BYRON W. CLARK

UNION THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, Matanzas, Cuba, an interdenominational institution of theological education, founded in October, 1946 under the joint auspices of the Methodist and Presbyterian Churches of CUBA. Five years later the Protestant Episcopal Church became the third body supporting the enterprise. During the years prior to the revolution of 1959, and under the leadership of Alfonso Rodríguez Hidalgo, the Seminary grew rapidly. It enrolled students not only from Cuba, but also from Venezuela, Guatemala, Colombia, the Dominican Republic, Mexico, Puerto Rico, Chile, and other Spanish speaking countries. Its location high on a hill overlooking Matanzas Bay became the center of Cuban Protestantism. The number of its students was often doubled from one year to the next.

The plan of training men for the ministry had its beginning at Candler College in the early twenties when special courses were taught by the Rev. B. F. Gilbert. Later, students who wanted to prepare for the ministry were boarded in one of the mission buildings under the guidance of E. E. CLEMENTS and assigned to various local congregations. After several years they were transferred to the third floor of the Central Methodist Church in down town Havana and local pastors did the teaching. None of these methods was entirely satisfactory for lack of library facilities and a trained teaching staff. Under the leadership of Bishop PAUL B. KERN, and A. W. WASON, Secretary for Latin America of the Methodist Board of Missions, overtures were made to the Presbyterian Church to establish a Union Seminary. Prior to this W. C. FLETCHER, a retired missionary to Cuba, had promised to raise $50,000 if and when a Union Seminary might be organized.

In 1956, when the Seminary celebrated its tenth anniversary, it was recognized as one of the best institutions of theological education in Latin America. However, after 1959, and progressively as the Castro regime became more and more oppressive, the growth of the Seminary was limited, especially since it became increasingly difficult to receive foreign students. Actually (1967) it is the only major educational institution which remains in the hands of the Church. It continues to serve the three churches which support it, and in every way possible to adapt its program and curriculum to the new circumstances of the country.

UNIONTOWN, PENNSYLVANIA, U.S.A. Asbury Church was founded by FRANCIS ASBURY in the year of 1784, and is the second oldest congregation in the WESTERN PENNSYLVANIA CONFERENCE. The original church was a log structure thirty-five feet square, located on Peter Street, begun in the fall of 1785 and completed in the spring of 1786. Both Bishop Asbury and ROBERT AYLES preached in it for the first time in the summer of 1786. Eighteen of the twenty times that Asbury passed through the PITTSBURGH CONFERENCE, he preached at the church in Uniontown. The group Conferences of this area were held in the church in 1788, 1790 and 1792. The Union School was begun by Bishop Asbury in this church, and later carried on in an addition to the original log church. The Widow ANN MURPHY, famous woman of Methodism, was an early leader in the Church.

In 1833 a larger church building of brick was constructed on the same site. The church continued to grow and in 1878 a new structure was built on Morgantown Street to house the congregation. This structure still stands and is now an apartment house. On June 14, 1914 the cornerstone of the fourth church was laid and in February 1919, the congregation moved into its present brownstone structure.

The Annual Conference session of the former Pittsburgh Conference was held in Asbury Church many times. Through the years many able preachers have served the church, and it has had one pastor who became a bishop. FRANCIS E. KEARNS. The church is the leading Methodist church of the Uniontown area, and has a membership of over 1,100 people, with a large constituency. The church has property valued at $1,600,000, with PARSONAGE and adequate parking area. Four choirs serve the church. Asbury Church, now 174 years old, faces a favorable future in an area that has just recently begun to grow industrially, after suffering a severe depression coincident with the loss of its coal resources.

Uniontown School (1792-97), an early Methodist educational institution. In the early 1790's Bishop Francis Asbury envisioned the establishment of an Academy of Learning in each of his presiding elder's districts. This was one of the three or four that were actually established. It was located in Uniontown, which was the main center of early Methodism west of the Appalachian Mountains. Its manager and guiding leader was Charles Conaway, the presiding elder of the district. Its first principal was a Mr. Sheppee, and after a short time he was succeeded by John Hooker Reynolds. Reynolds, who later became an Episcopal rector, and William Wilson were the teachers in the school. Several later leaders in the region were among its students. The school closed because of financial difficulties and lack of leadership when Charles Conaway located from the ministry in 1797.

UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST, CHURCH OF THE. Organized originally among German-speaking people in MARYLAND, PENNSYLVANIA, and VIRGINIA about 1800, it moved westward following the migration of persons from these sectors. In 1946 it was united with The EVANGELICAL CHURCH to form The EVANGELICAL UNITED BRETHREN CHURCH.

PHILIP WILLIAM OTTERBEIN, trained in the German Reformed tradition and sponsored in America by the Dutch Reformed Church, arrived in the New World in 1752 and was called to the Lancaster, Pa., congregation, second largest Dutch Reformed congregation in America at that time. He gradually gathered around himself a group of lay persons who contributed to a modest spiritual awakening among the Germans in the Middle Atlantic states. About 1767 he heard a German Mennonite, MARTIN BOEHM, share his faith at a "great meeting" held on the farm of ISAAC LONG in Lancaster County, Pa. Following that service Otterbein hurried forward, embraced the bearded speaker, and exclaimed, "Wir sind brüder" (we are brethren). These two became fast friends and worked together over the years as human founders of the United Brethren in Christ.

In a conference (1789) at his parsonage in BALTIMORE, Md., Otterbein and his lay ministers gave simple organization to the fellowship which had been holding sporadic conferences since 1774. It wasn't until Sept. 25, 1800 that formal organization took place in a two-day session at the home of PETER KEMP, a mile west of Frederick, Md. At that time Martin Boehm and Philip William Otterbein were elected bishops, a name "Church of the United Brethren in Christ" was selected, examination of the brethren was conducted, and other business transacted. From this date conferences were held annually.

Both Otterbein and Boehm soon withdrew from active responsibility as their health declined. CHRISTIAN NEWCOMER and GEORGE ADAM GEETING, two of their followers, became leaders and continued the progress of the movement. On August 13, 1810 Christian Newcomer convened a conference at the home of Michael Kreider in Ross County, Ohio. With the organization of this western conference, later named the Miami Conference, problems of communication arose between the two groups. The western group requested a delegated conference with their eastern brethren. This became the first GENERAL CONFERENCE of the denomination and was convened June 6, 1815 near Mount Pleasant, Pa., midway between the two areas. At that time a Discipline and CONFESSION OF FAITH were approved and a form of church government instituted.

For two years the Church experimented with the new Confession of Faith, the Discipline and church government. Then a second General Conference was held at Mount Pleasant, June 2, 1817. It improved the Discipline, elected two bishops, formed a third annual conference, and arranged for quadrennial sessions of the General Conference.

In 1834, under authority of the General Conference, a Printing Establishment was formed at Circleville, Ohio. It was moved by vote of the General Conference in 1853 to DAYTON, Ohio, where it continued through the remainder of the Church's life. Other general church agencies were established in conjunction with the Printing Establishment so that Dayton became the general church's headquarters.

The English language quickly replaced the German, so that by 1834 when the first periodical was issued, The Religious Telescope, it was an English-language paper. Sunday school training began as early as 1820, in Corydon, Ind. OTTERBEIN COLLEGE, at Westerville, Ohio, became in 1847 the first educational institution of the Church. It was also the first coeducational school in Ohio.

United Brethren had very little work in the south in mid-nineteenth century. When the Civil War broke out, the Church was not seriously affected by a threat of division. It was not until late in the century that division resulted over the secrecy issue.

A small minority, led by Bishop MILTON WRIGHT, father of Orville and Wilbur Wright of aviation fame, walked out of the 1889 General Conference, meeting in York, Pa., and formed their own General Conference. They claimed to represent the Church holding to the original intent of the Discipline of 1841, especially in reference to its opposition to secret societies. Courts of law during the 1890's gave favorable decisions to the majority body (Liberals) and required that the minority (Radicals) take a new church name. They assumed that of Church of the United Brethren in Christ (Old Constitution) and continue today as a small church body of less than 30,000 members.

Over the years the Church of the United Brethren in Christ engaged in conversations with other church bodies relative to organic church union. Some of these negotiations were with the following: 1809-17, METHODIST EPISCOPAL; 1813-17, EVANGELICAL ASSOCIATION; 1829-33, METHODIST PROTESTANTS; 1855, WESLEYAN METHODISTS; 1902-09, Methodist Protestant and Congregationalists; 1909-17, Methodist Protestants; 1926-30, Evangelical Synod of North America and the Reformed Church in the United States; and 1933-46, The EVANGELICAL CHURCH. In the last instance only did union take place.

At the sessions of the FEDERAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES in 1933, overtures were made and active negotiations were begun soon thereafter between the Evangelicals and the United Brethren. After thirteen years of careful deliberations a Plan of Union was approved and at Johnstown, Pa., Nov. 16, 1946, it was consummated. With the formation of The EVANGELICAL UNITED BRETHREN CHURCH not a single congregation was lost from either former denomination, probably the first time such had occurred in American church union negotiations.

The Church of the United Brethren in Christ did not originate from schism, but it came out of the revival of religion of the late eighteenth century in America. Its doctrine was evangelical and Arminian. In government it held in balance the episcopal, presbyterian, and congregational elements. Bishops were the superintendents of the Church, elected every four years by the General Conference and eligible for reelection. Ministerial elders and laity were elected in equal numbers to the General Conference by vote of the entire membership. The General Conference was the supreme legislative body of the Church, meeting quadrennially. Only one ordination was recognized, that of an elder, and pastors were appointed according to the itinerant plan.

Baptism and the Lord's Supper were recognized as sacraments but the mode of baptism and the manner of observing the supper were left to be determined by the individual. Anti-slavery legislation was first approved in 1821 and temperance legislation in 1841.

Mission fields were operated in SIERRA LEONE (West Africa), JAPAN, CHINA, the PHILIPPINE Islands, and the WEST INDIES. One seminary, Bonebrake Theological Seminary, Dayton, Ohio, and five colleges were operated by the Church.

At the time of union in 1946 there were in the United States 2,740 organized churches with 441,566 members and 1,328 itinerant elders. Church property was valued at more than $40,000,000, while funds received for all purposes during the year amounted to $9,051,239.

UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST, THE (Old Constitution) was formed by members of the UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST who objected to legislation adopted at the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1889. These were primarily revisions of the Confession of Faith and the Constitution. They were particularly disturbed by the modification of the rule on secret societies. Following the vote and proclamation of the new Confession and Constitution, Bishop MILTON WRIGHT led fifteen delegates who walked out motivated by a desire to form the dissenters into a continuing body. About 20,000 members were lost to the parent body within a few years.

Four bishops were elected to carry on the work of the church under the "old constitution": Milton Wright, H. T. BARNABY, Hallack Floyd, and HENRY J. BECKER. Immediate efforts were made to take over the denominational property by court action. The court ruled against the seceders. A publishing house was set up in DAYTON, Ohio. The Christian Conservator, the organ of the conservative party in the parent body, was adopted as the official organ of the new church. In 1897 the publishing interests and church headquarters were moved to Huntington, Ind., where a projected college was to be established. Central College, later Huntington College, opened its doors that same year.

This church, like its parent, moved basically Wesleyan. The differences with other branches of the United Brethren were mainly over the interpretation of the Constitution.

The church retained the episcopal polity and the systems of quarterly, annual and general conferences. It differs from most Methodist and United Brethren denominations in allowing only ministers and church officials to attend the quadrennial general conference. Both men and women are eligible for the ministry of which there is only one order, that of ELDER.

Mission work was begun very soon after the denomination was stabilized. The first work was established in Danville, SOUTH AFRICA, and in CHINA. At present, work is being carried on in SIERRA LEONE, West Africa, JAMAICA, China, Honduras.

In 1967 the church reported 310 churches with 22,586 members.

UNITED CHRISTIAN CHURCH. The organization of what became the United Christian Church can be traced to a series of meetings in late 1868 and 1869. As early as the Civil War period, ministers and laymen of the UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST began holding meetings of their own because of disagreement with stated United Brethren doctrines and practices concerning infant baptism, bearing arms, and membership in secret societies. In 1869 George W. Hoffman was elected preacher, and a declaration of principles was adopted. The organization remained loose until 1877 when a Confession of Faith was adopted, the name "United Christian Church" was selected, and classes were organized. The church existed until 1889 without a constitution, when the 1841 Discipline of the United Brethren in Christ was adopted as stating its polity.

The doctrine of the church is in general Wesleyan, though the doctrine of total depravity is emphasized. Three ordinances are practiced: Baptism, the Lord's Supper, and Footwashing. Membership in oath-bound secret societies is forbidden, as is participation in war. Music in the church service is limited to congregational singing, without instrumental accompaniment.

The highest authority in the church is the annual conference, which has the power to revise the Discipline. The district conference has direct oversight over the local church. Each congregation is organized into classes. An official board oversees the church's temporal affairs. Women are ineligible for membership on it.

The mission work of the church is carried on by the Mission Board. Work is currently being carried on in Africa and India. A campmeeting association also is functioning. The church has always been small and all of the congregations are located in and around HARRISBURG, Pa. In 1967 there were 600 members in twelve churches.

UNITED CHURCH OF CANADA. (See CANADA.)

UNITED CHURCH OF PAPUA, NEW GUINEA, AND THE SOLOMON ISLANDS was formed in 1968, the inaugural service being held at Port Moresby, the administrative center, on Jan. 19, 1968.

The following Methodist districts were included in the United Church: New Guinea Island Region, Papuan Islands Region, Solomon Islands, and Highlands Region.

(The beginning and development of mission work in these districts are dealt with in separate articles as Australian Overseas Missions, NEW GUINEA, PAPUA AND SOLOMON ISLANDS.)

These four districts had for some time been advancing towards their own union and the status of a self-governing Conference. Their own United Synod had been created. At this juncture it was realized that more than this was desirable. Negotiations began in March 1964, with the Papua Ekalesia (i.e. Papuan Church) which was the former London Missionary Society in Papua. This was a notable mission established in 1871, but recently given its independence by the parent Society. (The work of the Papua Ekalesia is now continued in the United Church in two regions, Papuan Mainland Region and the Urban Region.) A European congregation in Port Moresby, called the United Church, Port Moresby, also entered into the union.

The United Church was born through the conviction that evangelizing a vast territory could be done effectively only through the amalgamation of Christian forces. As far as Methodists and the London Missionary Society were concerned there had never been any overlapping in their areas, but the pooling of resources greatly aided progressive evangelistic and educational work.

The United Church has 250,000 members and adherents in a territory which extends a distance of about 1,500 miles, from the borders of West Irian (formerly Dutch New Guinea) through the mainland of Papua and New Guinea, the islands (New Britain and others) and the Solomon Islands.

Politically, Papua, New Guinea and the northern section of the Solomon Islands, which have been a Trust Territory under the United Nations, are moving toward independence. (The southern section of the Solomon Islands is a British Protectorate.) It is opportune that at a time of political development, the United Church has been formed as an independent, self-governing church, incorporating Methodist and London Missionary Society traditions, and with the prospect of including other Missionary Churches working in these regions.

The United Church has appointed six bishops for the various sections of the vast territory. Four of these six are indigenous leaders, three of them being ex-Methodists; the two other bishops are European missionaries. One of the indigenous bishops, a brilliant student, is the son of a former savage in the Solomon Islands; his leadership is an indication of the progress Methodist missions have made in recent years in this territory.

The administrative headquarters of the United Church is at Port Moresby, the center of government and trade for the whole region.

Statistics for the four Methodist districts at the time of the formation of the United Church:

| | Members | Adherents | Total of Average Congregations |
| New Guinea Island Region | 17,895 | 26,969 | 39,698 |
| Papuan Islands Region | 12,758 | 9,895 | 29,025 |
| Solomon Islands | 8,306 | 14,650 | — |
| Highlands Region | 11,277 | 7,650 | 16,984 |

UNITED EVANGELICAL CHURCH, THE. Although the formal organization of The United Evangelical Church was not effected until Nov. 30, 1894, it was evident in early 1891 that the division of the EVANGELICAL ASSOCIATION was coming. A keen personal rivalry had developed among several prominent leaders. Some of this centered in an effort to place rather strict limitations upon the episcopacy of the church. During the 1880's so much ill will had been created on both sides of the church that compromise seemed impossible.

The Evangelical Association GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1887 delegated the decision of indicating the place for the 1891 session to the BOARD OF PUBLICATION, which named INDIANAPOLIS, Ind., as the location. A minority disputed this right of the General Conference to delegate this authority and insisted that this prerogative belonged to the oldest annual conference, the East Pennsylvania Conference. (General Conference locations had been named by this conference in the earliest years of the church.) The East Pennsylvania Conference named PHILADELPHIA, Pa., as the place for the 1891 session. The minority met in the latter location with Bishop RUDOLPH DUBS in attendance, while the majority group with Bishops J. J. ESHER and THOMAS BOWMAN, who were inter-related through marriage of their children, met in Indianapolis. Each group organized and carried out its work as though it were the official body of the denomination. During the quadrennium there were literally two churches within the Evangelical Association, each with its own set of officers claiming to be the church. Court cases were held to determine property rights. In most instances the majority group was favored.

Toward the end of the quadrennium the minority group met in Naperville, Ill., Nov. 30, 1894, and organized itself as The United Evangelical Church. There were 61,120 members and 415 itinerant ministers. It arranged for the purchase of a publishing house that had been privately formed several years earlier in HARRISBURG, Pa., and reaffirmed much of the organization that had previously been approved by the 1891 General Conference at Philadelphia. One of the major innovations was the place given to laity, not only in the General Conference but the other levels of church government. In the 1894 General Conference laity were accorded an equal ratio with ministers as members of the body.

Two colleges were supported by the church, ALBRIGHT COLLEGE, Myerstown, Pa., and Central Pennsylvania College, New Berlin, Pa. Bishops were limited to two consecutive terms of service or a total of eight years. In 1900 mission work was initiated in CHINA, while in 1921 a home missions area was opened in the RED BIRD section of the KENTUCKY mountains.

In 1907 youth of the two denominations resulting from the division began efforts toward reunion. Four years later members of a Joint Commission on union met in Chicago and began the negotiations which eventually led to reunion, Oct. 14, 1922, in the Mack Avenue Church, Detroit, Mich. The reunited denomination became known as The EVANGELICAL CHURCH, which had a membership of 259,417 persons and 1,856 ministers.

A large number of the East Pennsylvania Conference would not participate in the reunion. They withdrew to form The EVANGELICAL CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH, a small body that continues to exist today with its church headquarters located at Myerstown, Pa.

The United Evangelical Church was Methodist with no distinctive doctrine other than those it had espoused previously within the fellowship of the Evangelical Association. (See EVANGELICAL ASSOCIATION and The EVANGELICAL CHURCH.)

UNITED METHODIST CHURCH was a British Methodist denomination formed in 1907 by the union of the BIBLE CHRISTIANS, the METHODIST NEW CONNEXION, and the UNITED METHODIST FREE CHURCHES. The new body existed until Methodist union in Britain took place in 1932, when it joined the PRIMITIVE METHODIST and WESLEYAN METHODIST Churches, and the long chapter of Methodist disunity came almost to an end. In 1907 the membership of the three uniting bodies totaled 149,159 in England, together with about 16,000 members overseas, in JAMAICA, AFRICA, and CHINA; these figures had not altered very much by 1932, when the home membership stood at 132,019, together with an overseas membership of slightly less than 16,000.

The constitution of the United Methodist Church derived largely from that of the Methodist New Connexion, and differed from the contemporaneous constitution of Wesleyan Methodism. There was, for example, no ministerial session of the Annual Conference; the secretary of Conference was often a layman; the laity had more freedom of action in the local societies. Instead of the Wesleyan ministerial LEGAL HUNDRED, there were twenty-four Guardian Representatives, twelve laymen and twelve ministers, appointed for six years at a time, who were the legal guardians of the rights and privileges of the United Methodist Church. It was held that the doctrines of the body were based on the revelation in Holy Scripture, but no reference was made to the STANDARD SERMONS or other writings of John Wesley in the official definition. At first the new body kept open the New Connexion theological college at Rammoor, Sheffield, and the college of the United Methodist Free Churches at Victoria Park, Manchester; in 1919, however, Rammoor finally closed, and from then on Victoria Park was linked with the Primitive Methodist College in Manchester, Hartley: this was part of the movement toward Methodist union; in 1932 Victoria Park also closed. The new body also inherited three boarding schools: SHIEBBEAR COLLEGE, adopted by the Bible Christians in 1841; Ashville College, Harrogate, opened by the United Methodist Free Churches in 1876; and Edgell Hill Girls' College, North Devon, opened by the Bible Christians in 1884; all three schools continued after Methodist union in 1932.

Throughout the 1920's the chief event in the history of the Church was the progress of the negotiations toward complete Methodist union. The chief points of discussion were the Doctrinal Statement, which it was finally agreed should include a guarded reference to John Wesley's Standard Sermons and Notes on the New Testament; the proposal to have a ministerial session in the Conference and District Synods, which aroused the traditional Free Methodist suspicion of the Wesleyan doctrine of ministerial authority, but was finally accepted when it was made clear that the Wesleyan Church did not regard the ordained ministry as a kind of exclusive priesthood; and the question as to whether laymen could administer the Holy Communion, a problem settled by a compromise which allowed the continuance of the Free Methodist tradition of lay administration at least for the time being. The last was the most important question: if the Wesleyan Methodist negotiators had been obliged to insist on their own tradition of ministerial administration, Methodist union would not have taken place. The United Methodist Church voted very heavily in favor of union in all its church courts, and the whole body was carried into the new denomination successfully.

The Conference of 1907 decided to publish a United Methodist Magazine, and a weekly journal, The United Methodist: these survived until 1932, when they were discontinued. The United Methodist Church was formed at a time when all the British Free Churches were beginning to suffer a decline in membership; it also had to face the strains of the First World War very soon after its foundation; once that war had ended, Methodist union became the center of Methodist historical development. It therefore lived as a bridge church between one period and another. Among its most distinguished servants were W. J. TOWNSEND; CHARLES STEDEFORD, who was overseas mission secretary from 1910 to 1929; and DAVID BROOK, an able scholar who played an important part in the union negotiations of 1907, and who also did more than any one else to lead the United Methodist Church into the union of 1932: he was chairman of the interdenominational Methodist Union Committee from 1922 to 1932.

UNITED METHODIST CHURCH, THE, U.S.A., is the organization which came into being by the union of The Methodist Church and The EVANGELICAL UNITED BRETHREN CHURCH in a Uniting Conference at DALLAS, Texas, April 22—May 5, 1968. The United Methodist Church, whose history under that name is in its early years, represents the confluence of the larger branches of all past Methodism in America, and is one of the largest organized Church connections on earth. For the moves that brought The United Methodist Church into being in 1968, see METHODISM IN THE UNITED STATES; and also ECUMENICITY AND THE METHODIST CHURCH; and EVANGELICAL UNITED BRETHREN CHURCH.

UNITED METHODIST COMMITTEE FOR OVERSEAS

RELIEF (formerly Methodist Committee for Overseas Relief, commonly referred to as MCOR). An Agency of The United Methodist Church created by the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1940 for the purpose of providing emergency relief to persons in overseas countries, especially CHINA and Europe, who had suffered from war and of coordinating relief appeals from many lands and many agencies. Bishop HERBERT WELCH, then retired, was made its chairman and director; Miss SALLIE LOU MACKINNON, secretary. Other outstanding Methodists who were chosen to serve on it included RALPH E. DIFFENDORFER, Bishop ARTHUR J. MOORE, JOHN R. MOTT, HARRY N. HOLMES, JAMES V. CLAYPOOL and EUGENE E. BARNETT.

The work of this Committee was found so necessary and important that it was continued by the General Conference of 1944 and every succeeding General Conference. In 1944 it was authorized "to be the representative of the Methodist Church in the field of overseas relief; also in the field of rehabilitation" in consultation with the overseas units of the BOARD OF MISSIONS. (Paragraph 2020, Discipline 1944).

Support for the Committee was to come from voluntary gifts and participation in the communion offerings (Fellowship of Suffering and Service), including the offering on World-wide Communion Sunday. When General Advance Specials were established by the General Conference of 1952, this Committee became one of the three participating agencies (Paragraph 759, Discipline 1952). The same General Conference set up the Week of Dedication and designated the Methodist Committee for Overseas Relief as one of the church bodies to receive a share of the annual offering (Paragraph 761.2, Discipline 1952). Any church-wide appeals for war emergencies or post-war work were also to be shared in by the Committee.

The Committee was at first expected to be temporary but its help has been so frequently and consistently needed, that it has been continued in The United Methodist Church.

Chairmen of the Committee have been Bishop HERBERT WELCH (1940-48), Bishop W. W. PEELE (1948-52), Bishop FREDERICK B. NEWELL (1952-60), Bishop JAMES K. MATHEWS (1960-64), and Bishop RALPH T. ALTON (1964-). The executive heads of the agency have been Bishop HERBERT WELCH (1940-48), Bishop TITUS LOWE (1948-52), Dr. GAITHER P. WARFIELD (1952-66), and Dr. J. HARRY HAINES (1966-).

The responsibilities of the Committee have grown since its inception. In 1944 it was empowered to act "also in the field of rehabilitation" (Paragraph 2020, Discipline 1944). The next General Conference ordered the Committee "to give special attention and assistance to national workers and the people of our Methodist churches overseas" and "to cooperate with Church World Service and other interdenominational relief agencies" (Paragraph 2009.3, c and d, Discipline 1948). At the General Conference of 1964 the authorization was widened "to be the representative of the Methodist Church in the field of overseas relief, and rehabilitation for victims of disaster and of endemic circumstance; and service to refugees" (Paragraph 1312.1, Discipline 1964). One should keep in mind that assistance to refugees was prominent in the original mandate (Paragraph 1738.1, Discipline 1940). The 1964 General Conference also mentioned specifically "the Division of Interchurch Aid, Refugee and World Service of the World Council of Churches" as one of the cooperating interdenominational relief agencies (Paragraph 1312.3, Discipline 1964).

At the General Conference of 1968 the Committee came under the umbrella of the Board of Missions of The United Methodist Church and it became known as United Methodist Committee for Overseas Relief. Its various responsibilities were continued, as well as its independence as an administrative agency and its authority to receive and allocate funds, to acknowledge gifts by its own vouchers and to participate in all church-wide offerings.

The work of the Committee is now recognized as a vital part of the life of the Church. Its program comprises —Relief: helping the stricken with food, clothing, initial shelter, and medical supplies; Rehabilitation: the longer road of helping people to help themselves; Resettlement: moving refugees and others from a place of no opportunity to a place where they can "belong" again; Renewal: helping downtrodden people in endemic need "to realize their own inherent strength and to exercise that strength for making their own destiny."

Dr. J. Harry Haines, the present director, reports that UMCOR in the first half of 1970 received an emergency appeal on the average of every eleven days from around the world, and that to each such appeal the Committee "has been able to answer responsibly within seventy-two hours."

UNITED METHODIST FREE CHURCHES was a British Methodist denomination which existed from 1857 to 1907, when it became part of the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH, which in turn became part of the Methodist Church in 1932. When the body was formed in May, 1857, it consisted of the WESLEYAN METHODIST ASSOCIATION, people who had seceded from the Wesleyan Methodist connection in 1837 as a result of the SAMUEL WARREN controversy, and who numbered about twenty thousand; and many WESLEYAN REFORMERS (about five hundred societies with about nineteen thousand members), who had seceded from or been expelled from the Wesleyan connection in the course of the FLY SHEETS controversy in 1849. These reformers held that the ministry should represent, not rule, the laity, that the laity should have full rights in the Annual Assembly, and that laymen should control admission to or expulsion from the local societies. They also wanted to relax the connectional bond, giving the local societies considerable autonomy and weakening the power of any central institutions. They emphasized a rather revivalistic approach to religion, and inherited a strong suspicion of the value of training men for the ordained ministry. In the early days of the new body ministers were often seen as potential dictators and treated as though they were the hired servants of the laity. Among the early leaders were the Wesleyan ministers who had been expelled in 1849, WILLIAM GRIFFITH and JAMES EVERETT, and MATTHEW BAXTER. More important was RICHARD CHEW, who possessed the constructive ability which the older leaders of the community had lacked. The new denomination prospered: a Foreign Mission Fund was started in 1858, and between 1859 and 1862 mission fields were started in both West and East Africa, and a missionary was sent out to Tasmania. Gradually the anti-ministerial feeling of the laity relaxed: ministers came to form a large majority of the Annual Assembly, and as early as 1876 a theological college was projected at Victoria Park, Manchester, which was to remain open until Methodist union in 1932. The first principal was Thomas Hacking (1814-93).

A school for the education of the sons of ministers and laymen, Ashville College, was founded in 1877, and still exists. The denomination had a reputation both for teetotalism and for a radical attitude in politics. The United Methodist Free Churches grew more rapidly than the other liberal Methodist denominations in England, and in 1907 there were 79,948 members; there were 438 ministers, 2,983 LOCAL PREACHERS, and about 189,000 Sunday school scholars. The decision to unite with the BIBLE CHRISTIANS and the METHODIST NEW CONNEXION came about slowly but surely; the groups were divided by history rather than by deep-seated ecclesiastical principles, and the three bodies became the United Methodist Church in 1907.

UNITED METHODIST MEN is the "authorized organization of the men of the church." (Discipline, UMC, 1968, paragraph 1220.) Methodist Men was the name of its predecessor organization in The Methodist Church designed to give specific work to those laymen in each Church who were not otherwise called into service on the Official Board, or in other departments of local church activity. At the reorganization which came about in 1968 (at union of the E.U.B. Church with The Methodist Church), the Uniting Conference made several changes in the specifications regarding what it decided to call United Methodist Men. This is listed as a Section in the Division of Lay Life and Work of the General Board of the Laity of the Church under the present system of administration. In the local church, United Methodist Men are to be organized under the OFFICIAL BOARD of the church, and local organizations of United Methodist Men are designated as "local fellowships."

The purposes of this organization are to encourage its members to define and interpret the purposes of United Methodist Men; to apply the findings and utilize the resources of the Section on Lay Ministries for improvement of the quality of the men's fellowship and for the increased effectiveness of the ministry of Christian men in the world; to anticipate the nature of the ministry which the church must provide for its men who are called to be servants of Christ in the world; and to engage in projects which will challenge United Methodist Men. Other purposes are stated in the Disciplinary directives regarding work of this organization and these may be summed up in saying that it is an endeavor to utilize the power of men in each local church toward fulfilling more deeply all the purposes of a lay Christian in the present day United Methodist Church.

Strong efforts have been made and are being made through the proper officers of the General Board of the Laity to encourage the organization of more groups of United Methodist Men, and to provide printed materials from time to time to assist them in planning their work and enlarging their own opportunities. UNITED THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, Dayton, Ohio, was formed July 1, 1954 by uniting Bonebrake Theological Seminary (founded 1871) and the Evangelical School of Theology (founded 1905). The merger followed the union of the United Brethren Church and the Evangelical Church in 1946.

During the U.B. GENERAL CONFERENCE in 1869, MILTON WRIGHT, later bishop, and the father of Orville and Wilbur Wright of aviation fame, urged the establishment of a theological seminary. As a result the Union Biblical Seminary was launched in 1871. In 1910 the name of the school was changed to Bonebrake, because John Bonebrake, a layman, gave it 3,840 acres of land in honor of six great uncles who had been pioneer ministers in the church.

The EVANGELICAL CHURCH introduced a department of theology in the curriculum of its Schuykill Seminary in Reading, Pa., in 1905. The first class in theology was graduated in 1907. The Reading school merged with ALBRIGHT COLLEGE, Myerstown, Pa., in 1928, and its theology department was then separately organized as the Evangelical School of Theology.

The United Theological Seminary campus is a wooded and landscaped area of thirty-five acres. It has six buildings, including a chapel built in 1961. The plant is valued at about $2,500,000, and there is an endowment of about $1,500,000.

During the 1969-70 school year the seminary had 239 students representing twelve denominations, twenty-one states, and two foreign countries. There were seventeen full-time faculty members and three instructors. The school grants the degrees of Master of Divinity, Master of Sacred Theology, and Master of Religious Education. The library contains about 62,000 volumes.

UNITED WESLEYAN METHODIST CHURCH OF AMERICA, THE, was formed in 1905 by Methodists who immigrated to the United States from the WEST INDIES and wished to carry on the tradition of the British Methodist Church. They are a small body and have experienced little growth.

Their doctrine is Wesleyan and their polity is that of the British Methodist Church. A general conference meets biennially. A periodical, The Herald, is published.

The last available report of 1966 listed five churches and 550 members.

UNITED (WESLEYAN) THEOLOGICAL COLLEGE was founded in Montreal, CANADA, in 1872, and began work in 1873 with GEORGE DOUGLAS as principal. The object of the college was to provide theological training for ministers and missionaries, especially within the province of Quebec. At the General Conference of 1878, the college became affiliated with VICTORIA UNIVERSITY.

Following the union of 1883-84, the college was constituted as a connectional institution of the Methodist Church and in 1887, the Quebec legislature amended the charter to allow the college to confer degrees in divinity. Since then, under a succession of distinguished principals, the college has continued to provide a scholarly training for prospective ministers.

The college, now known as United Theological College, is a constituent part of the Faculty of Divinity, McGill University, in which capacity it fulfills not only its traditional function, but also shares in the provision of graduate theological education on an ecumenical basis.

UNIVERSITY OF CHATTANOOGA, Chattanooga, Tennessee, was a Methodist institution sold in 1969 by its trustees to the state of TENNESSEE to become the Chattanooga Branch of the University of Tennessee. Chattanooga University was founded in 1886 by the FREEDMEN'S AID SOCIETY of the M.E. Church, which at that time was extending its program to include education of poor white Southerners. After three years the school was merged with Grant Memorial University of Athens, Tenn. In 1892 the name was changed to U. S. Grant University, and in 1907 to University of Chattanooga. The following year, after a successful endowment campaign, the Freedmen's Aid Society transferred the property to a self-perpetuating board of trust, with the restriction, removed in 1935, that two-thirds of the trustees must be members of the M.E. Church. At that time the university consisted of schools of law, medicine, and theology and a college of liberal arts at Chattanooga and a preparatory school and two-year normal college at Athens. In 1925 the Athens branch became a separate institution, TENNESSEE WESLEYAN COLLEGE, while the Chattanooga branch continued as a liberal arts college.

On the transfer to the University of Tennessee, since The United Methodist Church through its trustees had an equity in the property because of a reversionary clause, the state agreed to keep the chapel intact for religious worship and to place on it a plaque stating that the institution was founded by the M.E. Church. The state further agreed that courses in religion would be included in the curriculum and that, when necessary, the costs for this work would be supplemented by a foundation made up from the endowment of the University of Chattanooga, now held in trust by a separate board of trustees, who must include a member of the Board of Education of The United Methodist Church.

UNIVERSITY OF DENVER, Denver, Colorado, was chartered as Colorado Seminary in 1864 by the Territory of COLORADO. The leader in the movement to start an educational institution when DENVER was a frontier town of 3,200 inhabitants was JOHN EVANS, who had been appointed by President Lincoln as the territorial governor. Evans was also one of the founders of NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY, and his name is perpetuated in the one given to the city of Evanston, Illinois.

The early life of the university was intimately tied to the development of both the state and the church. Its first chancellors were distinguished clergymen, including DAVID H. MOORE and WILLIAM F. McDOWELL, later bishops in the M.E. Church.

The institution became known as the University of Denver in 1880, but Colorado Seminary continues as the name of the property holding corporation. The Social Science Foundation was established in 1926. The university has a chapter of Phi Beta Kappa. It has the following schools: College of Liberal Arts and Sciences, Graduate College (1891), Law (1892), Business Administration (1908), Engineering (1919), Librarianship (1931), Social Work (1931), Music (1941), Education (1942), Speech and Theatre (1943), Art (1946), Hotel and Restaurant Management (1946), Communication Arts (1952), International Studies (1965). The governing board has twenty-eight trustees nominated by the board and confirmed by the ROCKY MOUNTAIN CONFERENCE.

UNIVERSITY OF THE PACIFIC, Stockton, California, was chartered by the Supreme Court of the territory in 1851, during the gold rush days, as California Wesleyan University. Since there was no statutory provision for a university, the first name chosen was California Wesleyan College. In 1852 the name was changed to the University of the Pacific; to College of the Pacific in 1911; and back to the original one, University of the Pacific, in 1961.

Prominent among those who took part in the founding of the college were four ministers intimately connected with the beginnings of California: WILLIAM TAYLOR, ISAAC OWEN, MARTIN C. BRIGGS, and Edward Bannister. The college was located in Santa Clara until 1870 when it moved to San José. In 1924 the college was relocated in Stockton.

The university includes schools of liberal arts, music, pharmacy, engineering, and dentistry. In 1960 the Board of Regents approved a plan to allow the university to grow in size by organizing small colleges, thereby enabling it to have the advantages which inhere in a smaller school. Since 1962 Raymond College and Covell College, enrolling 250 students each, have been started, and a third, Callison College, opened in 1967. They follow the pattern created at Oxford and Cambridge, with special emphasis on individual initiative on the part of students. Covell College is a Spanish-speaking liberal arts college.

Degrees offered are the B.A., B.S., M.A., M.S., M.M. (Music), Ed.D. (Doctor of Education), Ph.D., M.S.C.S. (Clinical Sciences), and D.D.S. The governing board is made up of thirty-six members, thirty elected by the CALIFORNIA-NEVADA CONFERENCE and six by the SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA-ARIZONA CONFERENCE.

UNIVERSITY OF PUGET SOUND, Tacoma, Washington, was established as Puget Sound University in 1888; the name was changed to University of Puget Sound in 1903, to the College of Puget Sound in 1914, and in 1960 back to the University of Puget Sound, to accord with the diversity of educational programs offered. The university now has six schools: arts and sciences, graduate, business, education, music, and occupational therapy. The institution was founded by the Puget Sound Annual Conference (now PACIFIC NORTHWEST) one year before Washington achieved statehood, and was the second church-related college in Washington. It has grown along with the development of the northwestern corner of the United States. Since 1914 it has been served by only two presidents. This long continuity in leadership has proven most advantageous to the development of the institution. It offers the B.A., B.S., B.M. (Music), B.M.E. (Music Education), B.S. in Business, B.S. in Education, B.A. in Physical Education, B.S. in Occupational Therapy, B.Ed. (Education), M.A., M.A. in Business Administration, M.A. in Education, M.Ed. (Education), M.F.A. (Fine Arts), M.M. (Music), M.S., and M.S.T. (Teaching) degrees. The governing board is made up of thirty-six trustees, thirty elected by the board, six by the alumni association, subject to confirmation by the Pacific Northwest Conference.

UNIVERSITY SENATE, an agency of The United Methodist Church, which fixes and evaluates educational standards for the educational institutions of the Church. The University Senate originated under this name in the M.E. Church in 1892, when there was clearly a need for an arbiter to evaluate the worth and grade of institutions and educational processes which were being patronized by the Annual Conferences of the Church, or by other church-wide groups. The University Senate of the M.E. Church was the first standardizing agency of its type in the United States, antedating by about three years the powerful North Central Association of Colleges and Secondary Schools.

The Discipline of the Church provided then, and provides now, that the members of the Senate are to be "practical educators" and they are directed by the Discipline how they may report and how function. From 1892 to 1939, the University Senate grew in prestige in the M.E. Church, and in order to assure it complete independence the General Conference of 1926 specified that the members of the Senate should not be members of the Board of Education of the Church. The Senate, however, worked largely under the Board of Education and its support devolved upon that Board.

At Church Union in 1939, the University Senate of the M.E. Church was carried over and adopted by the new Church. Its support was provided for by the BOARD OF EDUCATION, but it was independent of that Board in making its evaluation, in providing educational standards for the Church, and in announcing the schools, colleges and universities of the Church which are in accord with its standards.

The University Senate has been perpetuated in The United Methodist Church with little change. The Discipline fixes the number of members who shall be upon the Senate, gives it certain standards and directions, and empowers it to investigate the personnel, scholastic requirements, and so forth, of any designated educational institution claiming to be, or adjudged to be related to The United Methodist Church. The Senate is also to act as a consultant and counselor on all educational matters having to do with the educational institutions related to the Church.

The University Senate has great accrediting and evaluating power as the educational institutions related to the Church are anxious to obtain its favor and approval. The executives of church-related institutions are glad to conform to requests of the Senate to furnish it such information as it may need in exercising its powers.

The sweeping powers of the University Senate are outlined in the paragraph which declares that "no educational institution or foundation of The United Methodist Church shall hereafter be established or reopened until its plans and organization shall have been approved by the University Senate." It also forbids any annual conference or provisional annual conference to acquire or affiliate with any school, college, university or other educational institution unless the Educational Division of the Board of Education shall certify that it has reasonable assurance of financial support and the Senate shall then approve its affiliation. Leading educators usually compose the Senate and its value is recognized in many ways over The United Methodist Church. (Also see EDUCATION, Higher, in the U.S.)

UNIVERSITY OF SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA was founded in 1880 by the M.E. Church at LOS ANGELES. It expanded with the growth of the city and in addition to its college of liberal arts has 13 professional schools. Enrollment in 1962 was 14,899, of which 6,721 were undergraduates. Until 1928 it was closely related to the SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA-ARIZONA CONFERENCE. In the session held that year, the conference gave permission to the board of trustees to elect members without respect to Methodist membership. The university, however, continued to be classified by the UNIVERSITY SENATE as a Methodist-related institution until 1952. In that year the charter was amended and all references to The Methodist Church were deleted. For further information on the church relationships with the University of Southern California see SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY AT CLAREMONT.

UPHAM, SAMUEL FOSTER (1834-1904), American preacher and educator, was born in Duxbury, Mass. on May 19, 1834, the son of Samuel Frederick and Deborah (Bourne) Upham. His father was a Methodist minister who served churches in the NEW ENGLAND and PROVIDENCE CONFERENCES for seventy years.

Samuel Foster Upham was educated at East Greenwich Academy and Wesleyan University, graduating from the latter institution in 1856. The same year he joined the Providence Conference. In 1864 he transferred to the New England Conference, where for the next seventeen years he occupied significant pulpits in Lowell, Boston, Lynn, and Springfield. In 1881 Upham became professor of Practical Theology at DREW THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY. He held this position until his death. Fourteen hundred students were instructed by him during the course of his professorship.

Like his father he was repeatedly elected a delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCE. Of the five times he served in this capacity, three times he was elected Chairman of the Committee on Itinerancy. He also served on the General Missionary Committee, the Hymnal Commission, and the Committee to revise the Constitution of the Church. He was a trustee of Wesleyan Academy and Wesleyan University. In 1872 Mr. UNION COLLEGE granted him a D.D. degree.

Upham married Lucy G. Smith of Middletown, Conn. on April 15, 1857. Five sons were born of this union; two died in infancy. The other three became Methodist ministers. On Oct. 5, 1904, he died in Madison, N. J.

UPPER IOWA CONFERENCE (ME) was organized Aug. 27, 1856 at Maquoketa, Iowa, with Bishop EDMUND S. JAMES presiding. It was formed by dividing the IOWA CONFERENCE, and its territory included the north half of the state. At the beginning the conference had seven districts—Davenport, Dubuque, Iowa City, Janesville, Marshall, Sioux City, and Upper Iowa. There were fifty-eight preachers, seventy-two charges, and 8,320 members.

At its first session the conference passed a resolution that the Upper Iowa Conference adopt CORNELL COLLEGE, located at Mt. Vernon, as their college and they pledged themselves to its patronage and support. The school began in 1853 as Iowa Conference Seminary, was chartered in 1854, and the name changed to Cornell in 1855. From the beginning Cornell granted women equal privileges with men in the student body and on the faculty.

In 1864 the Upper Iowa Conference was divided and its western half became a part of the newly formed DES MOINES CONFERENCE. In a new alignment eight years later that same territory became the NORTHWEST IOWA CONFERENCE. Then in 1948 the Northwest Iowa and the Upper Iowa Conferences merged to form the NORTH IOWA CONFERENCE.

In its last year the Upper Iowa Conference had 223 churches, 62,845 members, and property valued at $7,484,079.

UPPER MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE (ME) was organized at Holly Springs, Miss., Feb. 5, 1891 with Bishop EDWARD G. ANDREWS presiding. The conference was formed by dividing the MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE (ME, 1868). At the outset the conference had five districts—Aberdeen, Corinth, Greenville, Holly Springs, and Yazoo. There were eighty-eight charges and approximately 15,200 members.

RUST COLLEGE, one of the ten surviving Negro institutions of higher learning developed in the South by the M.E. Church following the Civil War, is within the bounds of the Upper Mississippi Conference. Launched in 1866, Rust was among the first schools for Negroes in MISSISSIPPI. Chartered as Shaw University in 1868, the name was changed to Rust University in 1890, in honor of Richard S. Rust of CINCINNATI, who as secretary of the FREEDMEN'S AID and Southern Educational Society was greatly interested in and helpful to the institution. In 1914 the name was changed again to Rust College. The Upper Mississippi Conference supports the college, designating a special day each year when the churches receive offerings for the school. ALEXANDER P. SHAW, born at Abbeville, Miss., graduated from Rust in 1902, and was elected a bishop in the M.E. Church in 1936 and served until retirement in 1952.

In 1939 the Upper Mississippi Conference became a part of the CENTRAL JURISDICTION of The Methodist Church. On the abolition of that Jurisdiction in 1968, the conference became temporarily a part of the Jackson Area of The United Methodist Church, pending merger with the NORTH MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE of the SOUTHEASTERN JURISDICTION.

In 1967 the Upper Mississippi Conference reported 56 ministers, 67 charges, 14,428 members, and property valued at $2,749,457.

UPPER ROOM, THE, published by the BOARD OF EVANGELISM of The United Methodist Church, U.S.A., is the world's most widely used daily devotional guide. It was first issued in April, 1935, with GROVER C. EMMONS as editor. A group of devout Christian people in SAN ANTONIO, Texas, had been concerned and in prayer over the lack of daily devotions in Christian homes. This concern with suggestions for some sort of prayer guide was brought to the attention of the Board of Missions of the M.E. Church, South, which met in NASHVILLE, TENN., on Dec. 13, 1934. The Board accepted the recommendation to publish a devotional guide.

Grover C. Emmons, then with the Board at Nashville, was assigned the task and he developed a booklet with a Scripture reading, a text, a short meditation, a prayer, and a devotional "thought for the day" all on one page. The first copy of the issue had been sent to the press without a name. At a conference in RICHMOND, Va., he heard J. W. Smith, a minister and pastor of Virginia, speak on Pentecost, and decided on the name, The Upper Room. Emmons wired the printer his decision. Dr. J. MANNING POTTS, later the editor, was chairman of the meeting, and vouches for this story.

From the beginning in 1935 until 1948, The Upper Room was issued as a quarterly. Since 1948 it has been bi-monthly. The first printing was for only 100,000 copies, the second 160,000, and the third 211,000 copies. Circulation has grown steadily and is presently a record breaking 3,000,000 copies per issue. From 1935 until 1940 when the Board of Missions of the newly formed The Methodist Church moved to New York, The Upper Room was produced by the Committee on Evangelism, Hospitals, and Homes (MES). In 1940 it was transferred to the Commission on Evangelism, which later became the General Board of Evangelism of The Methodist Church. With this transfer, Emmons became Coordinate Executive Secretary and Managing Editor, a position he held until his unexpected and untimely death in 1944.

ROY H. SHORT succeeded Grover Emmons as Editor of The Upper Room in 1944, and served four years until elected bishop in 1948. Dr. J. Manning Potts was then elected editor (in 1948), and served until his retirement. Dr. WILSON O. WELDON of the WESTERN NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE succeeded him as present editor.

The Book of Discipline provides that no monies from World Service may be used in producing The Upper Room, or other devotional literature, and that no money from such literature may be used by the Board, since the Board is a World Service Agency. A reserve fund is, however, allowed to be created, and the headquarters building occupied by the Board of Evangelism (1908 Grand Avenue, Nashville, Tenn.) was constructed with Upper Room funds.

During more than thirty years of service to the Church there has been little change in the managing staff. There have been only four editors, but great changes have taken place in all other phases of The Upper Room. One of the most important has been in the multiplicity of languages in which publication takes place. In answer to requests the following language editions came about: Hindustani in 1937; Spanish and Korean in 1938; Braille and Portuguese, 1940; Chinese, 1947; Armenian, 1949; Ilocano, Tagalog, Australasia, Swedish, and Norwegian, 1950; Japanese and India (English), 1951; Greek, Italian, Hindi, and Urdu, 1952; Telugu, Arabic, and Thai, 1953; British Isles, Persian, Hungarian, Finnish, and Russian, 1954; Cebuano, Gujarati, and Tamil, 1955; French, 1956; Burmese and Talking Book, 1957; Burina (English, Marathi, Sinhalese), 1958; Kannada, 1959; Malayalam, 1960; Danish, 1961; Bengali, Santhali, and Pampango, 1962; and German, 1965.

The devotional life is stressed in many ways. The Upper Room organization has a department by this name, with responsibility for the production and distribution of books and booklets. Beginning with A Pocket Prayer Book by Bishop RALPH S. CUSHMAN—which has sold over 1,800,000 copies—The Upper Room now has published over 200 different devotional titles and has sold more than 14,000,000 copies.

In 1946 The Upper Room began producing radio programs. These are furnished to stations free for broadcast as a public service. The programs are of such nature in music, message, quality, and without denominational bias, that they have had wide acceptance by and in over 2,000 stations, Armed Services Radio, etc.

In the headquarters building at Nashville, there is a lovely Upper Room Chapel featuring a Pentecost stained-glass window, and a life-sized wood carving of Leonardo da Vinci's painting of The Last Supper. Regular services for the Board of Evangelism are held there each Wednesday, special services for the public from time to time, and many worship services by visiting groups. More than 50,000 people visited the Chapel and Museum in 1965. In addition to the museum with more than six hundred items, there is a devotional library of about 10,000 volumes, many of which are quite rare.

The department of Family WORSHIP promotes family worship, not only throughout Methodism, but throughout the world. The Fellowship of The Upper Room holds a prayer vigil each morning in the Grover C. Emmons Prayer Room, called appropriately, after a volume of his prayers, Alone With God. This is for people throughout the world who have requested prayer and also for the staff and the work of the Board. The Fellowship also distributes literature, helps with the work of Chaplains, and other language editions. Recently a Chaplain's Service Department has been added.

Since 1949 The Upper Room has given an annual and widely publicized citation for outstanding work in worldwide Christian Fellowship. Persons receiving this honor have been: JOHN R. MOTT, Frank C. Laubach, RALPH S. CUSHMAN, Jesse M. Bader, John Mackay, Margaret Applegate, IVAN LEE HOLT, Warner Salzman, Samuel McCrea Cavert, G. BROMLEY OXNAM, Theodore F. Adams, RALPH W. SOCKMAN, James R. Mutchmor, HELEN KINI, Billy Graham, and HARRY DENMAN.

The Upper Room is endorsed and sponsored by many groups and denominations. Most foreign editions are produced by other groups. It is truly an interdenominational, interracial, and international publication of great scope and wide influence.

UPPSALA, Sweden, has a population of 85,000 plus 16,000 students at its world-famed university. It is SWEDEN's most important university city (the university was founded in 1477) and the Lutheran archbishop's seat.

ST. JOHN'S CHURCH, UPPSALA, SWEDEN

In 1871 the first Methodist minister, Nils Peter Sandell (1832-1910), was sent to Uppsala, and a congregation was organized the same year. In 1875 St. Johannes (St. John's) Church was dedicated by Bishop MATTHEW SIMPSON, several prominent members of the Community Council and of the university being present. In 1876, Bishop E. C. ANDREWS presiding, the Sweden Annual Conference was organized at a session in Uppsala at St. John's.

In 1882 the church building was enlarged to become the largest church in Sweden. In connection with this enlargement St. John's was enabled to offer suitable accommodations for the nascent Union Scandinavian Theological School. For forty years, 1883-1923, this important institution was situated in Uppsala. Many generations of Swedish Methodist ministers had their training there. It meant also a good deal for the congregation that these groups of young, enthusiastic, and ardent men, preparing for the ministry, should take an important part in the life and work of the church, preaching and witnessing in the choir and SUNDAY SCHOOL and in the work among young people. They were also called to preach in the many small chapels and meetinghouses in the countryside, around the city. Most of these chapels and groups of religious people belonged however to another free church, which thus greatly profited by these theological students. Occasionally such local churches became too dependent on these young men—which made some difficulties when the theological school in January, 1924, was moved to GOTHENBURG.

Especially was the Sunday school in St. John's led by able laymen. There were times around 1900 when the Sunday school numbered more than a thousand pupils.

Great preachers have gathered crowds around the pulpit in St. John's and exerted no mean influence on many generations of students of the university: FREDRIK ÅNGREN in 1882-84 and 1906-10; C. P. Carlsson in 1884-87; Eric Schütz, 1890-95; Gustaf Lindström, 1895-98; Carl Hult-gren, 1901-04; K. E. Norström, 1913-18; Martin Marthing, 1924-28; David Sandberg, 1936-39, and others.

In 1944-45 a building was erected in connection with the church, containing, among other accommodations, quarters for a parsonage and an old people's home.

Methodist students from all over the country during their years at the university have found a spiritual home in St. John's and have made a noteworthy contribution to the life of the church, besides their activities in the Free Church Student Movement.

URBAN MINISTRIES IN AMERICAN METHODISM. The enormous growth of huge metropolitan centers in world Methodism and the urbanization of life in many lands has called for a different technique in carrying on Methodist Church work from that which was needed in earlier days among an agrarian population and in rural life. In the United States, where urban population has increased ten fold since 1850, an early move toward meeting this expanding challenge is observed in the creative, large-scale efforts of Foreign Language Churches, City Missionary Societies, Institutional Church Movement, Goodwill Industries, Mass Revivals, Settlement Houses, Association Movements (YMCA & YWCA), Rescue Missions, and a broad range of eleemosynary services. Methodist concern for urban residents has expressed itself constantly yet in manifold forms. These gigantic projects supplemented the ministry of thousands of regular city Methodist congregations. Indeed most of the aforementioned special work was regarded as evangelical outreach of the urban church despite its dominant social service nature. The denomination supported both religious and social work.

The earliest churches of the denomination began in the colonial cities along the eastern seaboard. Somewhat later, following the Civil War, as the industrial and commercial communities boomed, Methodism expanded its local work and launched many new congregations. By 1950, more American Methodists resided under urban circumstances than rural. The task has grown larger and more complicated. Thus the denomination's effort to serve city dwellers during the past one hundred years has really been the joint undertaking of both regular city churches and special experimental programs. Here follows an outline of some of these:

Foreign Language Churches proved to be a major Protestant phenomenon. Following the 1860's, industrial cities grew rapidly. During the period between the Civil War and World War I, millions of people emigrated from Europe and Asia. Most immigrants settled in the cities, converting the territory into polyglot neighborhoods. Wherever they took up residence, the territory was inundated with major social change. During this period of industrial expansion, there emerged the various branches of Methodism in America: German, Italian, Swedish, Norwegian, Danish, Negro, Spanish, Chinese, Japanese and Korean. Moreover, additional missions were extended among Poles and Czechs. The majority of every minority ethnic group resided in the city. A relevant ministry began via the group's language and culture. Remnants of the denomination's linguistic work persist today. At its peak, Methodism carried on its urban ethnic ministry in more than twenty foreign languages. Spanish-speaking Americans, whether of Mexican or Puerto Rican lineage, have great numerical significance in contemporary American cities.

City Missionary Societies within Methodism constitute another program aimed at the solution of a ministry to the urban poor in cities of 75,000 population and above. Community-wide local missionary societies were organized among churches in order to procure funds and to pool leadership in behalf of weak urban churches. The fuller mobilization of the denomination's local resources to meet the special problems of ethnic groups and slum residents was an objective but partly realized.

The Institutional Church Movement thrived during the latter half of the nineteenth century and the early decades of the twentieth century. It reached its zenith about 1900 with approximately two hundred Institutional Churches located in the larger U.S. cities. Methodism's work of this type was established in BOSTON, NEW YORK, LOS ANGELES, and elsewhere. Such projects were located chiefly in polyglot slums. Each constituted an evangelical arm of the church. Religious ministry was combined with professional social services. The Institutional Church provided all of the ministries (social, material, familial, cultural, medical and spiritual) required by urban man, making them available under a single roof. Here the multiple staff included minister, social worker, doctor, teacher and kindred workers. The annual budget was enormous, requiring large subsidies from the denomination. A great host of urban residents were served through this comprehensive ministry.

Goodwill Industries. Another type of ministry was launched in 1910 by Methodism at Boston. Designed primarily to aid physically handicapped persons (deaf, blind, amputees, elderly, etc.) who needed gainful employment, it aimed at the practical fulfillment of the slogan, "Not charity but a chance." The Boston project marked the beginning of GOODWILL INDUSTRIES which has now spread to several hundred cities throughout the English speaking world. The program is practical. Used furniture, clothing, shoes, and other household goods are donated locally to Goodwill. Handicapped persons (who are taught the requisite skills) earn wages by making necessary repairs. This chance to learn and earn enabled the worker to participate in his own rehabilitation. Renewed merchandise is sold in a local Goodwill store at a reasonable price. Thousands of handicapped urban poor have been helped by Goodwill Industry. The program is still expanding.

When great numbers of rural young men and women emigrated to cities in the middle and latter part of the nineteenth century and continued into the twentieth century, Protestant leaders were quick to see that these single youth merited a special ministry not available from the regular churches. This concern led to the founding of the Association Movement. Hence the YMCA as an evangelical arm of the city church was established in Boston (1851) and spread from city to city. The work focussed attention upon rural Protestants (including many Methodists) who needed spiritual guidance under urban conditions. The city was regarded as a sinful place. People said that God made the country but the Devil made the city. Later, the YWCA was begun in New York (1858) in order to provide a parallel ministry among the many young women who had migrated cityward. Association activities included not only Bible Study groups and evangelical witnessing on street corners but also the care of the sick in hotels, fund-raising to aid the destitute, and personal work in rescue missions. Thus newcomer rural youth became involved in a practical concern for the city, one which was already espoused by indigenous Methodism. Young adults received a special ministry in behalf of the church.

Other types of special ministries rounded out the creative experiments. To cite a few—Settlement Houses, Mass Revivals, Rescue Missions, Councils of Cities, Negro Church Centers, and numerous Eleemosynary Projects—is to omit many other worthy undertakings. Suffice it to report that Methodism has wrestled with American city problems for more than a century. Evidently the momentum for nearly all of these movements had run down by the 1940's. The city began to hurt desperately and it became a wilderness of neglected ministries. Just then a new burst of social concern appeared. It is largely a post World War II happening.

On the contemporary scene, many experiments are groping toward a relevant ministry. These efforts focus largely in three spheres: among the urban poor, among middle class residents and with respect to special problems (drugs addiction, prostitution, sex deviation, delinquency, etc.). Geographically speaking, the projects extend from Bangor to San Diego, from Seattle to Miami. A desperate search for adequate ministries presses on. Most of the experiments are regarded as an evangelical outreach of the urban Methodist church. Financial subsidies continue to be made on this basis. Both the secular and religious worlds are familiar with some of the contemporary forms: Coffeehouse, Ecumenical Dialogue, Lay Internship, Teen Forum, Teen Challenge, Koinonia Group, Store Front, Night Ministry, Senior Citizen, Racial Cause Advocate, Neighborhood Meeting, Religious Art Festival, High-rise Apartment Ministry, Interracial Neighbor Program, Industrial Chaplaincy, and so on. Such terms reveal new and old directions taken by the urban ministry in this lively period of church renewal. Great seriousness invests the manifold efforts to provide relevant ministries in contemporary urban society.

Even a brief account of Methodism's ministry to urban residents must embrace both humanitarian and religious elements. The denomination's dual concern has persisted for many decades. Methodism has remained aware of the problems and concerned about the needs of the changing urban populations. The denomination has expended its funds, utilized its facilities and deployed its personnel to meet the needs in language, out-patient clinics, job training, employment, homemaking, alcoholism, drug addiction, youth work, recreation, social services, education—indeed pioneering in nearly every form of eleemosynary and religious work. Sentiment, piety and ignorance have rarely marked the dominant response of Methodism. Rather the complex, sophisticated approach through experimental programs coupled with the unheralded current work of approximately 3,000 inner city churches and kindred efforts, have brought hope and succor to millions of urban residents in the United States during the past one hundred years. That the totality of these efforts (past or present) falls short of the full urban task is acknowledged. This, even today, is due to a critical shortage of well-trained, dedicated young clergy and capable young social workers. The American task is larger than the work of a single denomination or that of all of the denominations.

URBANA, ILLINOIS, U.S.A. First Church was the first organized church in the twin cities of Urbana-Champaign in the heart of the central ILLINOIS prairie, and now the home of the University of Illinois. The first services were held in 1836 by James Holmes, a mill-wright, while Indians camped nearby. The Society was organized in 1839 and services were held in the courthouse. In 1840 the first church, thirty by forty feet, was built. The pastor and congregation cut, scored, and hewed the frame out of timber on Nancy Webber's woods nearby. They hauled logs to Colonel Busey's Crystal Lake Creek saw mill for siding. It was white-washed with a mixture some of the women made which evidently had too much salt. The cows that pastured in the church yard discovered this and licked at it—especially at church time. Boys were stationed at the church during services to keep the cows away. Fifteen years later this first church building was sold for $350 and converted into a livery stable.

In 1856 a new brick church with a tall white frame steeple was built. It was dedicated by the famous circuit rider and presiding elder of central Illinois, PETER CARTWRIGHT, who also, as a member of the State Legislature, was one of a small group of its members who was responsible for the establishment of the University of Illinois in 1867.

A third church building was erected in 1892-93 and given to the congregation as a gift by one of its devout members, Jairus C. Sheldon, in memory of his son, Clarence.

The present building is of Indiana limestone and in Gothic style with a bell tower. It was dedicated by Bishop EDWIN HOLT HUGHES in 1927.

There were two famous preachers of this church: ROBERT MCINTYRE, who preached to overflow crowds while he was pastor here, and who was later elected bishop; and FRANK CRANE, who was pastor in 1889 and became famous for his metropolitan "newspaper sermons." Paul Burt, prominent in the general work of the Methodist Church, especially on the Commission on Worship, served as pastor of Wesley Church in Urbana and at the same time as director of the University of Illinois WESLEY FOUNDATION from 1928-62.

Wesley Church reported a membership of 1,059 in 1970 and First Church, located in the heart of a new uptown business section, reported 1,863 members in this same year. First Church was chiefly responsible for the establishing of Grace Church (418 members), now in the southeast section of the city.

URMY, RALPH BRAINERD (1867-1947), American preacher and editor, was born at SAN FRANCISCO, Calif., on Feb. 28, 1867. He was educated at the UNIVERSITY of the PACIFIC, GARRETT BIBLICAL INSTITUTE and DREW THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY. ALLEGHENY COLLEGE awarded him a D.D. degree in 1908. Urmay was received on trial into the NEWARK CONFERENCE in 1896 and served churches in East Orange, Mendham, Morristown and NEWARK. In 1921 he transferred to PITTSBURGH CONFERENCE, and was appointed to Bellvue church, which he served until he became editor of the Pittsburgh Christian Advocate in 1928. He served as editor of the Pittsburgh Christian Advocate until 1931, then returned to the pastorate of Bellvue. In 1934 he returned to Newark Conference, served the Westfield and Lyndhurst churches, and retired in 1940. He was a member of four GENERAL CONFERENCES, and was for fourteen years a member of the Board of Foreign Missions. As a member of the Executive Committee of the METHODIST FEDERATION for SOCIAL ACTION, he took a leading part in determining its policies. His stand upon social issues brought him into prominence during the period when the nation was still little concerned over hours and working conditions in the steel and coal industries. During the First World War he served as a Y.M.C.A. secretary in France. He married Marion F. Saxe in 1897. To them were born four sons and a daughter. Urmay died on Feb. 1, 1947 and was buried in Evergreen Cemetery, Morristown, N. J.

URUGUAY, a republic on the east coast of South America at the mouth of the Rio de la Plata, is bounded by ARGENTINA and BRAZIL. It is the smallest country of South America in area, but not in population. The respective figures are 72,172 square miles and 2,852,000 persons (1969 census). A traditionally prosperous economy has given Uruguay a comparatively high standard of living, and in 1961 it ranked third of all Latin American countries in per capita income. There is freedom of worship, with a preponderance of Roman Catholics and an Evangelical (Protestant) minority of 42,772 (1960)—approximately 1.6 percent of the population. While the population is concentrated in the metropolitan area of MONTEVIDEO, the economy is essentially agricultural, being based upon livestock. Major industries are derived from agriculture, such as packing houses for meat, mills to process cereal grains, a wool industry and textiles.

The Spanish explorer, Juan Diaz de Solis, discovered the Rio de la Plata in 1515, going ashore near the site of Montevideo. Possessing neither silver nor gold, the area was slow in being developed. In 1680 the Portuguese from BRAZIL founded Colonia as a rival to the Spanish at BUENOS AIRES. The Spanish founded Montevideo in 1726, and the city changed hands several times.

After becoming free from their European mother countries, Argentina and Brazil contended for the area that is now Uruguay. Great Britain interceded between them in 1827, and both relinquished their claims in the treaty of Aug. 27, 1828. Uruguay had declared its independence in 1825, but even after 1827 it was beset by rival forces without and within. Ruined by civil wars, dictatorships, and intrigue, Uruguay did not achieve full freedom until the early years of the twentieth century, under the several terms of Jose Batlle y Ordóñez as president.

Uruguay has been governed by a series of constitutions, the present one having been adopted in 1934 and amended in 1952. It gives the country a unique executive, replacing the office of president with a nine-man executive council, but return to a single president was voted on in November 1966.

Uruguay is known as a leader in social reforms, including universal suffrage, medical service, old-age and service pensions, free and compulsory education, and the abolition of capital punishment. At the same time, it has gone further in state ownership of business and industry than other countries of the hemisphere. Principles of socialism have been applied in nationalization of public facilities and banking, control of distribution of primary necessities, and of government ownership of businesses as varied as meat packing and insurance.

Separation of church and state was first provided in the 1919 constitution, and in a now-secular society the dominant tone borders on a practical agnosticism. Holy Week is called "Tourist Week," and Christmas is called "Family Day."

Methodist history is traced to the brief visits of the American, FOUNTAIN E. PITTS (in 1835 while on a survey tour of South America) and JOHN DEMPSTER (in 1835 while stationed at Buenos Aires, Argentina). Dempster requested the Board of Managers of the Missionary Society in the United States to send a permanent missionary, since he judged conditions to be favorable. The board sent WILLIAM H. NORRIS, who arrived in 1839, and who worked in Argentina also. He obtained permission from the government to build a church, but found his work difficult because of war between Uruguay and Argentina. In 1842 Norris was transferred to Argentina, ending the first chapter of the work in Uruguay.

In 1870, JOHN F. THOMSON was sent from Argentina to reopen the work. Of his many accomplishments, perhaps the most far-reaching was his conversion of FRANCISCO G. PENZOTTI, an Italian immigrant whom Thomson trained in Argentina as an evangelist, and who for twenty years was an effective preacher all over Latin America and an agent of the AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY for South America.

The arrival of THOMAS B. WOOD from Argentina in 1876 marked the firm establishment of Methodist work, especially in the field of education. During this period other Uruguayans joined Penzotti as evangelists to their own people. Notable among them were Juan Correa and Carlos Lastrico. They suffered frequent persecution and were imprisoned. By 1880 Wood listed six centers of Methodist work in addition to the capital city. The following year William Tallon came from Buenos Aires to be pastor of the American Church in Montevideo. He was effective in defense of Protestantism from the pulpit and in public discussions in the university. His influence brought into the church a number of young men of superior education. In 1884 an Italian immigrant, Daniel Armand Ugon, opened a theological school used jointly by Methodists and Waldensians—an early example of close cooperation between the two denominations that has continued through the years.

Throughout its early years, Methodist work in Uruguay was a part of the mission headquartered in Buenos Aires. When the South America Conference was organized in 1893, Uruguay became a district. This was a time of expansion into towns in the interior. For a time the Uruguay District also included appointments in Entre Rios Province of Argentina and Rio Grande do Sul Province of Brazil.

Educational work was established early, with day schools for girls being organized by the WOMEN'S FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY of the M.E. Church and for boys by the mission. Today the outstanding educational institution is CRANDON INSTITUTE, founded at Montevideo in 1879 and now having coeducational work from kindergarten to junior college. In addition to its Montevideo campus, there is a branch in Salto.

Subsequent years have seen growth both in churches and institutions. Among notable institutions in Uruguay today are Friendship House, a social service center, and GOODWILL INDUSTRIES, the first of its kind to be set up outside the United States. Methodists played a major role in establishing the interdenominational Evangelical Hospital in Montevideo.

Methodism in Uruguay is small. In 1965 there were twenty-one organized churches and twenty-three preaching places, with 2,056 full members of The Methodist Church and nearly 600 preparatory members. Some growth has taken place since then as later figures will show. The church has enjoyed cordial relations with the Waldensian Church, a Protestant denomination brought from ITALY by immigrants. In the 1960s the church was engaged in negotiations for possible merger of the Methodist and Waldensian Churches and the Disciples of Christ in Uruguay, PARAGUAY, and Argentina.

The proposed regional merger reflected a "Rio de la Plata spirit" that already exists within Methodism. The easy exchange of ideas and personnel between Montevideo and Buenos Aires has led to many cooperative projects. Much of the initiative and support for such work as the Church and Society Board and the Latin American Board for Evangelical Missions have come from Methodists of Uruguay and Argentina. The world-renowned Union Theological Seminary (FACULTAD EVANGELICA DE TEOLOGIA) in Buenos Aires traces its history to a little training school begun in Montevideo and later transferred across the river.

In the mid-1960s Uruguayan Methodism felt the pinch of a let-down in the country's accustomed prosperity. Within the church there was tension between traditional forms and an impulse for change. The intellectual freedom of Uruguayan culture encouraged liberals within the church to experiment with ways to make the influence of Christianity felt in the social order, and a number of churchmen became active politically. A restlessness with old forms led to a revolutionary experimental plan voted by the 1965 annual conference, whereby pastors of Montevideo District were assigned to specific churches only for purposes of residence, making the entire district a single parish divided into three circuits. The experiment was watched with interest by Methodists elsewhere.

Uruguay Annual Conference (until it became an autonomous church in 1969) comprises all the Methodist work in Uruguay. As has been narrated, Uruguay became a district of the South America Annual Conference of the M.E. Church when that conference organized in 1893. The 1952 GENERAL CONFERENCE separated Argentina and Uruguay, which were then together in the River Plate Conference (Discipline, 1948, ¶ 1866), into the Argentina Annual Conference and the Uruguay Provisional Annual Conference. In 1960 the General Conference gave authority to the Uruguay Provisional Annual Conference—as well as to the PERU Provisional and the BOLIVIA Provisional Annual Conferences—to become organized into regular annual conferences during the quadriennium ending in 1964, provided they should have a minimum of twenty-five ministerial members. Uruguayan Methodism fulfilled this requirement, and became officially recognized as an Annual Conference in 1964 (Discipline, 1948, ¶ 1866; 1960, ¶ 2007-1; 1964, ¶ 1846). Chief Conference offices were of course in Montevideo, and the Conference itself was in the LATIN AMERICA CENTRAL CONFERENCE and in the Buenos Aires Episcopal Area.

However, in 1968 the Uruguay Conference asked for and received from the General Conference of The United Methodist Church authorization to become an autonomous Methodist Church. The authorization was granted subject to certain conditions being met. They were duly met and the autonomous Methodist Church of Uruguay (Iglesia Evangélica Metodista en el Uruguay) was organized at a constituting conference on Dec. 5-8, 1969, in Montevideo. The Rev. EMILIO CASTRO, forty-two years of age, a former district superintendent, ecumenist and Christian social action leader, was elected on the third ballot as president of the new Church. This is formed as is indicated above from the former Uruguay Annual Conference of The United Methodist Church and has 2,730 members (full and preparatory), with nineteen organized congregations, twenty-eight preaching places and 1,620 Sunday school students. The ordained and lay ministers number twelve. Montevideo, of course, will be the headquarters of the new Church which will maintain the close relationship with The United Methodist Church in the United States.

In the Methodist Church of Uruguay, districts have been eliminated and an executive committee of twelve—six ministers and six laymen—exercise the supervision of the entire church.

UTAH, U.S.A. (population 1,060,631 in 1970), is in the Rocky Mountains. It is bounded on the north by IDAHO and WYOMING, on the east by COLORADO, on the south by ARIZONA, and on the west by NEVADA. The region was ceded by MEXICO to the United States in 1848. The state's 84,916 square mile area is broken by fertile irrigated valleys. Utah is noted for the Great Salt Lake in the north and Lake Powell on the Colorado River in the south. In recent years manufacturing has become the state's major industry, moving ahead of mining, agriculture, and tourism. In 1847 some 2,000 Mormons entered the Salt Lake Valley, and according to the 1970 census, seventy-two per cent of the state's population were Latter Day Saints. Organized as a territory in 1850, Utah was admitted to the Union in 1896 after the Mormons agreed to outlaw polygamy.

JEDEDIAH SMITH, trapper and explorer, crossed the region in 1826 and may have been the first Methodist to set foot in what is now Utah. The first Methodist sermon in Utah was delivered in the Mormon Tabernacle, Salt Lake City, in 1868 by A. N. Fisher at the invitation of President Brigham Young. Soon after the completion of the Union Pacific Railroad in 1869, more Methodists entered Salt Lake City and the territory. LEWIS HARTSOUGH, a Methodist preacher, held regular services in the home of the Episcopal Bishop in Salt Lake City. Coming from Laramie, Wyo., on a prospecting tour, Hartsough did some preaching at Wasatch, Ogden, and Corinne, as well as at Salt Lake City. C. C. Nichols, local Methodist preacher and railroad employee, moved to Salt Lake City in the fall of 1869, and found time to do some preaching while serving as agent at the railroad station.

First Methodist Church at Salt Lake City was organized on May 22, 1870, and it continues as one of the most important Methodist congregations in the state. In the same year churches were built at Corinne and Ogden. Methodist churches were erected at Tooele in 1871, at Bingham Canyon and Copperton in 1874, and at Park City in 1884. By 1900 there were about ten Methodist churches in Utah. For the next fifty years growth was slow because of the dominance of the Mormons and the lack of immigration. With the heavy movement of population westward after the second world war, Methodist membership in Utah increased.

The 1872 GENERAL CONFERENCE of the M.E. Church created the ROCKY MOUNTAIN CONFERENCE which included Utah, Idaho, Montana, and the part of Wyoming north of Utah. Organized at Salt Lake City, Aug. 8, 1872 with Bishop RANDOLPH S. FOSTER presiding, the conference began with three districts, seven preachers, and 201 members. In 1877 the conference was divided to form the Utah and MONTANA CONFERENCES. The Utah Conference included Utah, eastern Idaho, and the part of Wyoming north of Utah up to the 43rd parallel. Organized at Salt Lake City, Aug. 10, 1877 with Bishop ISAAC W. WILEY presiding, the Utah Conference began with one district and 143 members. The conference did not grow, and in 1880 the General Conference designated it as the Utah Mission. The mission began with 142 members. After 1891 the territory of the mission was limited to Utah. In 1892 it reported 1,076 members. Thereafter it grew slowly, achieving a total of some 2,000 members by 1930 and 2,554 by 1948. In the latter year the Utah Mission was absorbed, becoming a part of the Utah-Western District of the COLORADO CONFERENCE. Three years later there were 2,862 members in the Utah part of the district, and in 1951 some 4,337.

In 1957 the Colorado Conference absorbed the WYOMING STATE CONFERENCE and the name was changed to the ROCKY MOUNTAIN CONFERENCE. Thus eighty-one years after the Rocky Mountain Conference of which Utah had been a part was divided to form the Utah and Montana Conferences, Utah was again included in a conference called Rocky Mountain.

In the last quarter of the nineteenth century the Utah Methodists started several schools, one of which, Rocky Mountain Seminary at Salt Lake City, had an enrollment of 135. WESTMINSTER COLLEGE at Salt Lake City (an outgrowth of Rocky Mountain Seminary), was founded in 1875, and is supported by the Methodists Presbyterians, and the United Church of Christ, with a present enrollment of 800 students. With help from the Women's Division of the denomination, the women's societies in the Utah Mission established Esther Halls for business and professional girls at Salt Lake City and Ogden, as well as the Highland Boy Community House at Bingham Canyon. Esther Hall in Salt Lake City has now become the Crossroads Urban Center serving the Negro and Spanish-American population.

In 1970 the Utah-Western District of the Rocky Mountain Conference reported twelve charges in the state of Utah with a total of 4,598 members. First Church and Christ Church, Salt Lake City had some 983 and 1,142 members, respectively, and First Church, Ogden had nearly 1,000. The property in the Utah part of the district was valued at $2,535,496.

UTICA, NEW YORK, U.S.A. (population 90,000 in 1970), was settled about 1786 on the site of Fort Schuyler, and it was incorporated in 1832. FREEBORN GARRETTSON, who became presiding elder in New York State in 1788, traveled and preached over a wide area. It is believed that he preached in a home about two miles from Utica. In any event, it is known that Methodism reached Utica by 1791. WILLIAM COLBERT, presiding elder of the Genesee District, passed through Utica in 1803 and dined with Robert Stewart. In July, 1809, Bishop ASBURY passed through and wrote, "This is a flourishing place and we shall soon have a meetinghouse here."

Originally Utica was a point on the Oneida Circuit. In 1812 it became the head of a circuit in the Oneida District, GENESEE CONFERENCE, with Seth Mattison as the preacher in charge. The next year there were 423 members. As a station in 1819, Utica reported eighty-two members; Elias Bowen was appointed pastor that year.

In 1843 Utica reported 308 members. About that time the community became agitated over the question of slavery, and in a convention held there, May 31, 1843, the WESLEYAN METHODIST CHURCH was organized. The membership of the M.E. Church in the city showed a slight drop the next year, but by 1848 it had increased twenty per cent and a mission congregation with 102 members had been formed. By 1876 there were three churches with a total of 731 members, and in 1900 there were six with 1,282 members.

The A.M.E. ZION CHURCH in Utica is the oldest Negro congregation in the Mohawk Valley. In 1862, the pastor of that denomination in SYRACUSE visited Utica and, following services in homes and vacant stores, organized a mission. In 1873 the little congregation purchased the building of the Corn Hill M.E. Church, and five years later secured a structure near the courthouse which it used until 1916 when a new edifice called the Hope Chapel A.M.E. Zion Church was erected. Displaced by urban redevelopment in recent years, the congregation purchased the Trinity Moravian Church, 751 South Street. For more than sixty years, Hope Chapel was the only Negro church in Utica.

In 1970, The United Methodist Church had three churches in Utica—Asbury, Central, and Dryer Memorial. They reported respectively 263, 737, and 452 members, with property valued at $146,000, $558,000, and $135,000, and they raised for all purposes during the year $13,000, $47,000, and $22,000.

KOGORO UZAKI

UZAKI, KOGORO (1870-1930), bishop of the JAPAN Methodist Church, was born in Himeji, March 17, 1870. He went to Kobe in 1886 to study western learning, and there met the LAMBUTHS, pioneer Methodist missionaries, who taught him English. He thus became one of the first students at Palmore Institute. He became a Christian and was baptized in 1887. In 1888 he entered the Theological Department of Aoyama Gakuin in Tokyo, but when Kwansai Gakuin was established in Kobe the next year, he transferred to the new school, and so was one of the first graduates from its Theological Department. Some years later he studied at VANDERBILT UNIVERSITY.

He was ordained in 1893, the first Japanese elder in the Southern Methodist Conference. He served churches in Kobe, Hiroshima, Osaka, and Kyoto. In Kyoto, in addition to his church work, he was professor in the Third Government University. When the Japan Methodist Church was organized in 1907, he was made editor of the Advocate, and later became secretary of the Board of Missions. In 1913 he was elected President of Chinzei Gakuin, Methodist Boys School in Nagasaki, at the same time serving as PRESIDING ELDER of the Kyushu District. In 1919, he was elected as the third bishop of the Japan Methodist Church. He was re-elected twice, serving until his death in 1930.

Bishop Uzaki was recognized as a leader of outstanding ability, not only in his own church and in all Christian circles in Japan, but even in non-Christian circles. He served as Chairman of the National Christian Council of Japan and on its Executive Committee; he represented Japan at the ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCE in LONDON; he was the head of the delegation from Japan at the Missionary Conference at Jerusalem. In 1926 when the Japanese Government created a committee of Buddhist, Shinto, and Christian leaders to investigate the institutions of religion in Japan, he was appointed as the Christian representative. After his death he was awarded the Sixth Order of Merit by special Imperial order because of the value of his service to Japan.

JOHN B. COBB, SR.

UZAKI, TAKESABURO (1900-), Japanese FREE METHODIST and ordained elder of JAPAN General Conference, and bishop of the same. He attended Japanese elementary and middle schools, and studied at Osaka Seminary, taking advanced studies in Pauline literature, New Testament theology, Life of Christ, philosophy, zoology, church history. He was contributing editor for Japan Sunday School Commentary for five years, and was the author of booklets on Japanese Customs, The Christian Faith, Stewardship (The Blessing of Giving) and others. He was pastor of Nippon Bashi Free Methodist Church (largest Free Methodist Church in Japan) for twenty-six years. His reinforced-concrete church was the only building of the area to survive the incendiary bombing of World War II. Uzaki continued here as pastor during the war years. He has been bishop of Japan General Conference since 1962. He has served as a member of the Board of Directors and Vice-president, Free Methodist World Fellowship; professor, Osaka Christian College; "Incho" (chancellor), Osaka Christian College and Seminary. His foreign travels include deputation and executive visits to North and South America. His residence is in Osaka, Japan.

BYRON S. LAMSON

VALDOSTA, GEORGIA, U.S.A. First Church was organized in 1859, and continues its ministry only two blocks from where it began. Its membership in 1970 numbered 2,174.

The vaulted mellow wooden ceiling of the sanctuary is emblematic of the naturally endowed forest land in which this community is set, as well as the spirit of the congregation which worships beneath it. A sanctuary constructed in 1896 was destroyed by fire in 1904, and was replaced by the present structure. This was renovated in 1952 and a great organ installed. The Strickland Memorial Building was constructed in 1941 and this expanded the educational facilities. Another educational unit was added in 1960. Resolving to retain its downtown location, land has been purchased to make the position secure.

First Church has given leadership in the establishing of five other Methodist churches in the area. This congregation has provided the last five mayors of the city, and this fact will indicate something of the church's position and influence in the community. Its gifts in leadership and stewardship to the wider church have been significant.

Sessions of the SOUTH GEORGIA ANNUAL CONFERENCE were held in this church in 1896, 1906, 1918, 1927, 1941, 1958, and 1969. Six young men have gone into the ministry from this church.

Pastors since 1930 include: J. P. Dell, A. W. Rees, C. M. Meeks, L. A. Harrell, L. H. Cochran, Albert S. Trulock, Mack Anthony, T. A. Whiting, A. Jason Shirah, and Frank Robertson.

JOSE L. VALENCIA

on Aug. 25, 1898, the son of Victor M. and Juana (Labarrette) Valencia. He spent his school years in the United States, receiving an A.B. from CORNELL COLLEGE, Mount Vernon, Iowa, in 1925; did post graduate summer work at GARRETT THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY in 1925, '27, and '28; and regular post graduate work at DREW UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY. He received the B.D. degree from Drew University in 1929; M.A. from Silliman University, 1947; and D.D. from Cornell College in 1948. It was while a student at Cornell College that he was converted from Roman Catholicism to Protestantism. On April 10, 1930, he married Manuela L. Lardizabal—their children are Jose L., Jr. (Methodist minister, WYOMING CONFERENCE), Ressureccion Florence (Mrs. Novin D. Schuman).

Jose L. Valencia was admitted on trial and ordained deacon in the UPPER IOWA CONFERENCE in 1928; full connection, elder in the Philippine Islands Annual Conference, 1930. His pastorates include: Methodist Church, Vigan, Ilocos Sur, 1929-31; United Evangelical Church, Tagudin, 1931-32; Methodist Church, Tuguegarao, Cagayan, Philippine Islands, 1932-41, 1943-48. He was superintendent of the Cagayan-North Isabela District at the time of his election to the episcopacy in 1948. His Area now includes the Northern and Northwest Philippines Annual Conferences on Luzon Island and the Mindanao Annual Conference on Mindanao Island.

He was secretary of the Philippine Islands Annual Conference, 1935-36, and the Philippine Islands North Annual Conference, 1936-38; a delegate to the Tambaram Missionary Conference; to the World Council of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES; EAST ASIA CHRISTIAN CONFERENCE; delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1948. He has been a trustee of the Union Theological Seminary, Manila since 1936 and chairman of the Board of Trustees (1948-52); trustee of Harris Memorial College, 1948-50; trustee of Mary Johnston Hospital, Manila, and chairman of the Board since 1960; trustee of Mary Johnston School of Nursing since 1950, Philippine Christian College, MANILA (1949-1967). VALENZUELA, RAIMUNDO ARMS (1916-), bishop of the Methodist Church of CHILE, and missionary to that land, was born in Temuco, Chile. He was the son of J. Samuel Valenzuela, a minister of the Chile Annual Conference, and Olive Arms Valenzuela, daughter of the Rev. and Mrs. GOODSL F. ARMS, pioneer Methodist missionaries in Chile. The Valenzuela family immigrated to the United States in 1927, settling in KANSAS.

His education consisted of an A.B. degree from the College of Emporia, Kansas, 1936; B.D. from DREW THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, 1940; and Ph.D. from DREW UNIVERSITY, 1955. He married Dorothy D. Bowie of Rochester, N. Y., in 1940, and they have five children.

Valenzuela became a member on trial of New York ANNUAL CONFERENCE and served Warren Street Church, BROOKLYN, 1940-42. He transferred to the Chile Conference in 1943 and was admitted in full in 1945. First he did student work, then was pastor of First Church, Concepcion, 1945-60, and again in 1963. He was conference secretary of Christian education in 1956 and 1960-62. After 1963 he was co-editor with Mrs. Valenzuela of the New Life in Christ Curriculum for the LATIN AMERICAN EVANGELICAL CHRISTIAN EDUCATION COMMISSION (CELADEC). He was a delegate to the LATIN AMERICA CENTRAL CONFERENCES of 1944, 1952, 1956, 1960, and 1964, and to the GENERAL CONFERENCES of 1964 and 1966.

Valenzuela's other activities were as organizer and general secretary of the Student Christian Movement of Chile, 1944-54; delegate to the General Committee of the WORLD'S STUDENT CHRISTIAN FEDERATION, 1946 and 1949; and chairman of CELADEC, 1962-66.

At the last Latin America Central Conference in SANTIAGO, Chile, in January 1969, Dr. Valenzuela was elected a bishop for a four-year term; and at the concomitant organization of the Methodist Church of Chile (which took place in connection with the Central Conference meeting), he was elected bishop for that new autonomous church. He was forthwith consecrated as such and assumed the superintendency with his residence to be in Santiago.

VALLEY STREAM, LONG ISLAND, NEW YORK, U.S.A.

Grace Church is the largest Methodist church in the Metropolitan area. It is located on the outskirts of NEW YORK CITY in a typical suburban community. A handsome sanctuary of colonial structure and the corresponding educational building are the result of a sixty-year culmination of effort on the part of faithful members and some eleven pastors.

In the beginning, services were held in the Valley Stream firehouse. Then, in 1905, $2,000 was raised—$1,000 of the money coming from The Board of CHURCH EXTENSION of the M.E. Church—and the first church building was erected on what is now the site of the educational building. Sponsors of these first services were the "Sinner's Hope Chapel," which had been founded by the mother church, St. John's Methodist in Elmont. At that time Valley Stream was mostly farm land, and as the village grew, Grace Church grew with it, realizing most of its growth in the last ten or twelve years.

The membership has more than doubled in a twelve-year period and the SUNDAY SCHOOL is run on double session. Five choirs (including a Bell choir), three youth groups, eight women's groups, two couples' clubs, and a men's group, make for a well-rounded church-school program. The 2,719 church members, as well as the inhabitants of this largest village in New York State, look to Grace Church for leadership in this community.

VALTON, JOHN (1740-1794), British preacher of French Catholic origin, was born in LONDON on Nov. 23, 1740. Educated partly in FRANCE, he became an Anglican and, after working in the Ordnance Office, served for eighteen years in the army. Coming under Methodist influence at Burfleet, he became a CLASS LEADER and began to exhort, but did not feel ready to enter the ministry until 1775. A member of the original LEGAL HUNDRED, he had a diffident pulpit manner. Ill health caused him to locate, though he continued to preach. In 1792, he wrote a pamphlet supporting the campaign against West Indian slavery. He died on March 23, 1794.

JOHN A. VICKERS

VAN CORTLAND, PIERRE (1721-1814), American lieutenant-governor of New York in the early days of the Republic and a prominent Methodist layman, was born in New York City on Jan. 10, 1721. He possessed a large manor, originally consisting of 83,000 acres. He was an ardent friend of the republic during the Revolutionary War, and such men as George Washington, Benjamin Franklin, and Governor George Clinton were frequent visitors at his home. His daughter, Catharine, afterwards Mrs. Van Wyck, was converted under a sermon by WOOLMAN HICKSON, and uniting with the church, introduced Methodism into the family.

Governor Van Cortland early identified himself with Methodist interests and his house was a preaching-place until he gave land for a church building and erected a house of worship upon it. It turned out to be one of the best sites for a church in America. From the piazza of his house GEORGE WHITEFIELD had preached to listening hundreds, and Bishop ASBURY, FREEBORN GARRETTSON, and other early preachers found a hearty welcome in this hospitable abode.

In 1804 the first CAMP-MEETING east of the Hudson was held in Carmel, Putnam County, N. Y. Governor Van Cortland and his family attended it, and the presiding elder having applied for a grove on his land, he readily offered it, saying, "I have seen all this grove grow up, and have been solicited to cut down the trees because of the goodness of the soil, yet I have never consented to it, nor could I tell why till your application for it solved the mystery. It seems as if it is from the Lord." In this grove, camp-meetings were held annually until 1831. While the governor lived, he and his family were constant attendants, and remarkable spiritual influences accompanied many of the meetings. He died calmly and triumphantly May 1, 1814.

VAN COTT, MARGARET NEWTON (1830-1914), American woman who became one of the first women EVANGELISTS in the M.E. Church, was born in New York, March 25, 1830, as Margaret Newton, the daughter of William K. Newton, an Englishman and a member of the Protestant Episcopal Church. At the age of eleven years, she was confirmed at the Church of the Epiphany. During her girlhood, her home for a time was so near the M.E. Church at the corner of McEwen and Grand Streets in the Williamsburg section of New York, that she could hear the singing and the prayers. Her mother would not allow her to attend the Methodist services, although she longed to do so. She married Peter Van Cott in 1847. They had two daughters, although the first child died when quite young. Her husband's failing health caused her to endeavor to carry on the business by which he had supported his family, and following the death of her daughter, Mrs. Van Cott lost her father and husband in rapid succession. Out of her sorrows, she made a surrender of herself to God, began to attend the prayer meetings of the Duane Street M.E. Church, and agreed to attend CLASS MEETINGS to aid in the singing, but only on the promise that she would not be asked to speak. However, she there found herself compelled to testify, and began to hold meetings over the city. At first these were for Negro people but then she began to accept wider invitations holding what we should call today revival services. Her preaching resulted in many conversions, and she began a public work which extended, it is said, to almost every state in the Union.

In 1868 she gave up all of her business and devoted herself entirely to the winning of souls. In her first year as an itinerant evangelist, she was able to count 500 persons received into various churches. She understood how to conduct promise and praise meetings, prayer and fasting meetings, mothers' meetings, and so forth, beside preaching nightly and twice on Sunday wherever she happened to be. In an age which frowned upon women taking the leadership in public affairs and preaching from the pulpit, she was a pioneer in activities which many women of a later generation began to emulate. She died on Aug. 29, 1914.

VANCOUVER, WASHINGTON, U.S.A. The first Protestant religious service held on the Pacific Coast was conducted by JASON LEE at Fort Vancouver Sept. 28, 1834, by invitation of John McLoughlin, chief factor of the Hudson's Bay Company. WILLIAM ROBERTS came to Fort Vancouver 1847-48, held services in private homes, and formed a class.

Chauncy O. Hosford was the first regular pastor appointed to the Vancouver Circuit in 1854. Since then Vancouver First Methodist Church has had a continual succession of ministers. In 1962 the appointments were listing seven churches and nine ministers in the area of the first Vancouver circuit.

The first church building in Vancouver was erected in 1858. The second building to house this congregation was built in 1883, which building was later completely remodeled and a pipe organ added in 1910. The first unit of the present building was opened in 1950 and completed in 1960, its total value being $593,000.

The tenth session of the OREGON CONFERENCE (ME) was held in Vancouver in 1862, with Bishop MATTHEW SIMPSON presiding. There were forty-three members and five probationers. The thirty-first session of the Oregon Conference met there in 1883 with Bishop HENRY W. WARREN presiding. There were sixty-eight elders and thirty local preachers. The Puget Sound Conference (see PACIFIC NORTHWEST CONFERENCE), which was organized in 1884, held its sixth session in Vancouver in 1889. Bishop THOMAS BOWMAN presided. There were forty-two members, fourteen undergraduates, and twenty-two local preachers.

The membership of First Church has steadily grown. Beginning in 1854 with eighty-five members, it reported 1,784 in 1970. Other churches have likewise grown. There are in the present Vancouver district of the Pacific Northwest Conference of The United Methodist Church 11,517 members.

VANCURA, VACLAV (1883-), Methodist superintendent in CZECHOSLOVAKIA, was born on April 19, 1883, in Čermná, Bohemia. He studied in the schools of Bohemia (the public school, the high school, and one year at the Prague University as a special student), and in 1905 left to do missionary work in Surinam, Dutch Guiana. Later he studied in Oberlin, Ohio, and six years at Moravian College, Bethlehem, Pa., in the United States, where in 1963 he received the Th.D. degree. He also attended seminars at VANDERBILT UNIVERSITY, BOSTON UNIVERSITY, and Peabody in NASHVILLE. IN PITTSBURGH he served a Czech congregation (1915-18) and was secretary for the Y.M.C.A. in Siberia during the First World War (1918-20). Since 1922 he has acted as district superintendent of the Methodist Church and founder of several congregations in Czechoslovakia. From 1941 to his retirement in 1960, he was the leading superintendent.

VAN DEUSEN, HENRY R. (See JUDICIAL COUNCIL.)

VANDERBILT UNIVERSITY, Nashville, Tennessee, traces its origin to a need sensed in the M.E. Church, South, for a central university. The first action looking toward such an institution was taken in the 1858 General Conference of that church. The Civil War which opened in 1861, prevented the consummation of the plan until 1872. Then representatives from seven annual conferences of the M.E. Church, South, meeting in what is known as the "Memphis Convention," completed plans for a university to be known as the Central University of the M.E.

Church, South. Bishop HOLLAND N. McTYEIRE participated in this convention, and it was largely due to his leadership that the university idea became a reality.

The convention set $1,000,000 as the amount needed to found the university but concluded that if one half was raised by the date set for opening it could proceed. Although the effort was praiseworthy, in view of the depleted economic conditions of the South, it was destined to fail. The year of solicitation of funds did not yield enough to pay for the expenses of the agents.

It was at this point that Bishop McTyre's leadership proved most strategic. Through his personal connections with Cornelius Vanderbilt (Mrs. Vanderbilt was a first cousin to Mrs. McTyre), the bishop secured a gift of $1,000,000 for the establishment of the university. This generous grant, made on March 27, 1873, prompted the board of trust to change the name from Central University to Vanderbilt University. In making his gift, Vanderbilt stipulated that Bishop McTyre was to be president of the board of trust, and should be empowered to carry out plans for the university to purchase the needed land, erect the first buildings, and select the faculty. He was to have the right to veto any "injudicious appropriations or measures"; and all of his decisions were to be final, unless reversed by three fourths of the board of trust. The bishop faithfully discharged the heavy obligations placed upon him; and at the time of his death in 1889, Vanderbilt University had become established as the most influential educational institution in southern Methodism.

In 1893, James H. Kirkland succeeded LONDON C. GARLAND who had served as the university's first chancellor under Bishop McTyre. Kirkland, a layman, while a loyal churchman, naturally did not combine the interests of both the university and church in the same fashion as Bishop McTyre. Some of the bishops of the M.E. Church, South, who during Bishop McTyre's life had left the university in his hands, after his death became active in the board of trust. Grasping the provision in the MEMPHIS Convention which requested the bishops to become a board of supervisors, they openly challenged the administrative practices of the new chancellor and held that these would alienate the university from the church. In a short time, there developed a power struggle between some of the bishops (not all, for the COLLEGE of BISHOPS was divided in its loyalties) and the chancellor for control of the university.

The final test was to center about a self-perpetuating board of trust and the election of its members. The board of trust held that the charter secured by Bishop McTyre made it a self-perpetuating body. He had insisted that the board should select its own members in order to prevent ill-considered choices. A commission authorized by the GENERAL CONFERENCE of the M.E. Church, South, of 1906 concluded otherwise, that the General Conference alone could fill vacancies on the board. The commission went further and held that, since the church founded the university, the COLLEGE of BISHOPS possessed the power to take it over, if in their judgment it was not being administered in harmony with the church's directions.

The commission's decisions were resisted by the board of trust. When the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1910 elected three trustees to the board of trust, the board refused to seat them and proceeded to fill the existing vacancies. Court proceedings were instituted by the bishops to enforce mandates of the General Conference in the Chancery Court of TENNESSEE. This court ruled in favor of the bishops, holding that the General Conference could fill the vacancies on the board of trust. The university appealed this decision to the Tennessee Supreme Court, and the decision of the Chancery Court was overruled. This ruling not only vested the control of the university with the board of trust, but recognized Cornelius Vanderbilt as the founder, thus depriving the bishops of the right of veto power that they claimed was derived because the church was the founder of the university. The court, however, did uphold the right of the General Conference or its authorized agent to confirm the nominations made by the board of trust to fill vacancies on that board.

The court's decision pleased neither side. Bishop ELIJAH HOSS, leader of the opposition, declared, "We lost everything. We did not get the shadow of a shade." Kirkland is reported as saying to the university's attorneys, "Well, gentlemen, you lost your case. We get no relief. The cudgel of the General Conference is still there in its right to confirm or reject any trustee-elect." (Moore, p. 124.)

At the General Conference of 1914, the future of Vanderbilt as a Methodist university depended upon that body's accepting the interpretation of the charter made by Tennessee's Supreme Court. The conference itself was almost evenly divided, as may be seen in the final vote. After several days of heated discussion, 151 members voted to sever all relations with the university, and 140 voted to keep the university.

It should be noted here that the question of the university's affiliation with the church was not the one the court was asked to decide. The question was, "What are the legal rights of the church?" The General Conference in refusing to accept the only relationship that it had ever possessed, namely, the right to determine the membership on the board of trust, permitted the university to pass into the hands of a private corporation.

The aforementioned vote justifies the conclusion that the historic controversy should not be solely construed as an encounter between the church and Vanderbilt. Rather it was a struggle between two factions, each led by powerful leaders holding different points of view on the operation of a church-related university. Because of the nature of the issues involved, the church was destined to be hurt regardless of which side won. In the end Methodism lost Vanderbilt, but a dispassionate review of the controversy has convinced many church leaders that had the form of control advocated by those who led the attack upon Vanderbilt become fixed, the church's future leadership in higher education would have been seriously limited.

The General Conference of 1914 committed to a commission of sixteen the closing of the Vanderbilt chapter and the beginning of plans for two new universities.

Between 1872 and 1914 Vanderbilt University was the most potent educational factor not only in southern Methodism but in the South. Its theological school had supplied almost all of the professionally trained ministers and missionaries. Most of the South's colleges had been enriched with teachers educated at Vanderbilt, and through the Southern Association of Schools and Colleges (the South's accrediting agency), Vanderbilt helped to set qualitative standards for all higher education.

After the break, Vanderbilt continued the development which had been started previously. Its professional schools are rated among the nation's best, and its divinity school has approximately fifty per cent of its enrollment from The United Methodist Church.

VANDERHORST, RICHARD H. (1813-1872), second bishop of the C.M.E. Church, was born on Dec. 15, 1813, at Georgetown, S. C. He was a slave owned by the Wragg sisters and learned the trade of a carpenter. In 1835 he joined the M.E. Church and was made a CLASS LEADER. Later, he was given a license to preach. From 1868 to 1870, Richard Vanderhorst was a presiding elder in a Negro annual conference. When the first GENERAL CONFERENCE met in 1870 to establish the new C.M.E. Church, he was the second to be elected to the office of bishop. He was consecrated by Bishops McTYEIRE and PAINE of the "mother" denomination. Bishop Vanderhorst served only eighteen months; he died on July 17, 1872.

VANDUZAR, J. E. A. (1852-1875), first Methodist missionary to the Cubans, appeared in GEORGIA at some unknown date and at Tallahassee, Fla., in 1873, was licensed to preach. The same year he joined the FLORIDA CONFERENCE and was appointed in 1874 to Cuban mission work in Key West, where CHARLES A. FULWOOD was pastor of Stone Church. On the boat trip to Key West he became acquainted with the youthful HENRY B. (Enrique Benito) SOMEILLAN, who was destined later to carry out Vanduzar's mission to Cuba.

He was described as "amiable, magnetic and dynamic," which gave him an easy approach to his Cuban friends. He was devoted to his work and in a letter to the BOARD OF MISSIONS' Secretary said, "this is an important mission. It is an entrance-gate through which the island of Cuba, so beautiful, can be entered."

In 1875 a terrible epidemic of yellow fever broke out in Key West. He was advised to leave the island with the hordes of those escaping to the mainland. His reply was, "The Lord placed me among the Cubans and among them I will live or die." Soon he succumbed and his dying whisper to Doctor Fulwood was, "Don't give up the Cuban Mission." These words are inscribed on his tomb in the Key West cemetery.

VANDYKE, EDWARD HOWARD (1863-1921), American minister and missionary, was born May 20, 1863, in Odessa, Del. As a child he lived with his parents on a farm on Wye Island in Queen Anne's County, Md., and was a member of the M.P. church there. VanDyke was converted in 1875. He prepared for the ministry through study at WESTMINSTER THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, graduating in 1887. That same year he joined the MARYLAND CONFERENCE of the M.P. Church.

For three years he served pastorates in MARYLAND, then feeling the need to serve the Church in the field of foreign missions, he offered his services as a missionary to JAPAN. VanDyke arrived in Japan with his wife, Carrie, on Jan. 25, 1890.

During the more than twenty-five years that followed, VanDyke became a highly respected figure in Japan. He had a natural gift for the Japanese language, and he shared with the Japanese a love of architecture and music. He served as President of the Japan Mission Conference and later was President of Nagoya College. His dynamic leadership caused the college to grow steadily and soundly. Enrollment grew to 400 under his administration. His interest in the Japanese language and culture prompted him to write a book explaining a system of simplified Japanese characters. The plan had merit, but was not generally supported.

His selfless devotion to the development of Methodism in Japan was recognized by ADRIAN COLLEGE, Adrian, Mich., when it bestowed its D.D. degree on VanDyke in 1911.

In 1916 Van Dyke attended the GENERAL CONFERENCE held in Zanesville, Ohio, representing the Japan Mission Conference. At that time he reluctantly gave up his work in Japan to become pastor of several Maryland Conference churches which he served from 1917 to 1921.

VanDyke died very suddenly May 24, 1921, while on his way to Centreville, Md., for interim services for his father who had died a few days before. They are both buried in Chester Cemetery in Centreville, Md.

ANNIE VAN GRONINGEN

VAN GRONINGEN, ANNIE J. M. (1901-1961), was a lay member of the Belgium Conference who was born in BRUSSELS on Aug. 22, 1901, the daughter of a Dutch Reformed pastor, and was blessed with an excellent education and remarkable linguistic qualifications. She entered the service of the Methodist Mission in Brussels as secretary in 1921 and became assistant treasurer in 1935. During the Nazi occupation (1940-44) under trying circumstances she gave evidence of unusual gifts in administration. She was elected conference treasurer in 1960, lay delegate to the European Methodist Uniting Conference in 1939, also to three GENERAL CONFERENCES of The Methodist Church, 1952, 1956, 1960. She was a member of Executive Committee of the CENTRAL AND SOUTHERN EUROPE CENTRAL CONFERENCE. She died in Brussels on Oct. 8, 1961. A tablet placed at the entrance of Susanna Wesley Residence in Brussels commemorates the part taken by Annie van Groningen in preparation and erection of this institution for the aged.

WILLIAM G. THONGER

W. W. VAN ORSDEL

VAN ORSDEL, WILLIAM WESLEY ("Brother Van") (1850-1919), American legendary Methodist EVANGELIST who, with a mellow baritone voice, sang and preached his way into hearts of listeners during forty-seven years on the frontier, winning the sobriquet of "Best Loved Man in Montana." He started life on a farm near Gettysburg, Pa., in March 1850, youngest of seven children born to William and Mary Van Orsdel, both of whom died before he was twelve. Impressionable "Willie" watched fearfully as Union and Confederate forces swayed in the great blood-letting, July 1-3, 1863. There, after the Gettysburg Address, Nov. 16, 1865, President Abraham Lincoln shook the boy's hand and patted his head—an experience never forgotten.

Acting upon what he called "a sound conversion to the Lord's side of human affairs," Will became a member of the Gettysburg Methodist church at age twelve. Later he joined his brothers, Samuel and Fletcher, in protracted meetings, then did freelance evangelism while employed near Oil City, Pa., as an operator of a stationary engine. By arrangement with his boss, he avoided working Sundays by pumping more oil in six days than others did in seven.

Drawn westward to CHICAGO, Will was thrilled by the famed lecture, "The Bright Side of Life in Libby Prison," of CHARLES C. McCABE, "the singing CHAPLAIN" who afterwards became a Methodist bishop. When young Van Orsdel asked if he should return east, McCabe advised: "Go away out West and you will realize what Paul meant when he said that he rejoiced he did not build on another man's foundation." Van Orsdel took the advice, and at age twenty-two, at Fort Benton, Mont., he stepped from the Missouri River Steamer Far West, penniless and still owing $50 on his passage, but happy. With a carpebag in one hand, a Bible under his arm, he stalked the streets for a place to preach. Tradition supported by old timers' recollections says he delivered his first sermon in a saloon called The Four Deuces. The rough crowd was delighted with his singing, especially a song which he later made known throughout MONTANA, Diamonds in the Rough, a ballad of a converted circus clown.

His passion to evangelize the Blackfeet Indians soon cooled, but not before they invited him to join a buffalo hunt with the privilege of shooting the lead buffalo. Charlie Russell, Brother Van's warm friend who was later to achieve fame as "the cowboy artist" and whose canvases are now valued at fabulous figures, painted the scene—Van Orsdel wearing a Prince Albert coat and plug hat with a six shooter, astride a plunging horse. The canvas is on display in a Great Falls museum.

Completely gregarious, Brother Van loved people. He went by ox team to the new diggings at HELENA, singing and preaching. There a bearded miner put $50 in the collection plate, explaining "I'm way ahead. If I ain't got it, I can't lose it." Brother Van rode circuit, covering 4,000 miles, with his big-boned chestnut horse. Once he walked from Bozeman to a mining camp where he was mistaken for a horsethief. His hasty captors were for hanging him, but he demurred eloquently. "If he's Brother Van like he says," yelled one of them, "make him sing!" Never did he do Diamonds in the Rough more feelingly. "Saved a life with that song," he afterwards quipped. "My own!"

As Indian scares subsided the gold camps flared and ranchers came, then homesteaders and townspeople. Van had started as a lay evangelist but was ordained and in time became PRESIDING ELDER of the Great Falls, North Montana Mission, and Helena districts. At first he teamed with scholarly FRANCIS ASBURY RIGGIN, but soon found another evangelistic partner, THOMAS C. LUFF, and the two became known as "The Heavenly Twins." At 1874 meetings in Helena, it was said that Luff "would dangle the sinners over the brimstone pit, and then Brother Van would sing and pray them back again."

Roving Montana from border to border, Brother Van went horseback or by stagecoaches, then graduated to freight and passenger trains, and finally to a Model T Ford. Many Methodists kept a room ready for him, and there still are spare bedrooms in some Montana homes known as "Brother Van's room." He was everybody's friend, and equally at home with bullwhacker or soldier, sheep man or cowman, miner or merchant. All the love which had gone into a romance with Jennie Johnson, blighted by her death due to tuberculosis, he poured into Montana Methodism. He was instrumental in building a hundred churches, fifty parsonages, six hospitals, and two institutions of learning.

He died Dec. 19, 1919 at Great Falls and is buried in Prickly Pear Valley at Forestvale Cemetery, near Helena, in a plot marked by a large boulder, similar to the one over the grave of his friend, Charlie Russell. It is graven with two words: "Brother Van."

VAN PELT, PETER (1717-1783), American layman, born on Staten Island, N.Y., was baptized "Petrus" as an infant on April 16, 1717, by a minister of the Reformed Protestant Dutch Church. He came of Dutch ancestry long established on the Island, his father being Johannes Van Pelt. In spite of opposition to Methodists by the Reformed Dutch, Van Pelt welcomed FRANCIS ASBURY in 1771. Asbury preached in Van Pelt's house on Wood Row, near Rossville.

Van Pelt was a farmer and civic leader who served in the French and Indian War. Town meetings were held in his home. In November 1771, he was in PHILADELPHIA and heard Asbury who had arrived in America a few days before. On his journey by stage from Philadelphia to NEW YORK, he met Van Pelt and was invited to his home and to preach to the people of Staten Island. In Van Pelt's house Asbury preached his first sermon in the province of New York, on Saturday, Nov. 9, 1771. He preached twice more at Van Pelt's on this occasion and also at the home of Justice Hezekiah Wright in Rossville. Among those who heard Asbury was Peter's brother, Benjamin Van Pelt, who later went to the west where Asbury met him and where he became a leader of Methodism on the frontier.

From the early Methodist preaching in Peter Van Pelt's home the influence spread and the homes of other prominent men were opened. Van Pelt died in February 1783. In 1947 the Methodist churches of Staten Island dedicated a bronze marker in honor of Francis Asbury and Peter Van Pelt on the grounds of Woodrow Church, the "Mother Church of Staten Island Methodism."

VANSTONE, THOMAS GRILLS (1851-1898), British BIBLE CHRISTIAN pioneer missionary, was born at Putford, Devon, March 16, 1851. He found employment in London at nineteen, but was remarkably directed into the ministry. Appointed to the Kingsbrompton Circuit, Somerset, he lodged with Robert and Elizabeth Burston of Venn, Upton, who aroused his enthusiasm for missionary work, and in 1885 with S. T. THORNE he pioneered the connectional mission to Yunnan. Fever and unrelenting toil however broke his health, and he was invalided home in 1892, thereafter serving in the Chagford Circuit, which flourished under his care. He died at Whiddon Down on May 13, 1898, and was buried at Providence, Throwleigh.

His education included the A.B., ROBERTS WESLEYAN COLLEGE, 1951; B.D., ASBURY THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, 1954. He has served as pastor, Allentown, Pa., 1954-58; Eastern Regional Director of Free Methodist Youth, 1958-59; General Representative, F.M.Y., 1960; Director-Chaplain, John Wesley Seminary Foundation and pastor Free Methodist Church, Wilmore, Ky.

BYRON S. LAMSON

VARICK, JAMES (dates uncertain), a Negro minister of early NEW YORK who was selected as the first bishop, or as it is commonly called, the first superintendent of the A.M.E. ZION CHURCH.

Little is known about Superintendent Varick and all that does appear of the record is confusing. Bishop JONES states that the date of his birth has been certified as being 1781. J. W. HOOD and JOHN JAMISON MOORE declare that Varick was one of the members who first began meeting separately in 1770. Still another account states that he was licensed to preach at the age of seventeen in 1813. To have been a leader in 1780 makes it appear that something must have been wrong with his calculation as well as prevailing custom. It is not at all unreasonable to suppose that only older people were accorded the privilege of leadership. Some educational attainment may have allowed for greater participation but in no account can we find a record of this educational attainment. Comparing him with CHRISTOPHER RUSH, the latter was at least thirty-eight years old before he was licensed to preach.

It is concluded that Varick was born in Newburg, N. Y., anywhere between 1750 and 1796. Somewhere between these two dates seems more reasonable. We call attention to the fact that Rush speaks of Abraham Thompson as being old, but nowhere states such of Varick. If the latter, as Hood states, was born in 1750, by 1820 he would have been seventy years old, an advanced age even in these days of longevity. Certainly Thompson could not have been much older. Father Thompson was passed over because of his age and his earlier stand. Certainly Varick had to be younger.

Wheeler states that James Varick was the son of Richard Varick, a man of Dutch descent. Richard is supposed to have been born in Hackensack, N. J. He moved, with his parents, to New York City. James Varick's mother was of Dutch-Indian-Negro lineage. He is supposed to have been born in Newburg, N. Y. (according to Wheeler in 1750) while his mother was in that city visiting. It is unknown whether his mother was free or slave. The family was very influential in New York and it may have been that James was sent to school, there being two or three available at the time. James Varick became a shoemaker and maintained a shop in Orange, now Baxter Street. He must have been a boy of sixteen when PHILLIP EMBURY and Captain THOMAS WEBB began their preaching mission in New York.

According to some calculations, James Varick was married to Aurelia Jones in 1798, when he was approximately forty-eight years of age. (This again would make him rather old by the time the first yearly conference was held.) To this union were born four children: Daniel,

Andrew, Emeline and Mary. No member of Varick's family ever became a member of Zion Church. While this is also true of the family of PETER WILLIAMS, yet Peter never left the Mother Church as such, and when he died he was buried in an Episcopal Church yard.

The record is not clear as to when James Varick began to preach. It appears that he was not among the early ministers of the period (1800) for his name as a preacher does not appear in any of the early writings. His relationship to the African Chapel (later called Zion) had to be that of a layman. In the period, 1800-1820, the name of Varick appeared more and more frequently however.

Because of the peculiar circumstances under which the Zion Church was laboring, it was decided to appoint a District Elder or Superintendent in 1821. It was the Superintendent's task to supervise the work in all the churches. While Rush states that there was no real precedent for such a move, yet the office which the chief elder held in the City of New York may have given the ministers the idea. Abraham Thompson, from all custom, should have been chosen the District Elder, but possibly because of his early actions in the church he was passed over and the position given to James Varick. Bishop Moore uses the term "District Chairman" instead of Elder or Superintendent. He may be right in taking this stand since ordinations to this office had not been accomplished. It appears, however, that seniority played a part in the election as would naturally be the custom among the group. It is this writer's opinion that background and custom would have dictated this.

Varick, one of the two original elders, was elected first by the members of Zion Church.

From the ministerial angle certainly Abraham Thompson appeared to insist on his viewpoint more frequently than any other of this group. One cannot overlook the shadow of Peter Williams behind every action of the Negro group in New York. While we have only Rush to whom to turn (and all writers, John Jamison Moore and J. W. Hood included, have had only his records for this early period), all other accounts which can be located have brought no other interpretation.

In 1822, according to the Disciplinary provisions, James Varick was elected the first Superintendent of the new denomination. He was re-elected in 1826. Some writers state that he died in his second term, "shortly before the conference in 1828," early in 1828. Bishop John J. Moore who was very close to the period and was enough of a student to be at one time one of the secretaries for the General Conference, has him presiding in 1828. Bishop Singleton T. Jones states that he was Superintendent for four years while Christopher Rush apparently assisted him. Bishop E. D. W. Jones states that he had passed away by the conference of 1828. The difference of opinion is too divergent to allow for a decision as many of these accounts and statements are based on reminiscences and are not wholly reliable. When the conference met in New York in 1828, Leven Smith was urged for the position of Superintendent. He declined, and Christopher Rush was selected. At this conference James Anderson came from New Haven and George Tredwell from Long Island. Jacob Matthews succeeded Christopher Rush as pastor of the Mother Church.

THOMAS VASEY

VASEY, THOMAS (c. 1746-1826), was a British clergyman-itinerant whose birthplace and origins are unknown. It is said that he lost his wealth for espousing Methodism. His chief claim to fame lies in the fact that he was one of the two elders whom JOHN WESLEY ordained and sent to America with THOMAS COKE when the Methodist Episcopal Church was organized in 1784. It is said that Wesley first employed Vasey in 1775 as one of his preachers, and perhaps he was one whom Wesley would have liked to have the Bishop of London ordain for America. At any rate, Wesley did ordain him a DEACON and then an ELDER, in BRISTOL on Sept. 1 and 2, 1784. He thereupon sent Vasey to America with Coke and RICHARD WHATCOAT, and there he labored for two years. However, Vasey apparently did not feel that John Wesley's ordination was sufficient, for he was reordained a priest by Bishop White of the newly organized Protestant Episcopal Church in America, who himself had just been ordained to the episcopacy by the bishops in England.

Bishop Simpson states that Vasey was a great sufferer, that he preached not "about Christianity, but Christ." After a short while in America, Vasey went back to Britain, where he had a curacy for a short while, but then rejoined Wesley in 1789. He traveled mainly in northern England until 1811, but was involved in SACRAMENT and trustee controversies (Bristol, 1794). He was a Reader (resident clergyman) at Wesley's Chapel, LONDON, 1811-25, with a large class. He was named in Wesley's DEED OF DECLARATION. He died on retirement at LEEDS on Dec. 27, 1826.

VAZEILLE, MRS. MARY (1710-1781), sometimes listed as Mary Wesley, was born Mary Goldhawk, married Anthony Vazeille, and after his death married JOHN WESLEY. On that occasion the Gentleman's Magazine, which gave the date as Feb. 18, 1751, spoke of her as a merchant's widow with an income of £300 per annum. John Wesley refused to touch any of her money, which was wholly secured for her and for her four children. CHARLES WESLEY was very unhappy about the match both before and after the event, and his forebodings proved justified. Although at first she made an attempt to accompany John Wesley on his preaching travels, this proved too exhausting a task. Remaining at the Foundery, she served as a kind of secretary for John Wesley, but soon became very jealous as she read the many letters from women Methodists to him, especially those from SARAH RYAN. In 1758 she left him, vowing to see him no more, yet continued to dog his footsteps. From time to time she returned, and he did not turn her away, although for thirty years (to use his own words) she had "torn the flesh off my bones by her fretting and murmuring."

Granted that he could give no woman that all-absorbing attention that had already been given to God, the springs of his genuine affection were dried up by his wife's perverseness, which was probably worsened by a streak of mental unsoundness, and it remained for him only to show what infinite stores of fortitude and forbearance he possessed. She died on Oct. 8, 1781, aged seventy-one, but Wesley was not informed of the event until after his return to LONDON from a preaching journey on the day of her burial.

VELASCO URDA, EPIGMEÑO (1880-1940), Mexican minister, was born in Cuicatlán, Oaxaca, México, on March 24, 1880. Through contact with a missionary he studied in Puebla where he decided to enter the ministry. He finished his theological training there, and entered the Conference on trial in 1906, was ordained DEACON in 1908, and ELDER in 1910.

Velasco made something of a record by being pastor in the "Cathedral of Methodism" (Gante Church, México City) for twenty-five years in two terms, 1907-22, and 1930-40. From 1922-30 he was pastor of Central Church, Puebla, and under his leadership a beautiful church was built to replace the old one burned by accident just three days after he preached his first sermon there. His name, with those of JOHN WESLEY BUTLER, J. P. HAUSER and Mrs. Gould C. Hauser, will long be remembered with the history of Gante Street Church, "La Santísima Trinidad." He has been known and remembered as a true pastor, a real shepherd to his flock. Always active, he noted those not present at regular church services and looked for them immediately. He was an excellent organizer. With the shake of his hand and a smile on his face, he transmitted to others the joy of the Gospel. He could find a task for everybody and obtained their consent to do it. Convincing and moving in his preaching, he was strong and evangelistic.

Epigmenio Velasco was a lover of music from childhood. He had a good tenor voice and loved to sing, especially "The Holy City." His church was never without a choir. He organized mixed groups and men's choirs. He translated choir music and hymns; made arrangements and composed a few hymns, both words and music. He was professor of music at the National Preparatory School of México City; also of the Methodist boys school in Puebla, 1922-30. It was his joy to lead congregational singing, large choirs, and large assemblies and conventions. He organized concerts of sacred music with the best elements of selected music. He was the first to direct Handel's "Messiah" in Spanish.

He was a champion in brotherliness. He represented the Church at international conferences at PANAMÁ, Edinburgh, LONDON and several in the U.S.A. Doña Josefina Guevara de Velasco, his wife, was most active in denominational women's work and was president of the Interdenominational Women's Association. This couple was blessed with seven children, all active in church work. He died on March 19, 1940.

VENEZUELA is an oil-producing, mining, and stock raising country on the northern coast of South America, which boasts one of the highest per capita incomes in South America and has one of the lowest percentages of Protestants. Venezuela has an area of 352,150 square miles and a population of 10,035,000 (1969). The location is tropical, but climate is moderated by altitude in its mountain areas.

Columbus first set foot on the South American continent in what is now Venezuela in 1498. After early explorations, Spanish power was established, and the region was a colony of Spain until 1821. Under leadership of Simon Bolivar a state known as Gran Colombia was established, a confederation of what are now Venezuela, COLOMBIA, and ECUADOR. Secession of Venezuela in 1830 broke up the confederation, and it has been an independent republic ever since. The 1961 constitution guarantees religious freedom, but there have been interreligious tensions even in modern times.

Venezuela has never had a substantial Methodist mission, though some of the earliest Protestant contacts were by Methodists. The two great Bible colporteurs, ANDREW M. MILNE and FRANCIS PENZOTTI, visited Venezuela early in 1886 from ARGENTINA as part of a tour that took them through the northern and westcoast countries of South America. Beginning at the port city of La Guayra, they visited many of the cities of Venezuela. As a result of the interest generated by that visit, a group of families petitioned the South American Mission, headquartered in BUENOS AIRES, to send Penzotti to them as a permanent missionary. Penzotti was sent instead to Peru, and no missionary was available for Venezuela. However, a colporteur, H. D. OSUNA, organized a Methodist SUNDAY SCHOOL in the capital city of Caracas in 1888. It lasted only five months.

Other Protestant groups then established work in Venezuela and, under comity agreements, the Methodist Church has since not undertaken to reestablish work there.

VENN, HENRY (1724-1797), was one of several Evangelical Anglican clergy connected with eighteenth-century Methodism and JOHN WESLEY. He was born in Barnes, Surrey, March, 1724, of a line of Anglican clergy, was educated in LONDON and BRISTOL and entered St. John's College, Cambridge, in 1742. Ordained deacon in 1747, he was fellow of Queen's College from 1749 to 1757. His spiritual life was deepened by reading the Serious Call of WILLIAM LAW. Venn served two curacies: to Mr. Langley, of St. Matthew's, Friday Street, London, from 1750; and Clapham, Surrey, from 1754.

In 1759 he began his most famous work as vicar of Huddersfield in Yorkshire. His preaching drew large crowds, and he made a point of visiting out-lying hamlets and preaching in houses. His work attracted the mistaken criticism that he preached faith alone and not Christian works. Declining health prompted him to remove to Yelling, Huntingdonshire, in 1771, where he was noted for his insistence on Sabbath observance. Besides the publication of various sermons his works were: Fourteen Sermons (1759); The Complete Duty of Man (1763), a work in which he criticized the doctrine of Christian perfection as John Wesley taught it; Examination of Dr. Priestley's Free Address on the Lord's Supper (1769); Mistakes in Religion Exposed (1774); and Memoirs of Sir John Barnard, M.P. for the City of London (1786).

In July, 1761, Venn was forced to discuss with John Wesley the preaching of the Methodists within his parish, a "tender point." Where a "gospel ministry" was already performed, Wesley did not wish the Methodists to begin, but whether they should cease such preaching when it had been begun before such a gospel ministry commenced was another matter. By the following month a compromise was reached: "Venn was well pleased that the preachers should come once a month." Wesley preached for him at Huddersfield in 1765 and at Yelling in 1776. Venn gave up Arminianism for moderate Calvinism. His liberal ecclesiastical views may be seen in the support that he gave to an Independent chapel in Huddersfield, and in his preaching in a barn in Huntingdonshire.

VERMILLION, SOUTH DAKOTA, U.S.A. SOUTH DAKOTA Methodism had its beginnings at Vermillion. Bishop O. C. BAKER, presiding over the UPPER IOWA CONFERENCE at Dubuque, appointed SEPTIMIUS WATSON INGHAM missionary to "all that territory between the Missouri and Big Sioux Rivers." He started from Sioux City, Iowa on Oct. 12, 1860 and arrived at Vermillion at Sundown. He delivered the first sermon to be preached by a Methodist in the dining room of Mulholland's Tavern on Sunday, October 14, to twenty persons not one of whom was a Methodist.

He only preached as he made the rounds of his vast circuit so did not organize a class until Jan. 13, 1861. This group has the distinction of being the first Dakota group to participate in the Sacrament of the LORD'S SUPPER, quarterly meeting and LOVE FEAST.

Following "The Great Stampede" of Indians in September 1862, all Vermillion residents retreated across the rivers for protection. Among others, three Methodists returned and the church was reactivated in November by Jason L. Paine. Meetings were held in various business places and homes, as well as the log school house after it was built in 1864.

A PARSONAGE was erected in 1869 on top of the bluff overlooking the town and the Vermillion and Missouri River valleys. Four years later, on August 21, a chapel was dedicated. A great flood nearly destroyed the city in 1881. It was rebuilt on higher ground, and when the church outgrew its chapel it built a new church at Main and Dakota Streets in 1895. This served a growing congregation for thirty-two years.

The University of South Dakota was started, and Vermillion was chosen as its location. The church sought to serve the Methodist students and found many supporters among the faculty and administration.

On Nov. 20, 1927 the church was seriously damaged by fire. Because of the WESLEY FOUNDATION work, it was decided to build a new and larger building nearer to the campus. A called session of the Annual Conference assumed approximately one third of the cost of a new building, $30,000. The new building provided space for student activity and a new, attached parsonage. It was dedicated on Sept. 15, 1929, while Lorne A. McDonald was the pastor.

Clair E. Mitchell was appointed pastor in 1964, and under his leadership a new parsonage was secured, a separate building and site for the Wesley Foundation acquired, and the old building remodelled.

VERMONT, U.S.A., is one of the six New England states, and it was the first state to be admitted to the Union (March 4, 1791) after the Union was formed by the thirteen original states. Vermont is bounded on the north by CANADA, on the east by NEW HAMPSHIRE, on the south by MASSACHUSETTS, and on the west by NEW YORK. In 1970 its population was 437,744. Vermont's chief topographical feature is the Green Mountain chain down the middle of the state. The state ranks high in the mining of marble, granite, talc, and asbestos; it has a great dairying business; and its winter sports attract many people. It produces maple syrup, puts out stone and clay products, and manufactures machinery, furniture, paper, and other wood products. Vermonters are traditionally a sturdy, self-supporting, independent people.

It is claimed that Methodism began in Vermont with a certain Mary Appleton Peckett who had been a housekeeper in JOHN WESLEY's home in England for three years prior to her marriage to Giles Peckett. In 1774 the Pecketts came to New England, and eventually to Bradford, Vt. There in 1780, in her own home, "Mother Peckett," as she was known, started the first Methodist meetings. Some of the famous itinerant preachers of that day—LABAN CLARK, MARTIN RUTER, and LORENZO DOW—were among those who shared her hospitality.

Samuel Wightton did some preaching on what was called the Lake Champlain Circuit in 1788. In that year FREEBORN GARRETTSON was the presiding elder of a district extending from New Rochelle, N.Y. to Lake Champlain, and it is believed that he made a visit to Vermont. JESSE LEE preached in Windham County, Vt., on Sunday, April 18, 1790.

In 1793, THOMAS WARE succeeded Garrettson as presiding elder, and his work embraced much of Vermont. In 1794, Methodism came into Vermont from New Hampshire, and also from Massachusetts with Joshua Hall. Hall was sent as a missionary under GEORGE ROBERTS who was then presiding elder in Massachusetts. In 1795, THOMAS COOPER was appointed to the Orange Circuit, known the following year as Vershire. In 1795 Vermont appears for the first time in the statistical report of the conferences with Vershire as its only appointment. Jesse Lee says that Vershire was the first Methodist circuit in Vermont, and that while there was some preaching about, no real societies were organized before that time. The Vershire Circuit, according to Lee, extended from the towns near the Connecticut River to Montpelier, and to the mouth of Onion River which runs into Lake Champlain. Lee says, "Many of the places where we preached in that circuit were quite new settlements; the houses were very small and but scattering through the country. The preachers had to encounter many difficulties and endure many hardships; but one thing which made up for all the difficulties was this: the people were fond of attending meetings by day or night and were very kind to the preachers."

There was a widespread revival in Vermont in 1798-99. Hundreds were converted and nearly 500 joined the societies. By 1804 the Vermont District had 2,529 members, making it the largest district in the NEW ENGLAND CONFERENCE.

The Methodist society at Barnard, Vt., had a long and colorful history. Today a bronze tablet standing outside Barnard village says that the New England Conference met there twice, with Bishop ASBURY himself presiding over at least one of the sessions. Asbury was entertained in a rambling farm house which still stands. He is said to have preached on that occasion to 3,000 people who gathered in a grove nearby.

Important early Methodist leaders who traveled through or lived in Vermont include WILBUR FISKE, ELIJAH HEDDING, and OSMON C. BAKER. Hedding and Baker became bishops. JASON LEE, famous as the father of Methodism in OREGON, though born in Canada, became more of a Vermonter than a Canadian before going west. Following the death of his first wife Anna Marie in Oregon, Lee returned east and married Lucy Thompson, a member of the Methodist church in Barre, Vt.

The VERMONT CONFERENCE was created in 1844. Several Methodist academies were started in the state, the most important being Newbury Seminary at Newbury in 1834. VERMONT (junior) COLLEGE at Montpelier today is the descendant of Newbury Seminary.

The first Methodist theological school in America was established in Vermont. Though there was strong opposition in the denomination to theological schools, in 1839 the New England Conference called a convention to consider the establishment of such an institution. OSMON C. BAKER, principal of Newbury Seminary mentioned above, began giving theological instruction to a class of ministerial students in the same year, and in 1841 the Newbury Biblical Institute was constituted under Baker. In 1844 JOHN DEMPSTER became head of the institute. He moved it to Concord, N. H., in 1846, and the next year it was incorporated as The Methodist General Biblical Institute. In 1867 the institute was moved to BOSTON UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY.

The Vermont Conference of the M. P. Church was organized at Shelburne in February 1830 with five ministers and five lay delegates. L. Chamberlain was elected president and Chandler Walker secretary. The conference was never strong. Though listed in the Discipline as a separate conference until about 1864, the work in Vermont was allied with that in New York after about 1850. The roster of delegates to the 1854 GENERAL CONFERENCE includes one clerical and one lay delegate from the "New York and Vermont Conference." In 1877 eastern Vermont was a part of the Boston Conference (MP), while the western part of the state was included in the New York Conference. In 1854 the New York and Vermont Conference had twenty-five appointments, twenty-eight itinerant and thirty-three unstationed preachers, and 1,609 members. After about 1900 the M. P. Church had little or no organized work in the New England states.

In 1941 the Vermont Conference of The Methodist Church was absorbed by the TROY CONFERENCE. At the time the Vermont Conference had eighty-eight appointments and 11,655 members. In 1968 The Methodist Church had about 22,000 members in Vermont.

VERMONT COLLEGE, Montpelier, Vermont, a junior college for women, traces its origin to Newbury Seminary, founded at Newbury, Vermont, in 1834. It was moved to its present location in 1865, became a junior college in 1936, and in 1953 was reorganized as a junior college for women. The present name was assumed in 1958.

Newbury Seminary is remembered as one of the creative educational centers of early Methodism. It claims among its former students two presidents of NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY, the founder of theological education in The Methodist Church, JOHN DEMPSTER, and some of the ministers who opened educational institutions for Negroes following the Civil War. Outstanding among these were Richard S. Rust and Alonzo Webster. Newbury's theological department ultimately became the theological school of BOSTON UNIVERSITY. The governing board has twenty trustees: twelve are self-perpetuating and elected by the board, four by the TROY ANNUAL CONFERENCE, four by the alumni association.

JOHN O. GROSS

VERMONT CONFERENCE (ME) was created by the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1844. It was formed by dividing the NEW HAMPSHIRE and Vermont Conference. Its first session was held at Rochester, Vt., beginning June 18, 1845. At that time it had three districts, Danville, Montpelier, and Springfield; forty-five pastoral appointments; and 9,076 members. Its territory was eastern Vermont; the western part of the state which comprised the Burlington District was in the TROY CONFERENCE.

Vermont Methodism existed many years before there was a Vermont Conference. (See VERMONT.) NICHOLAS SNETHEN, the first Methodist preacher to receive an appointment to Vermont, was sent there from a conference held in CONNECTICUT. The NEW ENGLAND CONFERENCE, organized in 1797, included New York and the New England states. In 1800 the NEW YORK CONFERENCE was set off from the New England body. The New York Conference included all of Connecticut and parts of MASSACHUSETTS, Vermont, and NEW YORK. In 1804 Vermont and New Hampshire were returned to the New England Conference. Western Vermont was placed in the New York Conference in 1812 where it remained until 1833 when it became a part of the Troy Conference. Meantime, eastern Vermont went with the New Hampshire and Vermont Conference when it was created in 1829, an arrangement which continued until 1844 when the Vermont Conference was formed.

From 1847 to 1888 Vermont Methodism had a paper called the Vermont Christian Messenger. It was published part if not all of the time at Montpelier. Several academies were started, the strongest being Newbury Seminary founded at Newbury in 1834. In 1849 the Female Collegiate Institute was added to the seminary. Springfield Wesleyan Seminary was opened at Springfield in 1847. Bakersfield North Academy was launched at Bakersfield in 1844. In 1868, under the vigorous leadership of Amasa G. Button, a member of the conference who was long president of the board of trustees of Newbury Seminary, the school was moved to Montpelier, and the remnants of the other academies were consolidated with it. The name was changed to Montpelier Seminary. In the 1930's the institution almost failed, but on becoming a junior college in 1936 it took on new life and changed its name to VERMONT COLLEGE. In 1968 it had an enrollment of more than 500 with a plant valued at $3,000,000.

The first Methodist theological school in America was established at Newbury, Vt., in connection with Newbury Seminary in 1841.

Arriving at the best or most desirable conference alignment for the work in Vermont proved difficult. As indicated above, the work in western Vermont continued in the Troy Conference after the Vermont Conference was created in 1844. But the record shows that from 1860 to 1868, and again from 1880 to 1884, the Burlington District made up of the churches on the west side of the Green Mountains, was transferred to the Vermont Conference in serious attempts to unify the work in the state. Apparently the arrangement did not work well, for at the end of each period the Burlington District went back to the Troy Conference.

In 1856 the General Conference voted that Vermont

east of the Green Mountains should become a part of the NEW HAMPSHIRE CONFERENCE, provided a majority of both conferences agreed to the merger. The consolidation did not take place, and indeed nothing was done about it until eighty-four years later. The 1940 NORTH-EASTERN JURISDICTIONAL CONFERENCE directed the Vermont Conference to merge with the Troy Conference by June, 1942. The union was effected in 1941. Since that time all Methodist work in Vermont, except Canaan and Beecher Falls in the extreme northeastern part of the state, has continued in the Troy Conference.

The three Vermont districts of earlier years had been reduced to one in 1941. In the first year after the merger the Burlington District included the whole state. Subsequently the churches in southern Vermont were grouped with some New York congregations to form the Troy, later the Bennington-Troy, District, with the rest of Vermont continuing as the Burlington District.

First Church, Burlington, with about 1,300 members is the strongest Methodist congregation in the state. Rutland and St. Johnsbury have about 1,000 members each.

In 1941 the Vermont Conference had eighty-eight appointments, 11,685 members, and property valued at $1,276,710. In 1968 there were about 22,000 members of The Methodist Church in Vermont.

VERNON, M. LEROY (1838-1896), American missionary to ITALY, was born at Crawfordsville, Ind., on April 23, 1838. He was educated and converted at IOWA WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY. He married the daughter of CHARLES ELLIOT, who had advocated M.E. Church work in Italy since 1832. When the Board of Missions of that Church had accepted the principle of missions in Catholic lands (on Sept. 20, 1870, the very day that Rome fell to Victor Emmanuel), Vernon was appointed on March 14, 1871 to be missionary and superintendent of the Mission work of the M.E. Church in Italy. He based his mission first on Bologna, then (after 1874) on Rome. He left Italy in 1888, when the mission numbered 1,159 members. He died on Aug. 10, 1896.

the SOUTH CENTRAL JURISDICTION since 1940. He is author of numerous articles for the church press, as well as of Methodist Profile, William Stevenson—Riding Preacher; and Methodism Moves Across North Texas, a history of North Texas Methodism. He is author of the hymn, "God of All, Who Art Our Father," a hymn published in 1961 by the Hymn Society of America, and is the author of an article on The Methodist Church in the latest publication of The Westminster Dictionary of Christian Education. In 1962, he delivered the Fair Lectures at Southwestern Audio-Visual Workshop.

In 1953 an agency of the NATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES sent him to ten countries in Africa to aid churches there in their use of audio-visual materials. In 1958 he attended the World Convention on Christian Education, TOKYO, JAPAN. In 1963 he was given the honorary degree of Doctor of Letters by WEST VIRGINIA WESLEYAN COLLEGE. For his book, Methodism Moves Across North Texas, an Award of Merit was given in 1968 by the American Association for State and Local History.

His wife is the former Ruth Mason of Paris, Texas; their children are Walter N. Vernon, III, of Dallas, Texas, and Kathy, the wife of Rev. Stanley P. Clark, a member of the NORTH ALABAMA CONFERENCE.

VERNON, WILLIAM TECUMSEH (1871-1944), American A.M.E. clergyman and bishop, was born near Lebanon, Mo., on July 11, 1871. His father was the Rev. Adam Vernon, a slave of Colonel Miles Vernon of TENNESSEE and MISSOURI. The son attended the Old Town School in Lebanon until he was fifteen, when he entered Lincoln Institute, Jefferson City, from which he graduated in 1890. He taught school at Bonne Terre, and was school principal at Lebanon. He studied for a time in WILBERFORCE UNIVERSITY in OHIO. He was ordained in the Missouri Conference, A.M.E. Church, in 1899, and was appointed president of Western University at Kansas City, Kan. He began with one building and ten students; ten years later there were four large buildings and 400 students. He became prominent as an orator and public speaker. His fame spread, and President Theodore Roosevelt appointed him Registrar of the U. S. Treasury, one of the highest offices held by a Negro up to that time. In 1912 he was elected president of Campbell College, Jackson, Miss., where he served for four years.

In 1916 he became pastor of Avery Chapel, MEMPHIS, and became one of the most popular preachers in the city. A fervent sermon on missions at the General Conference in St. Louis in 1920 is said to be a chief factor in his election there as bishop. He was assigned to supervise A.M.E. work in SOUTH AFRICA, and went reluctantly, but found the work interesting. He established the Emily Vernon Institute in Basutoland, named in honor of his wife. He encouraged a young student, Hastings Banda, who became a protégé of his, and later a prominent political leader in Africa.

In 1924 he was assigned to the conferences in Bermuda, Nova Scotia, Ontario, MICHIGAN, ILLINOIS, and INDIANA, and in 1928 he was appointed to the six conferences in ARKANSAS. In 1932 he was suspended by the General Conference; according to Bishop R. R. WRIGHT, JR., the suspension was a political move and undeserved. But the succeeding General Conference did not restore him, and he returned to Western University to serve. He held the degrees of M.A., D.D., and LL.D., and was a thirty-third degree Mason. At least five churches are named for him. He died in July 1944, at Kansas City, Kan.

VERSAILLES, INDIANA, U.S.A. Tyson Temple is an unusual church which has been the beneficiary of an unusual benefactor. There has been a Methodist congregation in Versailles since its organization in 1834, but it achieved distinction in 1937 with the dedication of Tyson Temple, the gift of James Tyson who was born at Versailles and baptized in the Methodist Church. He learned the printer's trade, left home as a young man, and later joined with Charles R. Walgreen in the organization of the Walgreen Drug Company. Tyson, or "Uncle Jim" as he was more familiarly known, became the chief benefactor of his home town with the creation of the Tyson Trust Fund. The Trust Fund consisted of 18,000 shares of common capital stock of the Walgreen Drug Company.

Benefits received by the community from the Tyson Fund include: fifty-five percent of a $225,000 water and sewer system for the town, fifty percent of a $140,000 school which is a memorial to his father, a $50,000 library, and the $150,000 Tyson Temple which was built as a memorial to his mother, Eliza Adams Tyson. The annual income from the Tyson Trust Fund is received by and distributed by the trustees of the Tyson Versailles Fund, who are also the trustees of the Methodist church. The trustees of the church also elect three of their number to serve as the trustees of the library.

The architecture combines "Uncle Jim's" preferences in architectural styles. It has now wood in its basic construction but is built entirely of glazed brick, terra cotta, glass bricks, steel, granite, aluminum, lead and copper. The building is surmounted by a cast aluminum tower that is tipped with an aluminum cross. This cross stands 100 feet from the ground. In this tower is the bell which hung in the original church used by the congregation. James Tyson's mother had been a charter member of this first church.

Columns flank the entrance of the church and other columns stand at either side of the chancel. The dome over the chancel is covered with gold leaf and the archway with silver leaf. The ceiling of the church is painted a light blue and is studded with silver stars. These stars are said to be representative of the sky around Versailles in October at the time of Uncle Jim's mother's death. Although offerings are received as normally in a church, this was not Uncle Jim's intention. Instead he had a hollow metal post with a slot in the top installed in the vestibule of the church to receive any offerings that worshippers cared to make.

The Tyson Fund also provides for the maintenance of the church and the library.

VEVERS, WILLIAM (1791-1850), British preacher and writer, was born in 1791, became a Wesleyan itinerant in 1813, and governor of the Wesleyan Collegiate Institution, Taunton, in 1849. He was the author of a number of books and pamphlets, including The National Importance of Methodism, a vindication of Methodist loyalty and patriotism; and A Defence of the Discipline of Methodism, in reply to the criticisms of SAMUEL WARREN. Vevers died at Taunton, Somerset, England, on Sept. 8, 1850.

G. E. LONG

VICK, NEWIT (1766-1819), American Methodist pioneer and local preacher who founded Vicksburg, Miss. The more "Norman-English" surname of Le Vieke lives on in our American surname of "Vicks" and "Viek." From the Robert and Nicholas Le Vieke line of Huguenots came the founder of Vicksburg, who was born March 17, 1766, in Southampton County, Va., and died Aug. 5, 1819 in MISSISSIPPI.

His father was William Vick the second, and his mother was Martha Boykin—both of early colonial families—and they had nine children, all born in Southampton County, Va. One of these was Newit Vick, born in 1766.

In 1791 Newit Vick married Elizabeth Clarke, born in 1772 in Northampton County, N. C., the daughter of James Clarke. They lived for several years in VIRGINIA where four of their children were born. Late in 1799 Newit Vick moved with his family down into NORTH CAROLINA with the idea of eventually establishing a permanent residence in the great southwest, the Mississippi Territory. For more than five years he lived in North Carolina. Three of his children were born in that state.

Before 1806 he left North Carolina, going overland until reaching Muscle Shoals, Ala. There he purchased a keel boat and with his family, slaves and material possessions floated down the Tennessee River into the Mississippi and landed at the mouth of Coles Creek on the line of Jefferson and Adams Counties, in southern Mississippi. After a short time of prospecting there, he settled on a valuable tract of land twenty miles from NATCHEZ and five miles west of the present town of Fayette. He named this place "Spring Hill."

In November 1813, the first Methodist Conference for the Mississippi area was held there in Vick's home, his commodious two-story brick residence being suitable for the lodging of the ten ministers who were to attend. Members of his family have often pointed with pride to the large mahogany dining table around which these God-fearing men then conferred in their plans to spread the Gospel of Christ. N. Vick Robbins, a great-grandson, in the 1920's marked this spot with a marble shaft to commemorate this conference, and the site of his ancestor's home.

To the Mississippi Territory Newit Vick brought the same zeal and fervor for historic Christianity that he had shown in Virginia for sixteen years before coming to Mississippi. There he had labored for the advancement of Christianity as a Methodist, and this he continued to do to the time of his death. He was known as a "LOCAL PREACHER" and was called Reverend Newit Vick, though apparently he was never regularly ordained. Certainly he was not a "circuit rider," as some have written, nor was he a "poor Methodist preacher," as others have stated. Legal records in Virginia and Mississippi document this.

At his "Spring Hill" home, five of his children were born, John Wesley Vick being the first, born March 1806.

By the year 1814, Newit Vick made the decision to move up the Mississippi to higher ground, for the land near Natchez had been subject to the periodic overflows of the Mississippi River. There were no steamboats then and so overland by Indian trails they journeyed until they reached the northeastern part of what is now Warren County. There they settled upon a tract of land that Vick called "Openwoods" because of the sparse growth of timber and canebrake. The ground was high above the Mississippi River.

Accompanying Vick and his family was his wife's nephew, Foster Cook, who had also lived in the vicinity of "Spring Hill." Foster Cook's widow in time married Judge James Bland, who was the great-grandfather of Bishop NOLAN B. HARMON. The Vicks and Cooks located on fine tracts of land and soon around them several families of relatives came from Virginia. Other Virginians likewise came to remain there for their entire lives.

Vick was the first "local preacher" to come to the MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE, and he was also the first minister to proclaim the Gospel in the northern half of Warren County. Before this time the settlements had been made south and southeast of "Walnut Hills." The way being fairly well open now into this heretofore wilderness, other settlers came to the area near the lower Yazoo bluffs.

Newit Vick possessed real leadership. He had the mind of a statesman who realized his responsibility to the Triune God. Mature, practical judgment was his and he acquired other tracts of land besides "Openwoods," including that upon which Vicksburg now largely stands. He laid off several streets near the river, and elsewhere, sold some lots for commercial use, and in his will provided land for Vicksburg to have a "commons" on the riverfront for the use of its citizens.

He himself gave the name of "Vicksburg" to this budding town in honor of his ancient family name. The city block where the old court house now stands was chosen as the site for his town home. Although busily engaged in this project, he was always diligent in the cause of Methodism and he and other settlers built a log church on the old Benton road as a place of worship.

In August of 1819, Vick and his wife were stricken with yellow fever. They both died the same day, Aug. 5, 1819, and are buried in their private cemetery on the "Openwoods" tract.

Newit Vick left a lengthy will, dated Aug. 2, 1819, making provision for all his family and other bequests. Unfortunately the will was contested by some members of the family and in the final decision the City of Vicksburg was deprived of his bequest of the tract of land that was to be a "Commons" on the riverfront "forever."

This man of God had received a priceless heritage from his forebears and now his mantle was to fall upon the shoulders of his descendants, among whom this writer rejoices to have a place.

VICKSBURG, MISSISSIPPI, U.S.A., is an old, historic city, occupying a commanding situation on the Mississippi River, and one of great importance in the earlier history of the United States. This was due to its key position in river travel, which was the only important travel in that earlier day.

Methodism in Vicksburg antedated the naming of the city. TOBIAS GIBSON, after arriving in the MISSISSIPPI Territory via flatboat, organized a church at Warrenton (about four miles from what is now the center of Vicksburg), and named it "Hopewell." There services were held until 1822. At a slightly earlier date, in 1814, the "Redbone" church was built about twelve or fourteen miles below Vicksburg, and inland from the river. The records call this church "Bethel" but the local people have always known it as "the Redbone church." About the year 1854 a brick edifice was built by two brothers, Joel and Benjamin Sellers Hullum, the former a Presbyterian and the latter a Methodist. Benjamin Sellers donated three bricks to one by his brother Joel, the agreement being that the church was to be used three Sundays for the Methodists and one for the Presbyterians. It was built by slaves and was used by Union soldiers during the siege of Vicksburg in 1863 as a hospital for their wounded and sick.

Tobias Gibson was emphatically the father of Methodism in Mississippi, arriving there in 1799. In 1814 NEWIT VICK and Foster Cook, his nephew, having migrated to Warren County, erected a neat church in the "Openwoods" settlement, seven miles from the present city of Vicksburg. The Methodist Church in Vicksburg proper may be said to have commenced in 1820, when John Lane, a Methodist preacher, laid off the town. Services were held in a blacksmith shop, and also in the private residences of Newit Vick and John Lane. In 1825 Vicksburg was included in the appointments of the MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE as the Warren Circuit. In 1830 it was left "to be supplied." The first church of which we have any record in Vicksburg proper stood at the corner of Grove and Cherry Streets, the deed being dated July 27, 1837. In 1846 the Grove and Cherry Streets Church was given to the colored Methodists (then slaves) as a place of worship.

April 7, 1846, John Wesley Vick and wife, Catherine Ann Barber, conveyed to the M.E. Church, South, just organized, the lot at the corner of Crawford and Cherry Streets. A stately brick church was erected there which the congregation occupied for more than a half century. It was dedicated in 1850 by the noted WILLIAM WINANS, and has long been known as "Crawford Street." During the historic siege of Vicksburg a cannonball from the Union gunboats was embedded in the back of this building and remained there after the surrender until the building was torn down in 1899. The church was held by the U.S. Army from 1863 to 1865. The cannonball is said to be in the Archives of the State of Mississippi, at Jackson.

Among the distinguished pastors who served Vicksburg were CHARLES K. MARSHALL, who made his home there in his latter years, and CHARLES B. GALLOWAY, who was elected bishop shortly after he left Vicksburg to become editor of the New Orleans Christian Advocate. When Charles B. Galloway became pastor in 1877, he was only twenty-eight and Crawford Street was then perhaps the strongest Methodist church in Mississippi. In the summer of 1878, yellow fever became epidemic in Vicksburg, and both the young pastor and his wife came near dying of the dread disease.

During the pastorate of A. F. Watkins, 1896-1900, the historic old church structure was replaced by a stately building in keeping with the growth of the congregation.

Bishop Galloway dedicated this church May 27, 1902. This building was destroyed by fire April 5, 1925, during the pastorate of G. H. Thompson. The edifice now standing is the result of the work and constructive activities of the loyal members and the able building committee of Crawford Street.

On May 9, 1887, the trustees of Crawford Street Church bought a lot on Shorter Mulberry Street, during the pastorate of R. J. Jones, and a small church was there erected. It was known as the South Vicksburg Church. Nolan B. Harmon, Sr. was the first pastor assigned to this mission church. It grew rapidly and in 1902 a new church was built on Washington Street. During the pastorate of W. H. Saunders in 1914 the present Gibson Memorial Church was completed. The work of enlarging the auditorium and building a substantial Sunday school annex was done in 1948.

T. O. Prewitt, when Superintendent of the Vicksburg District in 1951, was instrumental in beginning Hawkins Church on Halls Ferry Road. A number of faithful Methodists from Crawford Street Church, W. A. Tyson then being pastor, formed the nucleus of this new church. It has grown rapidly and a Sunday school annex has been added to the main building.

In 1951 T. O. Prewitt was also instrumental in the beginning of the Northview Church on Sky Farm Avenue. The Church was first located on Openwood Street and called "Springfield," but in 1954 a large plot of ground was secured on Sky Farm, where a neat church and Sunday school annex now stand.

Representing the Negro Methodists in Vicksburg, the A.M.E. CHURCH is perhaps the oldest. In 1846 its congregation occupied the building at the corner of Cherry and Grove Streets, which had been given to them by the founders of Crawford Street. At the present time they have a membership of about 300. The Wesley Church, formerly in the CENTRAL JURISDICTION of The Methodist Church, has a membership presently of 100. It dates its history back to 1859, and celebrated its 111th anniversary, with Bishop E. J. PENDERGRASS and other ministers taking part in the ceremonies on Nov. 5, 1970.

METROPOLITAN CHURCH, VICTORIA, BRITISH COLUMBIA

VICTORIA, Canada, Metropolitan Church. In February 1859, a team of missionaries from the CANADA CONFERENCE

ENCE, led by that indomitable veteran, EPHRAIM EVANS, reached Victoria, capital of British Columbia. At that time Victoria was a town of 3,000 people, but it had no Protestant churches. Within a month of his arrival, Evans began to make plans for a church. With the help of Governor Sir James Douglas, land was secured and in May 1860, the new church was opened. Thirty years later a new Metropolitan was built at the corner of Pandora and Quadra streets; a stone Gothic structure, it would accommodate 1,800 people.

From 1890 onward, under the leadership of men such as Solomon Cleaver, C. T. Scott, H. S. Osborne, and W. J. SIPPRELL, the Metropolitan Church played an effective role in establishing Methodism firmly in Victoria. Its people would encourage the foundation of several other Methodist churches, such as Centennial, Wesley, James Bay, and Victoria. With Union it became Metropolitan United Church, and in this new form has continued to keep alive the Methodist tradition in the flourishing capital of British Columbia.

VICTORIA AND TASMANIA CONFERENCE. Tasmania.

The first Methodist service was held in Hobart, Tasmania in 1820, when a Cornish minister, BENJAMIN CARVOSSO, preached on the steps of the court house from the text, "Awake thou that sleepest, arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light." His wife stood beside him and led the singing. In his four days' visit before proceeding to SYDNEY, New South Wales, Carvosso included a service for the prisoners who were numerous in those early convict days. A few Methodist laymen afterwards organized CLASS MEETINGS in Hobart.

In 1821, SAMUEL LEIGH, the pioneer missionary in Sydney, called at Hobart on his return from furlough in England. He appointed William Horton and NATHANIEL TURNER to establish preaching places in the town and inland districts also. By 1832 Methodism had spread to the north of the island and a minister was appointed to Launceston where the leading layman was Henry Reed. Reed was not only a devoted LOCAL PREACHER but a merchant of substance and a foundation director of the Bank of Australasia. JOSEPH ORTON became chairman of the new district of Tasmania (then called Van Diemen's Land) in 1835.

Wesley Church, Hobart, was built in the style of Wesley's Chapel, City Road, LONDON, in the early days of the settlement and is still the center of worship in southern Tasmania. Paterson Street Church, Launceston, with its lofty spire, has a commanding place in the northern city.

Victoria. The first settlers in Victoria crossed Bass Strait from Launceston in 1835. One of the first party was Henry Reed of Launceston. Evidently he preached the first sermon, in the open air, in the future city of Melbourne.

Henry Reed's effort was followed by the visit of Joseph Orton in 1836. He was the first ordained minister of any denomination to preach in MELBOURNE. Among the early settlers in Melbourne were William Witton, local preacher, and John Peers, musician and choirmaster. Two others were James Dredge and Edward Stone Parker, Methodists who were sent by the Government to be Protectors of the Aborigines. WILLIAM WITTON was the first class leader; afterwards he became a home missionary and travelled extensively in the western district and Gippsland in the east.

Francis Tuckfield established missionary work among the Aborigines in the Geelong-Colac area where the Government made a grant of 64,000 acres for the purpose. It was called Buntingdale, after JABEZ BUNTING, the renowned Methodist leader in England. Tuckfield found it impossible to induce the nomadic Aborigines to settle to farming or to give him an opportunity for evangelism and education. After some years, covetous squatters persuaded the Government to withdraw the grant of land. It was not through any slackness on Tuckfield's part that this effort failed.

After using a temporary church in 1840, the Methodists erected a solid building in the main thoroughfare of Melbourne, Collins Street, in 1841. It was largely the work of John Peers, who obtained a pipe organ also. Not long afterwards Joseph Orton, worn out by his exertions, was obliged to return to England but died when the ship was rounding Cape Horn. The first resident superintendent of the Melbourne circuit was Samuel Wilkinson. The earnestness of the preachers and the zeal of their congregations led to conversions and the spread of the Methodist witness throughout Victoria.

Discovery of Gold. The gold rush which began in 1851 brought a great change to Victoria. Goldiggers poured in from all parts of the world. Many settlers left their farms and workers in the towns gave up their employment. All flocked to the diggings in Ballarat, Bendigo and other places. The arrivals from overseas averaged 1,800 weekly, this continuing for some years.

The influx of migrants led to the establishment of the Wesleyan Immigrants Home on two acres in Carlton, a Melbourne suburb, given by the Government. Migrants were met on shipboard and any without shelter, money or friends received accommodation and assistance.

Victoria became a separate colony from New South Wales in 1851. The first District Meeting or Synod for Victoria was held the same year, with William Butters as Chairman. He proved a wise and energetic administrator in the unusual conditions. Butters appealed to England for more ministers because of the swollen population. Methodism provided the first resident minister on the goldfields at this time.

Many of the miners were from Cornwall, the English county conspicuous in Methodist history from the time of JOHN WESLEY. Some of these Cornishmen were local preachers and they began prayer meetings and services. Passersby were attracted very often by the Cornish miners' singing of hymns in their tents.

A noted visitor to Victoria at this time was Robert Young, commissioned by the British Conference to report on the work in AUSTRALIA and the South Seas. The result of his visit was the separation of Australasian Methodism from Britain in 1855. Young was instrumental also in securing for Victoria a considerable increase in the number of ministers from England.

The first Conference in 1855 appointed DANIEL DRAPER to be Chairman in Victoria. Draper was not only a zealous preacher and an indefatigable organizer but also a builder of churches.

Draper's most notable building was the fine Gothic structure, Wesley Church, Melbourne, the cathedral church of the denomination in Victoria ever since it was erected in 1858. Many stately churches in Victoria and other States bear witness to Draper's enterprise. He was lost in the S. S. London, in the Bay of Biscay in January 1866, while returning from a visit to England; he conducted prayer meetings with the passengers until the ship sank.

The visit of WILLIAM TAYLOR, the American evangelist, in 1863 brought revival scenes to Tasmania and Victoria, with lasting effects.

Home Missions and Development. After the gold rush had subsided more attention was given to agriculture and the subdividing of land enabled more families to develop the country. Wherever settlements arose Methodist preachers accompanied the people. Methodist causes spread through the forests of Gippsland and the wheat areas of the Wimmera. In some districts there were no other preachers but the Methodists who almost lived in the saddle, like John Wesley and his preachers and the circuit-riders in America. Many services were held in farm houses, wool sheds and the open air.

In 1875 the Conference established the Home Mission Society to cope with the extension of this work through country districts. The first General Secretary was JOHN WATSFORD, who had been a missionary in Fiji and whose venerable appearance earned him the name of "Father" Watsford. As a fervent evangelist he stamped the imprint of his personality upon the life of Methodism in Victoria.

Five local preachers were recruited and sent out as Home Missionaries in 1875, and within fifteen years there were sixty agents supported by the Home Mission Society. Some of these remained in the work for the rest of their active years; others prepared for the ordained ministry. In many cases Home Mission stations progressed to reach the status of circuits. Since the decline in population in some rural areas in the middle of the twentieth century, there have been amalgamations.

Since 1953 the work has been under the direction of the Department of Home Missions and Church Extension (including the Church Building Committee). New housing estates have been provided for and consolidation of the work everywhere has been planned and achieved, often in consultation with other denominations to avoid overlapping.

Hospital and prison chaplaincy work has been faithfully directed. Victorian DEACONESSES sponsored by the Home Mission Department have been growing in numbers and effectiveness.

The Victoria and Tasmania Conference in recent years has adopted the policy of separating some Chairmen of Districts from circuit responsibility. More of these "pastors of pastors" would have been appointed if finance permitted.

In 1967 a Department of Lay Training, affiliated with Home Missions, was established to raise standards of theological knowledge among Methodist laymen.

Notable service has been given to the Home Mission Department over the years by its leaders, including E. S. Bickford, A. T. HOLDEN, T. C. Rentoul and A. W. Pederick. Holden was in charge of this work from 1904 until his death in 1935. Pederick retired in 1967 after twenty-one years' leadership in the Department. While maintaining vigilant supervision of the work of Home Missions in Victoria, Holden, Rentoul and Pederick, in succession, have directed the work of the Federal Inland Mission through the remote areas of the north and center of the continent.

City Missions and Immigration. As with all large cities throughout the world, Melbourne has had special needs in its inner areas. Wesley Church, in the heart of the city, became a Mission in 1893, with A. R. Edgar as Superintendent. Other Superintendents included S. J. Hoban, A. McCallum and Sir Irving Benson. A striking statue of John Wesley in front of Wesley Church typifies the spirit of the Mission; Wesley is shown with riding boots and preaching gown.

Sir Irving Benson, the only Methodist minister in the world who has been knighted, retired in 1967 after a ministry of forty-two years at Wesley Church and the Mission. Not only in length but in widespread influence his ministry was unique.

The Central Mission includes the Boys' Training Farm at Tally-ho, Princess Mary Club and Moreland Hostels for girls, old people's home, a friendless men's refuge, and a home for unmarried mothers. Similar work of Christian service has been done in other inner areas—Collingwood, Fitzroy, Carlton, Prahran, North Melbourne, South Melbourne. In connection with all these Missions most devoted work has been accomplished by the Sisterhood.

Work among needy children began in 1891 with the Children's Home at Cheltenham. This developed into "Orana" Peace Memorial Homes, Burwood, after the 1939-45 war, a model institution visited by child care experts from far afield, with its cottages and chapel. The family of the late Fred J. Cato was prominent in supporting this work. Keith Mathieson has been the superintendent for the past twenty years in the Department of Child Care.

The Babies' Home owed its inspiration to young laymen in 1929; Oswald Barnett and Douglas Thomas were among the leaders. Epworth Hospital was established in 1920. The church has developed homes for the aged in various parts of Victoria and Tasmania, under the Department of Adult Care directed by W. J. Johnson. Especially in the last twenty years these have multiplied and are filling a strong-felt need.

Immigration. The Immigrants' Home did not long survive the influx of goldiggers in the middle of the last century. After serving thousands of needy migrants it was closed in 1860.

In the post-war period, with large-scale European migration, the Methodist Church has revived its concern for migrants. T. C. Rentoul, Superintendent of Home Missions and Chaplain-General of the Military Forces, drew up a plan in 1945 just before he died. The first migrant chaplain to England in 1949 was A. W. Pederick, Superintendent of Home Missions. The work is now attached to the Department of Adult Care, under the leadership of W. J. Johnson. Much has been done to provide homes for British migrants through the indefatigable efforts of Howard Dunn and others. Similar work has been done amongst non-British migrants; many scores of these, particularly White Russians at Dandenong, have been provided with homes through the earnest efforts of Mr. and Mrs. A. R. Williams of that city.

W. J. Trewin, who speaks Italian and Spanish, went to Italy for two years to become better acquainted with the needs of migrants from Italy, and he now has a special mission for these people in Melbourne. Through the use of the simultaneous translation system at the Church of All Nations at Carlton, N. C. Lowe has been able to bring the message of the Gospel and offer Christian help to large numbers of non-English-speaking migrants.

Overseas Missions. In 1839 a missionary meeting was held, the first, it is believed, of any denomination in Melbourne. The inspiration came from Francis Tuckfield, the devoted pioneer to the Aborigines at Buntingdale.

Methodist pioneers were determined to support the outreach of their denomination everywhere. This infant society, the Port Phillip Branch Methodist Missionary Society, was the forerunner of Methodist Overseas Missions. Not only gifts but workers, as time went on, were sent to the South Seas.

Early missionaries from Victoria included John Whewell to Tonga in 1859, and Martin Dyson to SAMOA in 1857. Fiji, notorious for cannibalism, received notable Victorians such as Frederick Langham (1858-95), translator of the Fijian Bible; Lorimer Fison, missionary-anthropologist; C. O. Lelean (1902-38); R. L. McDonald (1908-36).

The work in North INDIA was served by such Victorians as T. Clement Carne (from 1915), Austin James (1925-58), and S. I. Weeks.

The pioneer of our work in PAPUA in 1891 was a Victorian, W. E. BROMLOW, known for his translation work; another, in later years, was A. W. Gny (twenty-three years). In New Britain, Victoria was represented by a pioneer, Benjamin Danks, and the veteran W. H. Cox (thirty years). Malaria and other tropical diseases made service in Papua and New Britain more hazardous.

Revived work for the Aborigines in North Australia, soundly based on anthropological research, has been done in this century by our Church; a prominent Victorian was Arthur Ellemor.

Medical missions have been devotedly served by Victorians including Dr. H. G. Judkins in Papua, Drs. Edward, Edna and Adelaide Gault in India, and Dr. Olive Long in Fiji.

No States in Australia have done more than Victoria and Tasmania for educational as well as evangelistic work overseas; Leslie Thompson, Arthur Adamson, Dr. Cyril Cato, Harold Chambers, Miss Olive Morrissey, Miss F. J. Pearce are only a few who gave educational leadership in various fields.

In "Shangri-la," the vast Papua-New Guinea Highlands, unknown until thirty years ago, pioneer work, rightly regarded as romantic, has been done by Methodists. A large primitive population is being reached. A Victorian, John Hutton, has been one of those used by God for the conversion of thousands since our work began in the Highlands in 1950.

The Women's Auxiliary, Laymen's Missionary Movement and Young Women's Missionary Movement have loyally supported Overseas Mission work with prayer, gifts and service.

Young People's Work. Sunday school work began immediately after the first Methodist services were held in 1835, as early records give witness.

Great advances in teaching methods have been used in the present century. With the secularization of Sunday and increasing materialism in the community more difficulties have been encountered in maintaining attendances and interest. In spite of this, Methodist Sunday school and general youth work has been actively and successfully promoted.

The Sunday School Department began in 1873. Its name has been changed several times and is now the Department of Christian Education. A new programme envisaging education for adults as well as those of younger ages was introduced in 1970. All these efforts have been effectively directed by a succession of able ministers set apart by Conference, some of whom received inspiration from their studies in America, these including Dr. Clifford Wright.

The Christian Endeavour Society has been a vital part of youth work but in some places has been replaced by new activities. The Methodist Youth Fellowship, for general youth work, has become popular. Summer Camps have been most profitable for leadership training as well as physical and spiritual recreation.

Cooperation with the Presbyterian Church has developed in various fields, and in none has this been more fruitful than in the production of Graded Lessons for Sunday Schools through the Joint Board established over forty years ago. In recent years these Lessons have been adopted by the Congregational Church also and accepted in New Zealand and other places outside Australia. The Headquarters of this work has been in Melbourne.

Religious instruction in state schools has been an inter-denominational enterprise in Victoria. The Council of Christian Education in Schools, supported by seven denominations, has provided an agreed syllabus for the use of ministers and other accredited agents. Since 1950 the subject of Religious Instruction has been recognized as part of the school curriculum by the State Education Department. Several of the Directors of the Council have been Methodist ministers.

Social Witness. Through its Department of Christian Citizenship (formerly called the Social Service Department) and the forum offered every week by Wesley Church, Melbourne, in its broadcast, Pleasant Sunday Afternoon, our Church has been able to exercise a positive influence towards the solution of social problems.

Liquor, gambling, the sweating evil in industry, have been some of the questions dealt with. Flagrant evils, such as backyard totalisator betting, have been trenchantly exposed. Governments have been influenced by the work of the Department and the publicity given through Wesley Church P.S.A. Leadership has been given also in the discussion of international affairs.

From 1900 to the present day the Methodist Church in Victoria has given a clear witness for social righteousness through the utterances of such leaders as T. S. B. Woodfull, G. A. Judkins, H. Palmer Phillips, J. W. R. Westernman, and an outstanding layman in the early years of this century, W. H. Judkins.

Methodist Union. After the Wesleys had begun work in 1835, a few members of the other Methodist bodies gradually came to Victoria and, in loyalty to their upbringing in the Homeland, they determined that they must have a separate Methodist existence in the new land.

PRIMITIVE METHODISTS established a society in 1849. Characteristically, they began operations in the open air at Flagstaff Hill where a mob of hooligans attacked them. A minister, John Ride, came in 1850. Through the days of the gold rush the Primitives carried on aggressive and successful evangelistic work including camp meetings in country districts.

Small causes from the UNITED METHODIST FREE CHURCHES began in Victoria in 1851.

THE BIBLE CHRISTIANS, whose strongholds were in Cornwall and Devon, were represented in Victoria from 1856 onwards. It was chiefly in the goldfields that Bible Christians were found although, even there, they were not as numerous as their fellow-denominationalists in the copper mines of South Australia.

The last was the METHODIST NEW CONNEXION in 1865, with only one church, at North Richmond. In 1888 it was accepted into the Wesleyan Methodist Church.

For some years it had been apparent to many members of the smaller bodies that union was both desirable and inevitable. On the Wesleyan side there was some reluctance. By 1884 the Wesleyan Conference in Victoria had decided to open negotiations for a Basis of Union but progress was slow.

W. H. FITCHETT was the leader of the Union movement in Victoria and in the Australasian General Conference. It was actually in Victoria that more opposition came from the strongly-entrenched and somewhat conservative Wesleyans. There was much distress when, in 1897, the Victorian Wesleyan Conference failed to get a two-thirds majority in the voting for union. Very quickly this position was reversed in 1898. As the other denominations had agreed upon union no obstacles were left; and a Methodist Union Bill was passed by the Victorian Parliament to give property rights to the united church.

In 1902 the united Conference was held in Wesley Church, Melbourne. The Methodist Church of Australasia came into being with great acclamations and high hopes. (The name "Australasia" was retained even after NEW ZEALAND became independent in 1913; it was felt that the work in the Pacific Islands justified the continued use of the full geographical title.)

Membership since 1902 has not kept pace with the growth of population. The growing secularist spirit has not been adequately met, even by a united Methodist Church. Yet it would have been unthinkable for the followers of John Wesley to have remained divided.

Statistics for the Victoria and Tasmania Conference as of May 1969, are as follows: Number of ministers in active work, 321; Number of churches, 848; Number of members, 55,586.

VICTORIA UNIVERSITY, Canada (and Canadian moves in higher education). In 1829, less than a year after the M.E. Church in CANADA became independent of its mother church in the United States, it launched two major projects: a newspaper to advance its views and a seminary to educate its young people. The paper, The Christian Guardian, was in operation within three months of the Conference's decision to publish it, under the editorship of EGERTON RYERSON. The seminary took longer to establish.

Education in Upper Canada was, in Ryerson's words, largely for "a wealthy few of a particular creed." The governor and ruling clique assumed that the Church of England was the established church of the young colony and intended that higher education in Upper Canada should be under the control of that church and supported by a state endowment. A royal charter had been granted in 1827 for the establishment of King's College in York (now TORONTO) under the control of the Church of England and requiring that its professors subscribe to the Thirty-nine ARTICLES OF RELIGION. The college was to have the support of a large endowment provided by the Crown for education in Upper Canada. It was even stated by Archdeacon John Strachan, the president-designate, that the college was to be a missionary institution to bring as many as possible of the people of the province into communion with the Church of England. But in a province where less than a quarter of the population were Anglicans, the venture was so unpopular that the opening of the college was delayed until 1843, after the charter had been modified along more liberal lines.

The Methodists were not disposed to acquiesce in the preservation of aristocratic privilege in education. Many of them were United Empire Loyalists, but they had come under the influence of American democratic ideals. Contrary to the belief of many of the ruling class that a university under Anglican control was necessary to train citizens who would be loyal to Britain and British institutions, the Methodists refused to acknowledge that they needed lessons in loyalty and that the Church of England had any right to monopolize education in the province. And they believed, with the Colonial Secretary, that the country must make the university and not the university the country.

As it was, scores of young Canadian Methodists were students at American institutions, and since the active and thriving Methodists were derisively labeled "Yankee republicans" and "disloyal levelers," it was clearly advisable that they should have their own college in Canada. They therefore sought and obtained a royal charter in 1836—the first ever granted to a non-Anglican institution—and in June of that year the Upper Canada Academy was opened in the town of Cobourg. Although the Charter gave university powers, it was thought wise to begin at a subcollege level and as a coeducational institution.

By the time Upper and Lower Canada were united in 1841, the academy had achieved considerable success. But already there were three other church colleges in the planning stage, and the Methodists were agreed that it was time they undertook teaching at the university level. An act was proclaimed in August, 1841, incorporating the academy as "Victoria College" (so named for Queen Victoria), and in October teaching began on the college level. The college was no longer coeducational. Young men requiring secondary education were provided for in a preparatory department, and the young women were taken care of in private schools in Cobourg.

The Conference had resolved in 1830 that its "seminary of learning" should be "purely a literary institution" where "no system of theology shall be taught . . . , but all students shall be free to embrace and pursue any religious creed, and attend any place of worship, their parents or guardians may direct." (Sissons, p. 6.) This resolution must be interpreted in the light of the royal charter, where it is expressly stated that the purpose of the academy is "for the general Education of Youth, in the various branches of Literature and Science on Christian principles." By "system of theology" the founding fathers appear to have meant a denominational theology imposed willy-nilly on staff and students. The Canadian Methodists had two convictions: first, that education must not be purely secular, or, as expressed by Ryerson in his inaugural address as principal in 1841, that "the fundamental principles of Christian theology be taught to all students"; and, second, that adherence to any particular theology and attendance at worship should not be required of teachers or students. The establishment of Upper Canada Academy along these lines was one of the first effective blows struck in the province for the cause of religious liberty.

It has often been assumed that the Methodist Church founded Victoria University chiefly for the training of Methodist ministers, but this was not the case. To begin with, for the Methodists of that time, sound conversion mattered more than formal education. Fitness for the ministry meant the preaching ability and fervor of the converted, and it was the view of many that education could do little to improve it. But in addition, it was precisely those who had this ability whom the Conference wanted to keep on circuits. The church was deeply involved in winning the frontier; it was committed to the evangelization of a nation that was in the building. There were some who doubted the need of an educated ministry, but the church as a whole was primarily concerned to organize itself to meet the pressing claims of its nationwide task.

It was not until 1842 that probationers were appointed to attend college, and then only at their own request, and only one or two attended each year until 1854. Those who did attend took the regular arts course. From the beginning such subjects as Christian evidences and apologetics, with the reading of the Greek New Testament and the Hebrew Bible, were part of the arts course. As time went on, special courses in divinity were given, but the faculty of divinity was the last of the four faculties to be established at Victoria.

The faculty of arts made steady progress over the years, depending on such development of the curriculum as finances and the supply of teachers permitted. Teachers were seldom imported. The usual method was to place a young graduate under appointment and send him away to study for a year or two. Thus, in 1892, Victoria had eleven professors, all Canadian-born, and departments of classics, oriental (Near-Eastern) languages, mathematics, science, English, modern languages, and ethics. Other subjects such as Christian evidences, church history, and biblical introduction were taught in arts by the faculty of theology. Federation (see below) brought the transfer of mathematics and science to the University of Toronto, and at the same time the department of religious knowledge was added to the faculty of arts. In recent years there has been some expansion of the subjects taught in arts at Victoria by a system of "cross appointments" with the University of Toronto, so that now some modern history, Spanish, and philosophy are also taught there.

Another faculty was added to Victoria when the Toronto School of Medicine was disjoined from the University of Toronto in 1854. Similarly, the Montreal School of Medicine and Surgery came under the wing of Victoria in 1866. The teaching continued to be carried on in Toronto and Montreal, and almost the only function of Victoria University was to confer the degrees. A more indigenous development took place when a faculty of law was instituted in 1860. Victoria continued to give the degrees of bachelor and doctor of laws until federation with the University of Toronto, when it handed over its students in both medicine and law to that university.

The teaching of science had progressed to such an extent that a chair of natural science was established in 1849, and in 1857 a faculty of science was set up and the degree of bachelor of science was offered.

Theology became a department of the faculty of arts in 1871, and in 1872 a two-year course for probationers and a four-year course leading to the bachelor of divinity degree were announced. Finally, the faculty of theology was formed in 1873, with NATHANIEL BURWASH as dean and professor of theology. In 1892 there were seventy-nine students in theology; in 1893, 121; and by 1915, 226. In 1874 only one professor gave his full time to teaching in the faculty of theology, the others being professors in arts doing part-time teaching in theology. But by 1916 the faculty of theology had five professors and three lecturers, with five others giving about one-half of their time to theological teaching.

Victoria College had scarcely received university powers when an attempt was made by the government to consolidate the institutions of higher learning in the province, of which there were now four, each belonging to a major denomination. Three of these were in financial difficulties. The other, King's College, was endowed by lands intended for grammar schools and seminaries of higher learning. In the view of their supporters the other colleges had as much right as King's to government grants and endowments. But when the government proposed to create one university comprising the four colleges, no one was happy about the terms. King's objected to any partnership, especially if it involved sharing its monopoly of government support. Victoria and Queen's objected that they were to lose their autonomy, probably also the teaching of arts, and all this with no clear provision of government support. Fortunately the government resigned before the bill came to its final reading.

Victoria's position was clear. The Methodist Church had a deep interest in higher education; it claimed to have an inalienable responsibility for the education of its youth. It believed also that higher education should not be separated from nurture in Christian faith, although it rejected the idea of religious tests or indoctrination. On these premises, along with its belief in religious equality, it fought consistently for fifty years before a satisfactory provincial scheme of university consolidation and support was worked out.

The second major attempt, which involved the secularization of King's College, again pleased no one and led to the foundation by Strachan of a new Anglican college. The proposal was rejected by Victoria as a "god-less" measure.

The third attempt, the University Act of 1853, had much in its favor, but the affiliated colleges, which were to share "any surplus of the . . . University Income Fund," did not receive such support because a surplus was in fact never allowed to exist. Dissatisfaction with the administration of this act smoldered for years and broke out in increasingly insistent demands for the establishment of one university with control of the curriculum and examinations and with authority to confer degrees, in which the colleges would be equal partners equally supported by public funds. The situation became even more serious when, with confederation of the provinces in 1867, education was turned over to provincial jurisdiction, and the government of Ontario declined to continue the grants to denominational colleges which had been made annually for some years. In the following year, representatives of the colleges drew up a petition to the Legislature requesting "that effect be given to the intention of the University Act of 1853," and including a much-improved scheme for the organization of the university. But the Legislature refused to act on the petition, and fifteen more years passed before another strong move was made to form a federated university.

Meanwhile, in spite of financial troubles which required a campaign to retire a debt of $30,000 and build an endowment of $100,000, Victoria took advantage of the flowing tide of scientific progress and increased its staff and facilities for the teaching of science. In 1877 it opened Faraday Hall as the center of its studies in science, which was at that time the only building in the province devoted exclusively to scientific work. Very soon all the universities in the province began to realize that the desired progress in teaching and research in science would require vastly increased support by the government. Under this impulse, several prominent university administrators, of whom it may be said that President Burwash of Victoria was the foremost, began to think of the "provincial university" as a federation of colleges based on a division of the curriculum so that the costly work in science and in other subjects might be borne by the university proper with increased provincial support, while the denominational colleges would enjoy the full tuition fee and their students would have free tuition in university subjects. This was the essence of the scheme that came into effect in 1890, when Victoria entered into federation with the University of Toronto. Two other colleges—Trinity (Anglican) and St. Michael's (Roman Catholic)—entered later. It is this scheme, somewhat improved but substantially the same, that still obtains in the University of Toronto.

Victoria was not put on easy street by federation. In fact a campaign for $450,000 by the Methodist Church was necessary in order to provide buildings in Toronto and increase Victoria's endowment. Campaigns for funds have been required since, too, but Victoria has prospered because it has refused to depart from the sound principles in which it was founded. It consistently refused to give up its arts program and become a theological satellite of a provincial university, because it continued to believe that freedom to pursue truth need not and should not be divorced from the Christian life and faith, that arts, science, and theology belong together. Its wise administrators from the beginning to the present have made this concern their settled policy.

The relation between Victoria and the church is seen in part in its constitution. From the beginning until the present the church has controlled the university through the appointment of its governing board. The Charter of 1836 provided for the government of the college by nine trustees and five visitors, who together made up the board, elected by the ministers of the Annual Conference of the Wesleyan Methodist Church of Canada. The situation has not changed appreciably since then. The most significant change was made in 1915 in order to bring the constitution of the board of regents into line with the requirements of the pension scheme of the Carnegie Foundation.

After Church Union in 1925, when the faculty and most of the students of Knox College entered The United Church of Canada, another act was passed in 1928 creating two colleges—Victoria and Emmanuel—instead of two faculties in Victoria University.

According to this act, the board of regents was to have forty-two members, of whom twenty-two were to be elected by the General Council of the church. Five members were to be elected by the graduates of Emmanuel College, this being interpreted to include any person who had studied theology for one year or more in Knox College or in the faculty of theology of Victoria. Seven other persons were to be co-opted. For the first time, the board was to choose its chairman. Three other persons were members of the board ex officio—the chancellor and president and the two principals. The appointment of the principal and professors of Emmanuel College was to be subject to confirmation by the General Council.

While the church gave birth to Victoria University and has controlled it through the board of regents, it has never interfered directly to determine its policy, except on two occasions when academic freedom became the basic issue in controversies concerning higher criticism. From about 1883 there were repeated attempts to give the General Conference of the Methodist Church control over appointments to theological faculties in church universities, although, strangely enough, no attempt seems to have been made to discipline pastors who had been influenced by higher criticism.

After much bitter dispute the matter was settled in 1910. In that year the General Conference accepted two principles already laid down by the Victoria staff; that the teaching in the church's colleges must conform to the church's doctrinal standards, and that the teachers in the colleges must be protected "in the free and proper discharge of their duty." Since that time there has been no interference on theological grounds with professors in the church's college, and much of the credit for this happy state must go to Victoria University and its great president, Nathanael Burwash.

Church union was followed by a reorganization of Victoria University into two colleges, Victoria and Emmanuel, constituted as noted above. Since more space was needed, a separate building for Emmanuel College was erected in 1931, and five new houses were added to Burwash Hall, the men's residence.

The union on the campus between the Victoria and a former staff of Knox College (Presbyterian) was accomplished peacefully and Victoria University has enjoyed the utmost harmony between its colleges. The last sentence of C. B. Sissons' History of Victoria University is this: "As the two colleges work side by side they will continue to represent that fusion of the sacred and the secular which is the tradition of the founders and the spirit of the evangel." (p. 330)

The partnership of the colleges is not to be judged by the disparity in their size. (Victoria College has about 2,400 students and Emmanuel about 100.) Emmanuel is the largest of the eight theological colleges of The United Church of Canada. Besides the bachelor of divinity degree it offers the degree of bachelor of religious education. About one third of the students are enrolled in graduate studies. In 1944 it joined with the Anglican and Presbyterian theological colleges on the Toronto campus to form the Toronto Graduate School of Theological Studies. Master's and doctor's degrees are given by the individual colleges, the chief function of the school being to facilitate co-operation in teaching. Recently the school was incorporated, and more recently still it was strengthened by the addition of the graduate departments of the Roman Catholic University of St. Michael's College, whose arts faculty, like Victoria's, is federated in the University of Toronto.

Victoria University has been strengthened recently in both arts and theology by the development of its Centre for Reformation and Renaissance Studies. This is at present largely a specialized library being built around a fine collection of Erasmiana. Undoubtedly it will soon be a strong center of research in the graduate field.

From its humble beginning in one small building in a small town, Victoria University has prospered and grown in Toronto. Its 1967 enrolment was about 2,500 students, and it had a teaching staff of 134. It has ten major buildings, assets valued at $15,000,000, an endowment of more than $6,000,000, and an operating budget of $2,500,000.

VILVORDE, Belgium. The Methodist Church (Flemish) was organized in 1928 following a revival under a Gospel tent erected on the city square next to the William Tyndale monument. This monument was erected in memory of the martyrdom of the translator of the Bible into English (burned at the stake in Vilvorde, Oct. 6, 1536). In 1934 a large dancing hall was secured and made a sanctuary. In 1956 a new Tyndale Memorial Church was built. Pastors have been P. Mietes, 1928-32; A. Parmentier, 1933-47; M. Vannieuwenhuysse, 1948-50; A. Pieters, 1951-59; W. Toormans since 1960.

VINCENT, BURTON JONES (1877-1931), American bishop of the FREE METHODIST CHURCH, was born in a Free Methodist parsonage at Ypsilanti, Mich., Aug. 15, 1877. Converted when a child, he joined that Church. He was a student at SPRING ARBOR SEMINARY in MICHIGAN, and Marion College, Indiana, granted him the A.B. Called into the ministry, he joined the Northern Indiana Conference in 1899. He served as pastor and district elder in INDIANA, WISCONSIN, CALIFORNIA and WASHINGTON. He spent nine years in church schools: as assistant principal Evansville Seminary; principal of Spring Arbor Seminary, Mich.; Los Angeles Seminary, Calif.; and of Wessington Springs Seminary, South Dakota. He was Editor of the church's Sunday school literature, 1923-31; and bishop, 1931. He died at Evanston, Ill., in August 1931, having held only four conferences.

Vincent was a leader of youth, a lover of men. He had a genius for administration. He was an excellent writer, gifted preacher, equally at home founding new churches on the frontier or in serving as pastor of large college congregations.

JOHN H. VINCENT

VINCENT, JOHN HEYL (1832-1920), American bishop, author, educator, lecturer, and organizer, was born in Tuscaloosa, Ala., on Feb. 28, 1832, the son of John Himrod and Mary (Raser) Vincent. His father, a farmer, trader, miller, postmaster, and Methodist Sunday-school superintendent, was a descendant of Levi Vincent, French Huguenot, who fled France in 1685 and settled at New Rochelle, N. Y. In 1837, the family returned north to the vicinity of Lewisburg, Pa.

At eighteen he was licensed to "exhort" and as a Methodist LOCAL PREACHER was appointed to Luzerne (Pa.) Circuit. After attending academics at Milton and Lewisburg, Pa., he studied briefly at the Wesleyan Institute, Newark, N. J., and in 1857 completed the course of study prescribed by the Conference. During this time he worked in a store and served as principal of an academy. From time to time he studied Greek, Hebrew, French and physical science under special teachers. As part of his education he visited Egypt, Palestine, Greece, and Italy in 1862.

Ordained a DEACON in 1855, he served churches in northern NEW JERSEY. In 1857 he was ordained an ELDER and transferred to the ROCK RIVER CONFERENCE, where he held pastorates at Joliet, Mt. Morris, Galena, Rockford and Trinity Church, Chicago. U. S. GRANT, later General and President of the United States, attended his church at Galena and they became lifelong friends.

In 1866 he was made general agent of the M.E. SUNDAY SCHOOL Union in New York City and in 1868 was elected corresponding secretary of the Sunday School Union and TRACT SOCIETY with headquarters in the same place. He had previously seen the vital need for trained teachers, and in 1855 he had organized the "Palestine Class" for study of Biblical history and geography. In 1857 at Joliet, Ill., he started a church normal class (interdenominational) to provide trained teachers. The work rapidly spread beyond the limits of his own parish and in 1861 he held the first Sunday School Teacher's Institute in America. In that year he prepared a manual, Little Footprints in Bible Lands, the first of a large quantity of Sunday school literature which the new idea demanded.

In 1865 Vincent established the Northwestern Sunday School Quarterly in Chicago and in 1866 The Sunday School Teacher. In these he introduced the system of Sunday school lessons with lesson leaves. As Corresponding Secretary of the Sunday School Union, he was also editor of all M.E. Sunday school publications. Under his management the circulation of the Sunday-School Journal increased tenfold, while his lesson leaves had a circulation of nearly 2,500,000 copies.

The complete series of his books form an encyclopedia of the beginning of the modern Sunday school movement. All his work was preliminary to the ultimate development of the Chautauqua Sunday-School Teachers Assembly, founded jointly by Vincent and Lewis Miller of Akron, Ohio. This was in 1874 when an institute, interdenominational in character, met for two weeks at Fair Point, Chautauqua, N. Y., for the preparation of Sunday school teachers. The organization grew from year to year. The time session was extended to eight weeks and came to include a complete summer school with classes, lectures, concerts and entertainments. Chautauqua became a meeting place for various Christian groups while still retaining its early aim of training teachers for all Protestant Sunday schools. The Chautauqua Literary and Scientific Circle, founded by Vincent in 1878, marked the beginning of guided home study and correspondence courses, and within a few years had 100,000 students enrolled. The Chautauqua summer courses were the forerunners of college summer sessions. Vincent's pioneering went far beyond denominational limits and eventually the Chautauqua idea grew into one of the most extensive movements for popular education in the United States.

In 1888, John Vincent was elected a bishop of the M.E. Church and was stationed first at Buffalo, N. Y., and then at TOPEKA, Kan. From 1901-04 he had charge of the church's work in Europe from headquarters in ZÜRICH, SWITZERLAND. In 1904 he retired from the episcopacy. In demand as a college preacher, he was the first Methodist minister invited to Harvard University as University preacher. Harvard, OHIO WESLEYAN and Washington and Jefferson College all granted him honorary degrees. During the Civil War he served as a member of the Christian Commission.

Later writings include The Home Book (1886); The Modern Sunday-School, and Better Not (1887); Studies in Young Life (1889); Our Own Church (1890); Family Worship For Every Day in the Year (1905); To Old Bethlehem and The Church at Home.

He was married on Nov. 10, 1858 to Elizabeth Dusenberry of Portville, N. Y. They had one son, George Edgar Vincent, who was president of the University of Minnesota, 1911-17, and president of the Rockefeller Foundation, 1917-29. Bishop Vincent died in Chicago, Ill., on May 9, 1920.

VINELAND, NEW JERSEY, U.S.A., First Church. On April 12, 1863, a Methodist class and church were organized in Vineland, N. J., which came to be known as the First Methodist Church. A building was begun in 1864 and completed in 1867. In December 1932, fire destroyed the original building, which was then replaced by a Gothic stone structure.

The practice of using bottled, unfermented grape juice for communion originated in this church. T. B. Welch, one of the founders of the Welch Grape Juice Company, was elected communion steward in First Church in 1869. He agreed to serve provided that he would be permitted to use the pure juice of grapes, pasteurized through a new method developed by his company. The same practice was subsequently widely adopted throughout American Methodism.

VINEY, RICHARD (Fl. 1740), a British tailor who accompanied JOHN WESLEY to GERMANY, became an original member of the society at FETTER LANE in LONDON. Viney was attracted by Count ZINZENDORF and joined the MORAVIANS, but afterward criticized them and was expelled in 1743. He translated some of PETER BÖHLER's sermons at OXFORD, where he became a Moravian minister. Afterward, Viney rejoined the Methodists and assisted John Wesley at the Orphan House, Newcastle, but proved to be a disturbing influence and "quite perverted" JOHN NELSON's society at Birstall.

VIRGINIA, U.S.A., is one of the original thirteen colonies with an area of 40,817 square miles, and a population of 4,543,249 (1970). Since 1950 the population has grown more than 1,200,000, increasing especially along the Potomac across from Washington, and in the big cities—NORFOLK, PORTSMOUTH, NEWPORT NEWS, and RICHMOND.

Topographically the state is divided into the tidewater section where the colonial settlers first made their homes; the Piedmont region running back to the Blue Ridge Mountains; and the area across the Blue Ridge, the great Valley of Virginia, the Shenandoah, which has become famous in history and noted for the beauty of its scenery. The Commonwealth, as its people insist on calling their state, is also famous for its colonial culture, its statesmen who led the nation in its formative period, its historic estates, and its many battlefields on which the fate of the nation was decided in both the American Revolution and the Civil War. Virginia furnished four of the first five presidents of the United States, and it has been to date the birthplace of eight—Washington, Jefferson, Monroe, Madison, Tyler, William H. Harrison, Taylor, and Wilson, the last three being elected from other states.

The first permanent settlement in the Commonwealth was made at Jamestown on May 13, 1607, the colonists bringing with them the forms and ceremonies of the Church of England. Civil and ecclesiastical history are closely interwoven in early Virginia, and the Church of England was traditionally more at home there than in any other colony. Stringent laws passed by the legislative Assembly of Virginia and a copy of the Act of Uniformity in Britain adopted by the colony, drove the Puritans away, and greatly discouraged the Quakers, Congregationalists, and all non-episcopal groups.

GEORGE WHITEFIELD preached a few sermons in Virginia about 1740, but Methodism proper was planted there by ROBERT WILLIAMS who became a local preacher in England, and arrived in New York in 1769. Williams came to Virginia in 1772, and preached his first sermon in Norfolk at the door of the courthouse. He also visited Portsmouth, where a prominent businessman, Isaac Luke, was converted. After Williams came RICHARD BOARDMAN, JOSEPH PILMORE, FRANCIS ASBURY, and other Methodist pioneers. Pilmore and WILLIAM WATTERS, the first native itinerant preacher, crossed the Potomac at Alexandria, and preached where opportunity afforded on their way to Norfolk. DEVEREAUX JARRATT, a clergyman of the Church of England, in the tidewater region, was friendly to the Methodist preachers and allowed them to hold services in his parish. He also administered the sacraments to the Methodists.

When the Revolution began, most of the Anglican preachers returned to England, and since the Methodist preachers were not ordained, the Methodists generally were without the sacraments. Yet due to the flaming evangelistic work of Williams both in Virginia and NORTH CAROLINA, the Methodist societies increased rapidly, and the matter of the sacraments became urgent. The Virginia preachers then differed sharply with Asbury regarding their right to administer the sacraments. A historic meeting was held at the Broken Back Church, Fluvanna County, beginning May 18, 1779, in which the Virginians, led by ROBERT STRAWBRIDGE from MARYLAND, decided they would ordain each other, and proceed to administer the sacraments regardless of anything Asbury or Wesley himself might do or say. After a year Asbury succeeded in getting the action of the preachers at the Fluvanna County Conference annulled, and in due time John Wesley himself sent over ordained men—THOMAS COKE, RICHARD WHATCOAT, and THOMAS VASEY—with a liturgy which he had prepared, and bestowed his blessing upon whatever the American Methodists would do, telling them to “stand fast in the liberty in which God had so strangely made them free.”

JAMES O'KELLY went into Virginia after he withdrew from the Methodist Episcopal Church in opposition to Asbury, and organized the REPUBLICAN METHODIST (later called the Christian) CHURCH, which after more than a century united with the Congregational Church. However, remarkable revivals continued in Virginia through the first half of the nineteenth century and Methodism grew rapidly.

When the 1796 GENERAL CONFERENCE formed annual conferences with geographical boundaries, the northern and western counties of Virginia (that part of Virginia which was north of the Rappahannock and west of the Blue Ridge) were assigned to the BALTIMORE CONFERENCE, whose preachers had been manning the stations. The Baltimore Conference extended down to the Holston Conference in Southwest Virginia. Fredericksburg, on the south side of the Rappahannock, was however kept as a Baltimore Conference appointment. The HOLSTON CONFERENCE extended up from Tennessee as far as the New River, or thereabouts, and this portion of the Commonwealth yet remains in the Holston Conference.

When the M.E. Church, South was organized in 1845, the Virginia Conference, of course, adhered South. The Baltimore Conference, holding northern and western Virginia, endeavored to act as a “bridge Conference” between the South and North and continued its adherence to the M.E. Church until the outbreak of the Civil War. Then the Baltimore, a border conference, split and two conferences were created, as no bridge could possibly span the tragic gap that then opened between the sections of the nation. The Shenandoah Valley and northern Virginia and the churches in Maryland that adhered South became, as they called themselves, the Old Baltimore Conference, and in 1866 this conference, which had remained independent during the Civil War, formally joined the Southern Church.

For some years after the 1844 division, strained relations existed between the Methodists in the Virginia Conference proper and the Baltimore Conference Methodists across the Blue Ridge because the Virginia Conference felt that all Methodists in the Commonwealth should have declared themselves Southern. For some years after the Civil War there was some antipathy between the Virginia Conference and the Baltimore Conference, although both were then in the M.E. Church, South.

At Methodist unification in 1939, the Jurisdictional line was drawn along the Potomac and the West Virginia state line, and all of the state of Virginia, except the Holston section, was included in the new and enlarged Virginia Conference. At the Uniting Conference in Kansas City in 1939, since it was known that the Virginia Conference would be unusually large if the Virginia part of the Baltimore Conference should be added to it, an effort was made to unite the four Virginia districts of the Baltimore Conference with the Virginia districts of the Holston Conference to form a new annual conference. This, of course, would have created a long and narrow conference extending from Bristol on the Tennessee line up to Alexandria across from Washington. The move failed because the Holston people did not wish to see their conference divided, even though they, too, knew that the Holston Conference would be greatly enlarged by merger with the Holston Conference (ME) as a result of unification. The four Virginia districts of the Old Baltimore Conference had to go into the Virginia Conference because of the way the Jurisdictional line was drawn.

The Holston Conference delegation (MES) to the Uniting Conference had agreed in advance with the Baltimore Conference delegation that they would jointly ask at Kansas City that the Virginia districts of the Holston and Baltimore Conferences be merged to form a new conference, and an agreement to that effect was signed in advance of the Uniting Conference (the signed agreement is in the possession of the writer of this article). However, since no annual conference ever wishes to be divided, the Holston Conference delegation disregarded the advance agreement when they arrived at Kansas City, and then the SOUTHEASTERN JURISDICTIONAL CONFERENCE delegates, acting for the Jurisdiction, placed the four Virginia districts of the Baltimore Conference in the Virginia Conference of The Methodist Church.

In retrospect all agree that what was done was more statesmanlike than the creation of a narrow, five-hundred-mile-long “shoe string” conference on the western boundary of Virginia. Subsequently, Bishop W. W. PEELE, who was called upon to administer the new Virginia Conference for twelve years, made such good appointments and supervised the work so ably that the different sections of Virginia Methodism were well woven into the present powerful Virginia Conference.

The M.E. Church had a Virginia Conference from 1869 to 1906. Never strong, it was absorbed in time by the Baltimore, Holston, and WEST VIRGINIA CONFERENCES. At the time of unification parts of the Northern Church's Baltimore Conference and the WASHINGTON CONFERENCE of Negro Methodists were included within the Commonwealth. The METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCH also had a Virginia Conference which was organized in 1829. In 1870 more than half its ministers and churches went into the M.E. Church, South, and thereafter the M.P. conference was not strong though it continued until 1939. The Virginia Conference of the A.M.E. CHURCH included the entire state, along with a portion of West Virginia. The C.M.E. and A.M.E. ZION denominations also had many Virginia churches. The merger of the E.U.B. VIRGINIA CONFERENCE in 1968 did not appreciably enlarge the Virginia Conference, though the UNITED BRETHREN were traditionally strong in the Shenandoah Valley.

Other accounts in this Encyclopedia tell of the growth of Methodism in the cities of the Commonwealth, and of early shrines and preaching places. In 1968 the Virginia Conference had 381,458 members, making it one of the largest conferences. When the statistics for the Virginia districts of the Holston Conference and the Virginia part of the North Carolina-Virginia Conference (CJ) are added, The United Methodist Church had in Virginia in 1970 approximately 820 pastoral charges, 398,273 members, and property valued at $175,000,000.

VIRGINIA CITY, MONTANA, U.S.A., along with Bannack, represents the earliest Methodist work among the unsettled mining population of pioneer MONTANA. Gold was discovered in Bannack (Grasshopper Creek) in 1862, in Virginia City (Alder Gulch) in 1863, and in Helena (Last Chance) in 1864. A Methodist class was formed by laymen in Virginia City in winter, 1863-64, and a LOCAL PREACHER, Hugh Duncan, preached there. The first regularly appointed minister, A. M. Hough, arrived in 1864 and dedicated a log cabin chapel on November 6.

Methodist work languished after the miners wandered on to other diggings, especially Helena.

VIRGINIA CONFERENCE dates its sessions officially from the first conference held in the state after the CHRISTMAS CONFERENCE. This was in May, 1785, at Mason's Chapel in Brunswick County, with Bishop ASBURY presiding. However, six sessions of American Methodist conferences had been held in VIRGINIA prior to the 1785 gathering.

In 1773 there were 100 members in the Virginia Methodist societies. By the time the great spiritual awakening under GEORGE SHADFORD reached its peak in 1776, five circuits had been formed with 2,456 members. By 1779 there were twelve Virginia circuits, with twenty-three preachers and 4,507 members. At Asbury's death in 1816, the membership totaled 24,361. Evangelistic concern has ever marked Virginia Conference churches.

Many persons prominent in American Methodism have been associated with the Virginia Conference. ROBERT WILLIAMS, a "rousing evangelist," first appeared at NORFOLK in 1769. WILLIAM WATERS, the first AMERICAN-born itinerant, and RICHARD OWINGS, first LOCAL PREACHER, were active in the Virginia societies. Four of Wesley's eight official missionaries to America—JOSEPH PILMORE, THOMAS RANKIN, George Shadford, and Francis Asbury—participated in the planting of Virginia Methodism. The feet of Asbury literally tracked the state. His first appointment to Virginia was in 1775. He preached his last sermon in RICHMOND, and died a few days later, March 31, 1816, at George Arnold's home in Spotsylvania County.

ROBERT STRAWBRIDGE brought Methodism to northern Virginia, probably established the LEESBURG CHURCH in 1766, and organized societies in Fairfax County. Other familiar Methodist names connected with Virginia Methodism are: PHILIP CATCH, preacher on the Hanover and Sussex Circuits; JESSE LEE, native Virginian and Methodist historian; JOHN DICKINS and NOLAN B. HARMON, book editors of the church, the latter being elected bishop while a member of the Virginia Conference; JOHN EARLY, bishop and one of the founders of RANDOLPH-MACON COLLEGE; JAMES DUNCAN, ROBERT BLACKWELL, and J. EARL MORELAND, presidents of the college; STITH MEAD, of CAMP MEETING fame; LORENZO DOW, free lance evangelist; J. MANNING POTTS, editor of The Upper Room and noted historian of the church; and GAITHER P. WARFIELD, director of METHODIST COMMITTEE FOR OVERSEAS RELIEF.

Virginia has given thirteen native sons to the Methodist episcopacy: WILLIAM MCKENDREE (1808); ENOCH GEORGE (1816); BEVERLY WAUGH (1836); John Early (1854); DAVID S. DOGGETT (1866); JOHN C. GRANBERY (1882); WILLIAM TAYLOR (1884); WILLIAM W. DUNCAN (1886); COLLINS DENNY (1910); WILLIAM B. BEAUCHAMP (1922); PAUL B. KERN (1930); PAUL N. GARBER (1944); and WALTER C. GUM (1960). Two other bishops, members of the Virginia Conference when elected, were born elsewhere—JAMES CANNON, JR. (1918) and Nolan B. Harmon (1956).

Virginia Methodism has had close relationships with the divisions and reunions within American Methodism. The threatened breach over the ordinances in 1778-1779 troubled the conferences held at Leesburg and at Broken Back Church in Fluvanna County. The first serious division in American Methodism was led by the enigmatic JAMES O'KELLY, Virginia preacher who, objecting to Asbury's episcopal power, marched out in 1792, taking many with him. Because of the schism, the conference suffered a net loss of 4,317 members between 1794 and 1800. The formation of the METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCH later left its mark on the conference. There was a heavy representation from Virginia in the convention which brought the METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCH into being.

The Virginia Conference was of course greatly involved in the division of the church over the problem of slavery. Virginia Methodism included more slaveholding members than in any other state. When the issue reached its peak in the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1844, Virginia had four delegates, two of whom—John Early and WILLIAM A. SMITH—took active parts in the debates. The delegation stood firmly against the northern-backed resolution asking Bishop JAMES O. ANDREW to resign. Subsequently, following the north-south division, the first General Conference of the new Methodist Episcopal Church, South convened in a Virginia city—PETERSBURG, and selected a Virginia delegate as president pro tem.

Three-quarters of a century after it began, American Methodism, born in the American Revolution, knew the throes of the Civil War. Southern Methodism, though devoted to the cause of the Confederacy, knew much heartsearching because of slavery. Much of the war centered in Virginia. Incredibly the church lived and carried on its work amid the tragedy and confusion which military campaigns brought to Virginia. The conference, in its membership, felt the ravages of war. By 1863 there was a decline of 11,150 in white membership, and a loss of 5,000 Negro members during the war years. Nine ministers of the conference were ordinary soldiers or officers in the Confederate Army. Twenty-two served as chaplains and two as army missionaries. The end of the war launched a period of intense evangelistic fervor, resulting in an increase of 27,000 members by 1880, as compared with 1865.

When union came to American Methodism in 1939, the Virginia Conference had 171,964 members. A new conference was then organized consisting of the ten districts of the former Virginia Conference, and two districts and parts of four others from the former BALTIMORE CONFERENCE (MES). In addition, the new conference received sixteen charges from the MARYLAND CONFERENCE (MP) and two from the NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE (MP), while from the M.E. Church came the following numbers of charges: BALTIMORE CONFERENCE, seven; WILMINGTON CONFERENCE, five; BLUE RIDGE-ATLANTIC CONFERENCE, one; HOLSTON CONFERENCE, six; and WEST VIRGINIA CONFERENCE, five. The new Virginia Conference was organized with fourteen districts, and in 1941 it reported 207,677 members.

In 1965 the Virginia Conference extended invitations to the charges of the Virginia District of the NORTH CAROLINA-VIRGINIA CONFERENCE (CJ) to merge with it. The merger was effected in 1968.

Virginia Methodism has always had an interest in education. ERENEZER ACADEMY appears to have been the first Methodist school in Virginia. Established in 1784, it passed out of Methodist hands about 1800. Harrisonburg School, in Rockingham County, was opened by Asbury in 1794, but had brief duration. Randolph-Macon College, chartered in 1830, is the oldest permanent Methodist college in America. It opened at Boydton in 1832, and after the Civil War moved to Ashland. In 1968 the school reported an enrollment of nearly 900, an endowment of over $3,000,000, and a plant valued at nearly $9,000,000. RANDOLPH-MACON WOMEN'S COLLEGE, located at Lynchburg, opened in 1893, a dream of William Waugh Smith. He became its first acting president. The school holds a top position among American colleges for women. VIRGINIA WESLEYAN COLLEGE at Norfolk, sponsored by the conference, opened in 1966 with the promise of becoming a strong church college.

FERRUM JUNIOR COLLEGE at Ferrum was founded in 1913. It was originally established as Ferrum Training School to serve mountain children. RANDOLPH-MACON ACADEMY, founded at Front Royal in the 1890's, had merged with it another school in 1933. Other educational ventures included: Blackstone College for girls (originally Blackstone Female Institute, opened in 1894 and now closed); and Randolph-Macon Female Institute at Danville, opened in 1897, and later passed from Methodist control.

The conference has participated in the METHODIST STUDENT MOVEMENT. Virginia Methodism sponsors WESLEY FOUNDATIONS at the various state schools, and has units of the Student Movement at the colleges related to the church.

Virginia Methodism seems to have claim for establishing the SUNDAY SCHOOL Movement in America. In the 1780's Thomas Crenshaw began a Sunday school in Hanover County, Virginia, and William Elliott started one on the Eastern Shore. Christian education has long been a vital part of Methodism's life and progress, and the conference has pride in these modest beginnings in Virginia.

The first foreign missionary of American Methodism, MELVILLE COX, although a New Englander, was a member of the Virginia Conference for a short time and later sailed for LIBERIA from Norfolk in 1832. Virginia Conference churches have increasingly supported the mission enterprise across the years. Today the conference journal lists thirty-nine missionaries from Virginia, and a large number of others are being supported by Virginia Conference churches. The Advance Special program of the Methodist BOARD OF MISSIONS, so vital a part of mission support in recent years, was largely the outgrowth of a plan formulated by a member of the Virginia Conference, William Archer Wright. The WOMEN'S SOCIETY OF CHRISTIAN SERVICE of the conference (49,581 members in 1968) has been an integral and vigorous part of the mission interest. The conference ranks high in The Methodist Church in support of missionaries. Church extension is also a robust movement in the conference, and in the growing population centers, especially in northern Virginia and Norfolk-Portsmouth, it has kept pace by establishing many new churches. The Alexandria and Arlington Districts reported a total of 73,153 members in 1968.

The conference has had its own paper since 1832, beginning under the name of Virginia Conference Sentinel. Later names were, Baltimore and Richmond Christian Advocate, Richmond Christian Advocate, and presently Virginia Methodist Advocate, the name adopted in 1939 when it merged with the Baltimore Southern Methodist. There have been ten editors, beginning with Ethelbert Drake and continuing to George S. Reamey, who has served since 1939.

A powerful social awakening came in Virginia Methodism, as in other Protestant churches, in the years following the Civil War. It evidenced great zeal for temperance under the leadership of Bishop James Cannon, Jr. Important forward strides came in 1908 through the leadership of William Francis Drewry, physician, and Joseph T. Mastin, minister of the conference, who infused the whole Commonwealth with a new concern for social welfare, and started welfare organizations. The conference today is vitally associated with the Alcohol Education Council, and kindred interdenominational groups. Within the conference there are the Virginia Methodist Children's Home at Richmond, and six homes for the aged in different parts of the state.

Laymen were active from the earliest days of the Conference. GABRIEL P. DISOWAY, a Methodist citizen of Petersburg, took part in the founding of Randolph-Macon College. In 1870, when lay delegates were first seated in the General Conference, the Virginia Conference delegation included seven laymen. Laymen were more active in the conference from that time forward. Lay representation in conference bodies has tended to provide greater business efficiency, organization and administration. Virginia Methodism developed a lay organization of unusual strength, promoting stewardship, trained lay speakers, organized groups of Methodist Men, and encouraging greater use of laymen in the life and leadership of both the conference and the local churches.

In 1970, the Virginia Conference reported 16 districts, 768 charges, 353,176 members, property valued at $169,- 449,606, and a total amount of $24,568,069 raised for all purposes during the year. At that time it had the largest membership of any conference in the connection.

VIRGINIA CONFERENCE (EUB), which included counties both in WEST VIRGINIA and MARYLAND, dated its annual sessions from the Original Conference of 1800. In addition to Henry Baker, Christian and Henry Crum and Simon Herr, who were native to this section, OTTERBEIN, GEETING, BOEHM, and NEWCOMER preached in this area.

The first session of the Original Conference to meet within the bounds of the later Virginia Conference was held at Abraham Niswander's home, May 25, 1808. At this conference some procedures were outlined for authorizing men to preach and assignments were made to circuits.

Early classes grew up around Mt. Jackson, Harrisonburg, Winchester, along the Potomac River at Sleepy Creek, and in Augusta and Loudon Counties. Among those who supplied homes for the preachers and places in which to meet were the Ambrose, Stickley, Senseny, Niswander, and Funkhouser families.

The Original Conference, also called the Hagerstown Conference, was divided in 1830 to form the Hagerstown (later Virginia) and Harrisburg (later Pennsylvania) Conferences. The first session of the Virginia Conference was assembled at Hinkel's Schoolhouse, Shenandoah County, Virginia, April 27, 1831, with Bishop HENRY KUMLER presiding.

Little effort was made to build meeting houses in the early years, so that the Whitsel Church, built about 1824, is believed to be the oldest church in the conference.

In 1833, the conference authorized the printing of a Hymnal in English. They were joined in the project by the Pennsylvania Conference. This book was used for many years in the church.

The first foreign mission offering received in an annual conference session was taken by Bishop GLOSSBRENNER at the Bethlehem Church, Augusta County, in 1851.

The denominational stand on SLAVERY adopted by the General Conference of 1817, although approved by members of the Virginia Conference, created many difficulties in local situations. United Brethren in Virginia were often looked upon with suspicion by their neighbors. Bishop MARKWOOD, who had been raised in Virginia, had a price of $500 placed on his head by the Confederate States of America. During the war period from 1862 to 1865, it was necessary to hold two annual sessions of conference, one north of the Potomac River and the other in the Shenandoah Valley.

In 1875, the Rev. A. P. Funkhouser and Professor J. N. Fries started a school at Dayton, Virginia. It was later purchased by the conference; and in 1960, the institution was moved to a new campus in Winchester, Va. It is known as SHENANDOAH COLLEGE, a junior college, and Shenandoah Conservatory of Music, a four-year, degree granting institution.

In 1966, there were ninety-two ministers in all classes with 147 organized congregations and 22,049 members.

The churches of the conference were placed in the West Virginia, Baltimore, and Virginia Conferences at the time of conference union in 1970.

VIRGINIA METHODIST ADVOCATE, formerly the historic Richmond Christian Advocate, is published in RICHMOND, Va., and is the official organ of the VIRGINIA CONFERENCE of The United Methodist Church. It dates from the spring of 1832, and is the oldest Methodist paper in continual service in one place in the Southland.

This weekly periodical was first named the Virginia Conference Sentinel, but within a few years the name was changed to the Richmond Christian Advocate. Immediately following Methodist UNIFICATION in 1939, this paper was merged with the Baltimore Southern Methodist, then published in Salem, Va., and became the Virginia Methodist Advocate, the name it still has.

The first ten editors of the Virginia Methodist Advocate (and its predecessor publications) were: Ethelbert Drake, 1832-36; LEROY M. LEE, 1836-58; LEONIDAS ROSSER, 1858-60; JAMES A. DUNCAN, 1860-66; W. W. Bennett, 1866-77; JOHN J. LAFFERTY, 1877-1904; JAMES CANNON, JR., 1904-18; Graham H. Lambeth, 1918-21; JOSEPH M. ROWLAND, 1921-38; George S. Reamey, 1939-.

Drake first began the publication because he recognized the need for it, and financed it at his own expense as a service to the church. Four years later he turned it over to the Virginia Conference, and sought "more peaceful work," and a more inviting opportunity to provide financially for his family. Later on this paper passed again into private hands for a while, but for many years now it has been owned and published by the Virginia Conference.

For about the first fifty years of publication, the Sentinel and the Richmond Christian Advocate served one rather unique function for a church periodical. They provided frequent treatments of national and international news, presumably because readers often did not have other sources of reliable information as to world happenings. Of course in those former days the news was usually several weeks old when published.

Principal emphases of this church paper, however, were not in the secular but in the religious realm. Local church news had not then gotten into the columns of the church press as is now the case, but there was a need definitely felt for religious instruction over and beyond what went on at church. When it is borne in mind that "Uniform Lessons" in the SUNDAY SCHOOL did not come into being until 1872, and Graded Lessons much later (1908), it will be recognized that religious teaching at best was unsystematized and fragmentary. So the church paper gave prominence to some of the great doctrines of the church; to treatments of various kinds of important Scripture passages, and there were scattered paragraphs each dealing with some aspect of religious truth.

As denominationalism was strong in those days, and for some time thereafter, debates were occasionally carried on in the Advocate between Methodists and spokesmen of other denominations. In 1847, for example, there was quite a little controversy with the Presbyterians, though this time it was not predestination. It seems that a Calvinist magazine had claimed, of all things, that JOHN WESLEY was no Republican! The Methodist editor was appropriately indignant, of course, but apparently unable to answer this specific charge. He retorted by saying, "Suppose John Wesley was not a Republican. He was still a faithful minister of Christ." Seemingly, that ended this particular argument!

These early Methodist papers were not without occasional touches of both sarcasm and humor. In an Advocate article (Sept. 21, 1876), written by a bachelor minister who obviously did not like the way some pastoral appointments were made, it was stated that "in these progressive days" the minister with a large family to support is adapted to do the most good in the highest-paying churches, while "bachelors are peculiarly fitted to small and poor appointments." The article added that in earlier years, a minister's training, character and general competence were influential factors in the appointment system, but now this was quite properly out-moded. Only the size of one's family merited any consideration! While the writer was obviously disturbed about the situation, he wrote in a light and humorous vein.

With the advent of the twentieth century, the Advocate began to devote increasing attention to various social issues and related matters of serious import. As early as 1926 this paper dealt with the question of race, pleading for fair-play for all persons of whatever color. Even before that, under the editorship of James Cannon, Jr., later bishop, much was said on Advocate pages about the Temperance movement, with special reference to the Prohibition law the "drys" had been successful in getting the State Legislature to enact. (This law was later rescinded.) Bishop Cannon at one time was an extremely influential factor in Virginia state politics, as well as influential in his Church, and he was responsible, more than any other person, for the passage of Prohibition legislation.

J. M. Rowland, as editor, wielded a mighty pen against the liquor traffic. Also in his day there was quite a discussion of the proposed unification of the three largest branches of Methodism, the merger which was consummated in 1939.

Rowland and the Advocate took a strong stand for Unification, and successfully withstood charges brought by Collins Denny, Jr., a Richmond attorney and son of Bishop COLLINS DENNY, that the Advocate had presented only the pro-union side of the controversy. Denny, as spokesman for the "Laymen's Organization for the Preservation of the Southern Methodist Church," had tried without success to get the Advocate to carry certain material opposed to Unification. He finally took his case against the Advocate to the Richmond District Conference, but was voted down fifty to eight. Although Bishop Denny unquestionably had some basis for his grievance, nothing came of it. Sentiment for Unification was too strong for him to carry his point.

George S. Reamey assumed the editorship shortly after the tragic death of Dr. Rowland (August 1938) in an automobile accident. He continued the policy of supporting Unification and during the Uniting Conference itself, the editor wired daily stories from KANSAS CITY to a Richmond newspaper covering discussions and debates.

In the years since then, the Advocate has continued to carry timely editorials and articles interpreting to its readers important news of the denomination, and giving a religious interpretation of world news. Many controversial articles have, from time to time, found their way to its pages. Under present editorship the Advocate has consistently followed the policy of carrying both sides of controversial matters, the better to enable its readers to formulate their own opinions.

VIRGINIA WESLEYAN COLLEGE, Norfolk, Virginia, was approved June 15, 1961, by vote of the VIRGINIA ANNUAL CONFERENCE to be a residential coeducational liberal arts college located on the boundary between Norfolk and Virginia Beach, Va. The conference also contributed $1,500,000 toward the purchase of land and the initial building program. A charter was granted July 27, 1961, by the Commonwealth of VIRGINIA; construction was begun in July, 1965; and the college opened with 125 students on Sept. 12, 1966. The governing board has from twenty-two (minimum) to thirty-six (maximum) trustees, elected by the Virginia Annual Conference upon nomination of its Board of Education. The charter requires that at least seventy-five percent of the trustees be members of The United Methodist Church.

The campus includes three hundred acres and one "student village," a complex of buildings in contemporary architectural style, combining facilities for living and learning. Other villages will be added, each providing study, lounge, dining, and living quarters as well as classrooms and libraries.

JOHN O. GROSS

VOEGELEIN, FREDERICH WILLIAM (1849-1920), American Evangelical preacher and missionary, was born Dec. 24, 1849, in Knielingen, Germany. At the age of two he came with his parents to SYRACUSE, N. Y. In 1869 he joined the Kansas Conference of the EVANGELICAL ASSOCIATION, was ordained DEACON in 1872, ELDER in 1874 and served churches in MISSOURI and KANSAS. In 1873 he was married to Kate E. Henneck and became pastor at Leavenworth for the next three years.

From 1876 to 1884 Voegelein was under appointment by the Board of Missions as pastor at SAN FRANCISCO and SAN JOSE, Calif., and most of the time presiding elder of the CALIFORNIA District of the Pacific Conference. His energy, vision, and strength as a preacher and administrator enabled him to lead in the expansion of the District and prepare it to become a separate conference.

Next the Board sent him and his wife to TOKYO, Japan, where he served variously as pastor, presiding elder, Director of Training School, and prospector for a mission location in CHINA. For his wife's health they returned to California in 1906, but he continued to direct and work for the overseas missions.

In 1908 Voegelein rejoined California Conference and was appointed PRESIDING ELDER. Under his leadership the conference achieved self-support. He retired in 1919 after fifty fruitful years in the ministry. Death came at Los Angeles, Aug. 19, 1920, after he had arranged for his wife to give their estate to open a church home for the aged in the city of Burbank. From further contributions the Pacific Evangelical Home for Aged People was established, bringing to fruition the dream of the Voegelins.

VORDENBAUMEN, FREDERICK (1824-1899), American German Methodist leader, was born in Bergholzhausen, GERMANY, on July 17, 1824, but came in early life to America. He had been brought up as a member of the Lutheran Church, but in 1849 he was, according to Bishop H. M. DuBose, "soundly converted." At this time he lived in Galveston, Texas. Four years later he became a minister, joining the Texas Conference in 1854. He was one of the leaders in organizing the GERMAN MISSION CONFERENCE in the then southwest and became its father in the Gospel in many ways. "His singular piety and his loyalty to the standards of the Church helped to give character to the devotion and faithfulness of the German Methodists which has distinguished them through many years." He died in 1899, and the German Conference itself within a score of years was subsequently dissolved and its members went into the component TEXAS and LOUISIANA CONFERENCES of the M.E. Church, South.

VOZ MISSIONARIA (Missionary Voice), the official quarterly magazine of the Methodist Women's Societies in Brazil, was founded Sept. 18, 1929. Its founders were MERCÊDES SEABRA and EULA KENNEDY LONG, OTILIA DE OLIVEIRA CHAVES and Nair G. Martins, Lydia W. da Silva and Gláucia W. Duarte, respectively presidents and corresponding secretaries of the three Regional Conferences of the Brazilian Methodist Church at that time. They were assisted by Leila Epps of the Woman's Board of Foreign Missions of the M.E. Church, South, who had been designated by it to help develop literature for the Brazilian Methodist women, and she was afterward named its first editor.

Meeting in São Paulo in September 1929, this group decided upon three steps to unify and promote women's work—to organize them into a "Confederation"; to adopt a pin with the motto, Viver para Servir (Live to Serve), suggested by Eula K. Long; and to publish a quarterly magazine with programs for their meetings and articles stressing the Christian home and evangelism.

Starting with 1,000 copies only, the magazine's growth has been phenomenal, outdistancing in circulation any Protestant magazine in South America, and with a subscription list that surpasses the membership of the Brazilian Methodist Church. This amazing growth is due to the efforts of conference and local agents—women like Zaida Guerra and Fafa Castagnino—who have generated tremendous enthusiasm and have alone secured hundreds of subscribers, placing the magazine in the hands of Roman Catholics, in doctors' and dentists' offices, and with women of other Protestant denominations. The Voz not only covers Brazil but goes to Portuguese-speaking people in Portugal, the Madeira Islands, and Angola.

VRINDABAN, India, is the traditional birthplace of the Hindu god Krishna, with whom is associated a doctrine of grace. The population in 1961 was 22,199. During British rule the name was anglicized as Brindaban, but with independence the official spelling was changed to the present form.

To Hindus of the Vaishnavite school, Vrindaban is a sacred city comparable to Banaras. Every year for many centuries pilgrims in great numbers have visited Vrindaban and other locations in the vicinity because Hindu mythology associates them with episodes in the life of Krishna. The town has scores of temples, some large, ornate, and expensive. Under temple auspices accommodation is provided for hundreds of Hindu widows who have dedicated themselves to the temple, and to a life of service in poverty and debasement. They cut their hair and sometimes shave their heads and wear a very simple garb. The temple authorities are supposed to take care of them, and each day give them a very small dole of food. In return many of these widows spend from six to ten hours a day chanting the name of Krishna or honorifics which are applied to Krishna in common parlance in Vaishnavite Hinduism.

Dr. Emma Scott, a Methodist Episcopal missionary, opened a dispensary in Vrindaban in 1897 and became the first foreigner to live in the city. She was so moved by the spectacle of these widows that she determined to buy land and build a hospital for women. After much searching, she found a suitable location and purchased it from a Moslem. Some Hindus protested and went to court to prevent the opening of any Christian mission in the town. Dr. Scott won the case in the local court, but successive appeals prevented the use of the land until the last appeal was decided in the Privy Council in London. With that final court victory, Dr. Scott proceeded to open a clinic, and she slowly acquired the grateful backing of the local population. Other doctors and nurses representing the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society (ME) served for varying periods. In 1950 the Division of World Missions of the Methodist Board of Missions joined to support and enlarge the venture.

It is now the Creighton-Freeman Christian Hospital and School of Nursing, with 125 beds. Student nurses number approximately forty. The present superintendent is Dr. Charles V. Perrill. His wife, Wilma, is the able assistant superintendent. The names of Dr. Mary Burchard, Eunice Porter, a registered nurse, and Elda Mae Barry are held in the highest repute in the town and surrounding territory, and the Christian Gospel has penetrated deeply into the mind and heart of residents of Vrindaban.

WACO, TEXAS, U.S.A. Austin Avenue Church for sixty-six years has held its place as the largest Methodist church in Central Texas. On Dec. 31, 1900, the Fifth Street Methodist charge in Waco authorized a Board of Trustees to receive and hold the property of a newly established congregation. Three lots on the corner of Austin and Twelfth Streets in Waco became the location of the new church. Very soon an imposing structure was completed at a cost of $25,000, with an auditorium which would seat 600 persons and Sunday school facilities for an enrollment of 300. For twenty-five years the church worshipped in this location, and as the congregation grew in membership it became the center of Methodism in Central Texas. In keeping with the Methodist tradition of twenty-four year pastorates, six pastors served during the first twenty-four years.

In 1925 the membership had so outgrown the original building that a new location was acquired, still downtown in Waco, only one block from the original site. A new sanctuary seating 1,200 people and educational facilities to care for 1,000 persons were erected. This building costing over $300,000, miraculously escaped the devastation of a tornado in 1953, but the next year fire destroyed the interior of the edifice.

Immediately a building program was undertaken and in one year the church was completely rebuilt, more adequately furnished than before the tragedy. The $600,000 cost of restoration was immediately underwritten by the congregation and was paid in full within three years. Although Waco has shown a tremendous growth and now has twenty United Methodist churches in the city, the Austin Avenue Church, with a membership of 2,574, continues to lead in the ministry to which it was called seventy years ago.

Methodist Home is a home for children owned and operated by The United Methodist Church in Texas and New Mexico. In November 1890 Bishop JOSEPH S. KEY and Horace Bishop, pastor of the historic First Church in Waco, challenged the NORTHWEST TEXAS CONFERENCE (M.E. CHURCH, SOUTH) to provide a decent home for orphan children. Today the resulting Methodist Home is owned and operated by five Annual Conferences of Texas, and the NEW MEXICO CONFERENCE.

The city of Waco bid successfully for the new orphanage by making a gift of cash, and by donating the then Miller residence with its surrounding ten acres of farm land.

W. H. Vaughn, John H. McLean, W. F. ("Dad") Barnett, and Abe Mulkey, a traveling evangelist, and his wife, Louisa, were instrumental in the early development of the Home. Mulky would devote one night out of each revival meeting to tell about the Methodist Home and its work, and then would take an offering. The original Administration Building bore an inscription on the cornerstone, "Preached, prayed, and sung up by Reverend Abe and Louisa Mulkey." A burst of construction in the 1920's helped the Home bring its physical plant more closely in line with the needs of the children.

In 1938 the first cottage, the Lois Perkins Home, was started, and some of the older dormitories on the campus were remodeled to conform with the cottage plan for housing children. This marked the beginning of the transition from dormitories and institutionalized custodial care. Today there are twenty cottages on the campus, which covers an area of 114 acres. In addition to this, the Home carries on a farm and ranch program with these facilities being located in the Waco area.

In 1969 the Home was caring for about 400 children on its campus with an additional seventy-five pre-school children being cared for in its foster home program. It is a multiple-service agency and has programs for group care, foster home care, and adoption when children are eligible to be placed. The Home is an associate member of the Child Welfare League of America.

The Chapel on the campus is the Harrell Memorial Chapel, a gift of Dr. T. M. Harrell of Corpus Christi, Texas.

The present administrator of the Methodist Home is Kennard B. Copeland. Hubert Johnson, administrator for thirty-two years, is now the executive director of the Methodist Home Foundation.

The Waco home is the largest Children's Home associated with the Methodist Association of Hospitals and Homes. It is supported by free-will offerings taken in the Methodist churches of Texas and New Mexico. The Home has served over 8,700 boys and girls in its seventy-five years.

WADDY, RICHARD (1769-1853), British Wesleyan Methodist itinerant, was born at Bilton, Yorkshire, Nov. 24, 1769. He began to itinerate at Berwick in 1793. He was the father of SAMUEL DOUSLAND WADDY. He wrote A Vindication of the Methodists in a Letter to the Rev. T. Y. Derby (1804), and The Christian Soldier's Manual (Leeds, 1815). He died at Southampton, Oct. 4, 1853.

JOHN KENT

WADDY, SAMUEL DOUSLAND (1804-1876), British Wesleyan Methodist, was born at Burton on Trent, Aug. 5, 1804. The son of RICHARD WADDY, he entered the Wesleyan Methodist ministry in 1825. He was the chief founder of Wesley College, SHEFFIELD, one of the earliest Wesleyan schools, which opened in 1838; he was governor and chaplain from 1844 to 1862; for the controversy which surrounded his appointment see Sidelights on the Conflicts of Methodism, by BENJAMIN GREGORY (1898). Waddy was elected president of the Wesleyan Methodist Conference in 1859. He returned to circuit work in 1862, retiring to BRISTOL in 1870, where he died on Nov. 7, 1876.

WADE, ALEXANDER LUARK (1832-1904), American educator, was born Feb. 1, 1832, near Rushville, Ind., the son of George and Anna (Luark) Wade. The family moved to Monongalia County, W. Va., when Alexander was seven. Seven years later his father died and the boy worked on the farm to help support his mother. He was educated in a log school house. Joining the M.E. Church, he became a LOCAL PREACHER, and was ordained ELDER. He was a lay delegate to the 1884 GENERAL CONFERENCE.

During his career, Wade taught twelve years in rural schools; served for some years as clerk and recorder of Monongalia County; was principal of the Morgantown, W. Va. public schools, 1871-73; assistant county superintendent of schools, 1873-75; and county superintendent, 1875-79. While in the latter office he effected reforms in rural teaching and administration which made him favorably known in this country and abroad. He began lecturing and writing on the subject of education in 1871.

Prior to Wade's day, pupils in rural schools wasted much time because there was no planned program or objective for them. One writer claims that students in academies accomplished more in one year than the average rural school pupil did in fifteen. Wade insisted that there should be an objective for each pupil. He was appointed principal of the Negro school in Morgantown where he tested his plan and later he published the results.

John Rhey Thompson, president of the University of West Virginia, himself a Methodist minister, made addresses along with other preachers advocating Wade's proposed reform. The WEST VIRGINIA superintendent of education approved the plan, and the state of MASSACHUSETTS adopted it. The editor of the National Journal of Education declared that Wade's contribution to education was greater than that made by New England.

Wade became popular in many states as a lecturer. In 1881 he published his famous work, A Graduating System for Country Schools. He died May 2, 1904 in Richmond, Va.

WADE, CYRUS ULYSSES (1849-1937), American minister, was born March 16, 1849, at LaGrange, Ind. He trained as a lawyer and was a successful attorney when he felt called to the ministry. He married Mary Will on March 27, 1873. Among their children was RAYMOND J. WADE, who later was elected bishop. Mrs. Wade died in 1891, and he married Elizabeth Welborn in 1893. He joined the NORTH INDIANA CONFERENCE in 1881 and had an outstanding record as pastor, presiding elder and secretary of the Preacher's Aid Society. He was elected to three GENERAL CONFERENCES in 1900, 1904 and 1908. He died Feb. 6, 1937.

29, 1875, the son of CYRUS U. and Mary Will Wade. He received his education at DEPAUW UNIVERSITY and was later given an honorary degree by DePauw. He also held honorary degrees from Taylor University and ALBION COLLEGE. On Dec. 4, 1904 he was united in marriage to Ella L. Yarian (deceased 1909) of Nappanee, Ind. They had one son, Paul Raymond, and two daughters, Elizabeth E. and Mary Elouise. On Aug. 6, 1913, he married Myrtle L. Mudge (deceased March 3, 1969) of Elkhart, Ind.

Raymond J. Wade joined the NORTH INDIANA CONFERENCE in 1894. His pastorates included FORT WAYNE, INDIANAPOLIS, Arcadia, Nappanee, Kendallville, First Church at Richmond, and Trinity at Elkhart—all in INDIANA. He was district superintendent of the Goshen District, North Indiana Conference, 1915-20; corresponding secretary of the Commission on Conservation and Advance, 1920-24; executive secretary of WORLD SERVICE COMMISSION, 1924-28. He was secretary of the M.E. GENERAL CONFERENCE, 1920-28. While serving in Europe from 1928-39, he was president of the University of Scandinavia's School of Theology at Gothenburg, SWEDEN.

Raymond Wade was elected bishop by the General Conference of the M.E. Church in 1928 and assigned to the STOCKHOLM Area in Northern Europe. He did an outstanding work there. The Norwegians, Swedes and Danes paid him a spontaneous tribute of affection and regard when at the Oslo Conference of World Methodism he stood to be recognized. The ovation he received was unforgettable.

He also supervised the work of the Methodist Church in the Madeira Islands (PORTUGAL), SPAIN, FRANCE, ALGERIA, TUNISIA, DENMARK, NORWAY, SWEDEN, FINLAND, ESTONIA, LATVIA, LITHUANIA, RUSSIA, and Siberia. He was assigned to the Detroit Area in 1940-48, retiring from the active episcopacy in the latter year.

Bishop Wade was president emeritus of the Board of HOSPITALS and HOMES of The Methodist Church and for twenty-five years was president of the Bay View Association at Bay View, Mich. Because of his extensive travels in Europe by means of the airplane—then something of an innovation in episcopal travel—he was known as “The Flying Bishop.” His official address during the last months of his life was the Methodist Home for the Aged, Sunny Shores Villas, in St. PETERSBURG, FLA. He died in that city Jan. 24, 1970. Services were held in Christ Church there and the interment was in Petoskey, Mich.

WADE, THOMAS SMITH (1838-1911), is generally acknowledged to have been the outstanding figure in Southern Methodism in WEST VIRGINIA during the last half of the nineteenth century. Born Aug. 5, 1838, in Highland County, Va., he and his family moved to what is now West Virginia where he grew up on a farm in Wood County near PARKERSBURG. His education was received in the poorly equipped schools of that day but being of a superior intellect he became a great student and an educated man.

At the age of twenty he was admitted on trial into the WESTERN VIRGINIA CONFERENCE, M.E. CHURCH, SOUTH. His ministry spanned fifty years, of which twenty were spent as a presiding elder. He was for four years a CHAPLAIN in the Confederate Army, the Nineteenth Virginia Cavalry. He was a delegate to six GENERAL CONFERENCES and for twelve years was a member of the BOOK COMMITTEE. He was also a delegate to two ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCES and to the first great Conference on Church Federation. He was for twelve years editor of the Methodist Advocate of his Conference in connection with other duties as pastor or presiding elder.

He wrote the history of the Western Virginia Conference, a work which was never published in book form, although running serially in the Methodist Layman's Herald. In 1888, while presiding elder of the Charleston District, with residence at Barboursville, he established a college in buildings left vacant by the moving of the Cabell County Courthouse to Huntington, and served as its first president. First called Barboursville Seminary, it later became MORRIS HARVEY COLLEGE.

He was married in 1871 to Ella Hursey and to this union were born two children, Harry Marvin Wade and Fanny Isabel (Wallace). He died on July 7, 1911 and is buried in Clarksburg, W. Va.

WAGNER, ELLASUE CANTER (1881-1957), versatile American missionary to Korea, was born in Huntersville, W. Va., on Aug. 8, 1881. She graduated from Marion Junior College and Martha Washington College (later going into EMORY and HENRY COLLEGE), and subsequently received the M.A. degree from SCARRITT COLLEGE.

She went to Korea in 1904 from the HOLSTON CONFERENCE Area, and began work in Songdo where a wide variety of educational, social, and evangelistic activities occupied most of her life in Korea. She established Holston Institute, a school for Korean girls, in 1904, and acted as principal for many years. She also served for several years as superintendent of the Songdo social community center.

From 1926 to 1934 she was assigned to Seoul where she was superintendent of the Social Evangelistic Center, in which Northern Methodists and Northern Presbyterian missionaries cooperated with the Southern Methodists. During this time she was editor of The Korea Mission Field, a monthly interdenominational missionary magazine. She was chairman of the committee celebrating the fiftieth anniversary of Methodism in Korea in 1934, and wrote a pageant At the Hermit's Gate, depicting events leading to the opening of the work. She was a member of the commission on union which organized the Korean Methodist Church and a member of the organizing General Conference. She was one of fourteen missionary women ordained by Bishop JU SAM RYANG in 1931. It was said of her that she “loved the Old Korea and watched the rise of the New Korea with pride.”

Miss Wagner was author of Korea: The Old and The New; Korea Calls; and The Dawn of Tomorrow. In 1921-23 she served in the Literature Department of the BOARD OF MISSIONS (MES) in NASHVILLE. She died on Nov. 22, 1957 at Bristol, Tenn. and was buried in the Holston Conference Cemetery in Emory, Va. She did not close her work in Korea until forced to leave by the forced missionary withdrawal in 1940 with the Second World War impending.

WAIKOUAITI (now named Karitane), Otago, New Zealand, was the site of the first Methodist mission station in the South Island, a few miles from Dunedin. It was established by JAMES WATKIN on May 16, 1840. Earlier, Watkin had served in Tonga and had removed to Australia for health reasons. Requests from Maori leaders, backed up by John Jones, whose whaling station was at Waikouaiti led to Watkin's appointment there.

Watkin was succeeded in June, 1844, by CHARLES CREED, during whose term the first Christian European service was conducted by him in Dunedin. Creed was on hand to meet the first Scottish settlers when they arrived at Port Chalmers on March 23, 1848.

WAIMA, Hokianga, NEW ZEALAND, was the site of an important mission station twenty miles from MANGUNGU, founded in 1839. The first resident missionary was JOHN WARREN. The site is marked by New Zealand's largest oak tree, which has a spread of branches 130 feet in diameter. This historic tree was grown from an acorn brought from England by Mrs. Warren, and had first been planted in a pot at Mangungu.

“The Waima Mission House,” writes WILLIAM MORLEY, “was the longest occupied of any in the Hokianga, and continued to be the residence of a European missionary until 1894.” (p. 77) For some thirty years after that it was the residence of the Maori minister of the district, until the erection of a new home at Upper Waima.

Waima village, some miles away, remains the center of Maori mission work in the Hokianga District to this day, having its own resident Maori minister.

WAINGAROA, early Wesleyan Mission Station, near Raglan, New Zealand, was founded by JAMES WALLIS at the end of 1834. When boundary disputes with the Church Missionary Society arose in 1836, Wallis was temporarily withdrawn and appointed to Tangiteroria. Later he was reappointed to Waingaroa and labored there until 1862.

His work in the area is commemorated by a memorial seat which was erected on the foreshore of Raglan township by his descendants. Recently, in 1959, a brick cairn and bronze memorial tablet was erected and dedicated on the site of the work reestablished by Wallis after his temporary withdrawal.

SAMUEL H. WAINRIGHT

WAINRIGHT, SAMUEL H. (1863-1950), missionary educator and executive of Japan Christian Literature Society, was born in the state of Missouri. Not long after graduating from Missouri Medical College, he felt God's call to join the newly established Southern Methodist Mission in JAPAN. On May 21, 1888, he and Mrs. Wainright arrived in KOBE. That very night he was called on to teach a class at Palmore Institute.

The Wainrights spent their first two years at Oita on the island of Kyushu, where he taught English in the government middle school while diligently studying the Japanese language. Here he was instrumental in leading a group of young men to Christ. At a time of great crisis, the Mission superintendent, W. R. LAMBUTH (later bishop), accompanied by two Japanese Christians from Kobe, visited Oita. There on the afternoon of Dec. 31, 1889 and in the WATCH NIGHT Service following, there was such an outpouring of the HOLY SPIRIT that it can truly be described as a real Pentecost. From the little "Oita Band" came a number of men who gave their lives to Christian service. One of them, T. KUGIMIYA, many years later became bishop of the JAPAN METHODIST CHURCH.

From 1890 to 1906 the Wainrights were working at Kwansei Gakuin (now a university) in Kobe, where Wainright was principal of the Academic Department. From 1906 to 1912 he was in the United States serving as pastor and district superintendent in St. Louis, Mo.

In 1910 the Japan Christian Literature Society was organized with most of the missions cooperating. It was decided to invite Dr. Wainright to return to Japan to become executive secretary of the Society. His ability in the Japanese language, his scholarship and interest in Christian literature, and his executive ability all together made him the ideal man for the position. He returned to Japan in 1912 to devote the rest of his active life to this challenging task.

In the great earthquake of 1923 the building of the society in Tokyo and also that of the Methodist Publishing House were destroyed. This proved a blessing in disguise for it led to the union of these two institutions, the sale of the Society's land, and eventually to the erection of a great new building on the site of the former Methodist Publishing House on the Ginza in downtown Tokyo. This building, which escaped the bombs of the Second World War, stands today as a memorial to Wainright's great work for Christian literature.

Dr. and Mrs. Wainright retired in 1940, fifty-two years after their arrival in Japan. Wainright died in Oakland, Calif., on Dec. 7, 1950. In the summer of 1963, the Kye Bun Kan (Christian Literature Society) held a great memorial service, 100 years after Wainright's birth. His daughter, Mrs. Elizabeth Wainright Grant, was invited back to Japan especially for this impressive ceremony.

WAKELEY, JOSEPH BEAUMONT (1804-1876), American pastor, ecclesiastical antiquarian and historian, was born in Danbury, Conn. He joined the M.E. Church when he was about sixteen years old and then in 1833 went into the NEW YORK CONFERENCE on trial. In 1844 he transferred to the NEW JERSEY CONFERENCE, and in 1852 to the NEW YORK EAST, and then back to the New York Conference again. He served seven years as a presiding elder. His cast of mind was said to be practical rather than logical. Interested in church history, he studied the early annals of the Church and wrote several books, some copies yet referred to even today. Among them were: Lost Chapters in the History of American Methodism: Heroes of Methodism; The Prince of Pulpit Orators—a portraiture of the Rev. George Whitefield, M.A.; The Patriarch of One Hundred Years, or Reminiscences of the Rev. Henry Boehm; The Bold Frontier Preacher—a portraiture of the Rev. William Craven; Anecdotes of the Wesleys; The Temperance Cyclopaedia; and The Wesleyan Demosthenes: Joseph Beaumont. His love of the classics and of the Church's past caused him to revolt against any innovations, and one of his last messages was, "Preach the old gospel. We want no new one. The old gospel is to save the world; it cannot be improved. One might as well attempt to improve a ray of sunshine while revivifying a flower. The grand old gospel forever!" He died in New York, April 27, 1876.

WALDEN, JOHN MORGAN (1831-1914), American bishop, was born at Lebanon, Ohio, Feb. 11, 1831, the son of Jesse and Matilda (Morgan) Walden. Two years later his mother died, and he lived with relatives near Cincinnati, attending a local school. In 1844 he was on his own and became a wanderer. He worked briefly at carpentering, clerking, and other jobs. Somehow he managed to graduate from Farmers' College, College Hill, Ohio, in 1852 and taught there the next two years. While in college he wrote romantic stories for a newspaper under an assumed name. He pursued newspaper work in Illinois and Ohio for two years. Becoming deeply interested in the KANSAS troubles, he went there in 1856 and published a paper and served as a delegate in several state conventions. He married Martha Young of Knox County, Ohio, July 3, 1859, and they had two sons and three daughters.

In 1858, Walden was admitted on trial in the CINCINNATI CONFERENCE and was ordained DEACON in 1860 and ELDER in 1862. His first appointments were: 1858, North Bend assistant; and 1859, Lynchburgh assistant. His remaining assignments were in Cincinnati: 1860, York Street; 1861, York Street and Ludlow; 1862-63, Ladies Home Mission; 1864-66, Corresponding Secretary, Western FREEDMEN'S AID SOCIETY; 1867, East Cincinnati District; 1868-71, Assistant Agent, Western BOOK CONCERN; and 1872-83, Agent. An able businessman, he made the Book Concern a financial success.

Walden was active during the Civil War, raising two regiments to defend Cincinnati against threatening attack. He was one of the founders of the Republican Party, and was the chief founder and for many years the president of the Freedmen's Aid Society which began in Cincinnati in 1866. He was a delegate to five GENERAL CONFERENCES, 1868-84, and to the first three ECUMENICAL CONFERENCES, 1881-1901.

Elected bishop in 1884, during his career Walden presided at least once over every annual conference and mission of his church in the United States and inspected Methodist missionary work in Europe, MEXICO, South America, CHINA, and JAPAN. A close student with a retentive mind, he had an enormous fund of exact knowledge concerning church law and the details of the work committed to his hands. Bishop EDWIN H. HUGHES said he was the best informed bishop in the church while others referred to him as a walking encyclopedia. Though he stood with the North in the Civil War, he was one of the earliest leaders in his denomination to speak out and work for the unification of American Methodism. He died at Daytona Beach, Fla., Jan. 21, 1914, and was buried in Cincinnati.

WALDORF, ERNEST LYNN (1876-1943), American bishop, was born in South Valley, Otsego, N. Y., May 14, 1876. He was educated at SYRACUSE UNIVERSITY, A.B. and D.D.; KANSAS WESLEYAN and ALBION COLLEGES gave him the LL.D. He married Flora Janette Irish in 1902, and they had four sons and one daughter. He was ordained in the ministry of the M.E. Church in 1902, and held the following pastorates: Shortsville, N. Y.; Union Springs; Phelps; Clyde; Centenary Church, SYRACUSE 1907-11; Plymouth Church, BUFFALO, 1911-15; First Church, CLEVELAND, Ohio, 1915 until elected bishop in 1920.

ERNEST L. WALDORF

Meanwhile he served as president of the WORLD SERVICE Commission and was chairman of the committee to direct the Million Unit Fellowship Movement. He became trustee of NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY at EVANSTON, ILL.; president, WESLEY FOUNDATION Corporation at the University of Illinois in Urbana; vice-president, Board of HOSPITALS, HOMES and Deaconess Work; bishop of WICHITA Area, 1920-24; KANSAS CITY Area, 1924-32; CHICAGO Area, 1932, and died in 1943 and was buried at Morningside Cemetery, Syracuse, in the plot next to that of his good friend, Bishop WALLACE E. BROWN.

Bishop Waldorf was a large man of genial disposition. He had an amazing genius for accomplishing things with Christian diplomacy. One could never be certain whether the Bishop arranged events or whether events themselves just happened to fall in the order the Bishop felt best for the Kingdom. No wonder his sons became noted athletic coaches!

A real part of the Bishop's success came from the fact that Mrs. Waldorf also had unbounded energy and devotion. She drove the family car thousands of miles to get her husband to his various meetings. She died at the age of eighty-seven sitting at the telephone. Waldorf is a noted name around Chicago and through all Methodism which the Waldorfs so jubilantly served.

WALES. Welsh-speaking Methodism dates its official existence from August, 1800, when the Methodist Conference, largely through the influence of THOMAS COKE, authorized two of its ministers, OWEN DAVIES and JOHN HUGHES to take up missionary work in Wales. But there were already in existence English-speaking circuits in the border areas of Flintshire and Denbighshire and in South Wales. A few Welsh-speaking LOCAL PREACHERS had already preached in Welsh before 1800. With their help the two conference missionaries pioneered a movement which was to spread Wesleyan Methodism through the length and breadth of the principality.

The first period of Welsh Wesleyan Methodist history, 1800-1816, is a record of amazing and continuous progress. The earlier CALVINISTIC METHODISM had lost much of its original evangelical zeal. Many were dissatisfied with the prevailing Calvinism of the period. So the new Arminian Evangelical movement which offered salvation for all was welcomed in every part of Wales.

Davies and Hughes began their mission in Wrexham, Ruthin, and Denleigh, forming in October, 1800, their first circuit—Ruthin. By 1803 there were 3 more, Caernarvon, Wrexham, and Welshpool, with 6 ministers, 57 societies, and a membership of 1,344. This progress was recognized by Conference in 1803, when the North Wales District was formed, with Owen Davies as the first chairman. In 1805 work began in South Wales with the appointment of three Welsh-speaking ministers to "English" circuits in South Wales with authority to open up new places among Welsh-speaking people. There were many of these in the older "English" societies, who warmly welcomed the new Welsh preachers. By 1810 there were five Welsh-speaking circuits in South Wales, Neath, Carmarthen, Merthyr Tydfil, Brecon, and Cardigan.

In 1810 there were in Wales 20 circuits, 49 ministers, and 5,649 members, representing continuous progress despite constant opposition from other Christian bodies who resented the Wesleyan "intruders" because of their Arminian theology. The early preachers were constantly engaged in theological controversy. To make known their distinctive beliefs they established their own book room in 1809 and began to publish their periodical, Yr Eurgrawn.

The years following 1816 were very difficult owing to decreased membership, administrative changes, and financial hardship largely caused by economies forced upon the connection in the post-Napoleonic period. Circuit amalgamations, especially in South Wales, hindered and sometimes crippled the progress of the Welsh-speaking societies. This period, preceded by the death of Thomas Coke, the great friend and advocate of the mission to his native Wales marked the loss to Wales of several of the early leaders, notably Owen Davies, the first chairman. By the end of the second decade the number of ministers had fallen to 29 and the membership had not progressed beyond 5,338. Recovery came slowly, and one encouraging new aspect was the founding of Sunday schools, which numbered 178 by 1824, and which were attended by adult scholars as well as children. This slow but uninterrupted progress was recognized by the 1828 Conference, which divided the territory into two—the North Wales District and the Second South Wales District. This provision was to last until 1903, when North Wales was further divided into the two present districts.

The decade 1830-40 brought further increases of membership and the erection of many new chapels. There were 25 circuits, 49 ministers, and 11,926 members in the Welsh districts in 1840. In 1831 a serious constitutional dispute began in Anglesey and Caernarvonshire which led to the secession of a group which became known as the Wesleyan Methodists Minor (Y Wesle Bach). This dispute originated in the dissatisfaction of certain local preachers with authority entrusted to the ministers by Conference. They argued for greater elasticity in the planning of preaching appointments and a larger share for the laity in the governing of the Church. The Wesleyans Minor became a part of INDEPENDENT METHODISM in 1832, but in 1838 transferred their allegiance to the WESLEYAN METHODIST ASSOCIATION. But neither of these were able to provide sufficient help for the Welsh seceders in their extremely difficult task of keeping together their scattered societies.

In 1838 many of the Wesleyan Methodists Minor returned to their original fold, and several of the chapels were received back into the North Wales District. When the Wesleyan Methodist Association became part of the UNITED METHODIST FREE CHURCHES in 1857, there were only six Welsh societies to share in that union. These eventually either returned to the Wesleyan Methodists or joined other denominations. It cannot be said that the Wesleyans Minor made any new theological contribution, for they adhered to Wesleyan doctrines. But many of their constitutional principles were eventually accepted by the Wesleyan Methodist connection.

At the time of the WESLEYAN REFORM agitations of the middle period of the nineteenth century, a number of Reform societies were established in Wales. These made very little progress after 1853, for the cause of Conference was championed by able leaders, notably THOMAS AUBREY and Rowland Hughes. Spared from dispute and schism, the Welsh districts had to face difficulties caused by crippling debts—the result of a too-adventurous policy of chapel building in former years. But in 1850 the Jubilee of the connection in Wales was celebrated with a new determination to tackle financial problems. Thomas Aubrey (1808-67), who became the chairman of the North Wales District in 1854, realized that it wasn't enough to clear existing debts. To place his district's economy on sure foundations the District Home Mission Fund (1855) and the District Chapel Fund (1856) were established. Similar steps were taken in South Wales. Aubrey also pioneered mission schemes to expand as well as consolidate the work.

This strenuous period of reconstruction was followed by the great religious revival of 1859, which began with the evangelical labor in Cardiganshire of Humphrey Jones of Tre'rddol, a Wesleyan LOCAL PREACHER. Connectional statistics indicate the substantial gains of those momentous years. Before the revival the Wesleyan Methodists comprised 11,702 members, 54 ministers, and 30 circuits (1857), but four years later, 16,766 members, 68 ministers, and 37 circuits (1861).

The latter part of the nineteenth century was marked by growing confidence and advance. It was an age of great preachers: men like the well-beloved JOHN EVANS (1840-97), Eglwys-bach. Theology, literature, and poetry, especially hymn writing flourished. The new Welsh book room was opened at Bangor in 1887, and connectional publications enjoyed a constant increase in circulation. The resurgent national concern for better education found a ready response; and in 1897, through the advocacy of Thomas Hughes (1854-1928), the Welsh Training of Candidates Fund came into being, to enable young Welsh candidates for the ministry to enter the colleges of the University of Wales.

The aspirations of Welsh Methodism found new expression in the Welsh Assembly, which met for the first time at Machynlleth in 1899 under the presidency of Edward Humphreys (1846-1913). The Synods continued to have the same relationship to Conference; but the Assembly was allowed to deliberate policy for the Welsh Districts.

During the present century many adverse factors have militated against the work of the Christian Churches in Wales. Despite many setbacks Welsh Methodism has striven to fulfill its historic mission. Interest in the study of the history and literature of early Methodism in Wales has been renewed by the Historical Society of the Methodist Church in Wales (founded, 1945). In 1957 the Standing Committee for Methodism in Wales was set up by Conference to review problems and opportunities and to link together all Districts, both English and Welsh-speaking, in a new strategy for the work of the principality.

Welsh Methodism has enriched the life of Wales in many ways, notably in the nineteenth century, through its broader theology, its closely knit organization, and courageous policy of chapel building. It has also enriched the Church in other lands. Ever since 1814 when the first missionary, William Davies (1785-1851), went out to Sierra Leone, Welsh Methodism has in each generation provided men for the work overseas. Many Welshmen have also served in England, and a number of them have been elected to the chair of Conference. Three of these, at least, were Welsh-speaking: RICHARD ROBERTS, HENRY MALDWYN HUGHES and HAROLD ROBERTS. (See also SWANSEA.)

WALKER, DOUGAL ORMONDE BEACONSFIELD (1890-1955), American bishop of the A.M.E. CHURCH, was born in Layou, St. Vincent, British West Indies, on Jan. 5, 1890. He received the A.B. degree from BOSTON UNIVERSITY, S.T.B. from Harvard University, and the M.A. from Western Reserve University. Later he received the honorary degrees of D.D. and LL.D. He was admitted into the ANNUAL CONFERENCE in 1913, ordained a DEACON in 1913 and an ELDER in 1915. He held pastorates in MASSACHUSETTS, NORTH CAROLINA, PENNSYLVANIA, OHIO and NEW YORK. He was president of WILBERFORCE UNIVERSITY, 1936-41, and was elected bishop in 1948 from the pastorate of Bethel Church in BUFFALO, N. Y. He was assigned to the Fifth Episcopal District. Bishop Walker was one of the first Negro Democrats and political leaders in the state of Ohio. Bishop WRIGHT says that he "was regarded as one of the best thinkers of the Church. He was outspoken, could not be diplomatic but gained his objectives by aggressive action." He was such an opponent of Governor John W. Bricker of Ohio that the governor threatened to hold up the state's appropriation to Wilberforce University and refused to accept an honorary degree on the same platform with Bishop Walker. Named for him are Walker Temple, LOS ANGELES and St. Louis; Walker Church at LONG BEACH, CALIF. and St. Vincent's Island.

WALKER, GEORGE WILLIAMS (1848-1911), American educator and minister, was born Feb. 11, 1848. His father was Rev. Hugh A. C. Walker, and his mother a sister of Bishop WILLIAM M. WIGHTMAN. The son graduated from WOFFORD COLLEGE in 1869, and then taught school for four years. He joined the SOUTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE

ENCE in December 1873. He served as a pastor for eleven years (one year of which was at Lexington, Mo.), and in 1884 went to PAINE COLLEGE, Augusta, Ga., as a teacher when the school was two years old. In 1885 he succeeded Morgan Callaway as president at a critical time in the school's history. His conference memoir declared that he "did a monumental work at Paine." He died May 28, 1911.

WALKER, JESSE (1766-1835), American pioneer preacher, was born June 9, 1766 in Buckingham County, Va., the son of Elmore and Mary LeSelle Walker. He was converted and joined the Methodist Church in 1786. About two years later he married Susanna Webbley, daughter of a prominent family. About 1789 Walker and his family migrated to North Carolina and in 1796 moved to Tennessee, locating near Nashville.

Soon after his conversion he became a local preacher and in 1802, moved by the sudden death of two children, he united with the WESTERN CONFERENCE. He served three circuits: Red River, Livingston, and Hartford in KENTUCKY and TENNESSEE.

In 1805 presiding elder WILLIAM MCKENDREE sent Walker and LEWIS GARRETT to MISSOURI, in the territory recently purchased by the United States. In 1806 Walker accompanied McKendree on a trip through Southern ILLINOIS. As a result of this tour Walker was appointed to Illinois in the Autumn of 1806.

In 1807 Walker was appointed to the Missouri Circuit and the following year he was returned to the Illinois Circuit. He served the CAPE GIRARDEAU Circuit in Missouri during 1809 and 1810, and in the latter year he, with young JOHN SCRIPPS, established Methodism in NEW MADRID. In 1811 he returned to the Illinois Circuit and in 1812 he became presiding elder of the Illinois District and served in this capacity four years. In 1816 he was transferred, as presiding elder, to the Missouri District.

In 1819 and 1820 he was missionary-at-large in Missouri. He opened work in St. Louis and in 1821 was appointed there and organized a class, built a church, and entertained the conference in 1822. Again appointed missionary, he went north to contact the Pottowatomie Indians, then returned and went as delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCE.

While attending the General Conference at BALTIMORE in 1824, he went to WASHINGTON and secured permission from the Government to establish a mission school for Indians in Northern Illinois; this he opened in 1825 a few miles north of the present city of Ottawa. From his school he scouted the wilderness of Northern Illinois for new settlers. One of these excursions took him to CHICAGO, then a village around Ft. Dearborn. He continued occasional visits to Chicago, and on Nov. 25, 1830, reporting to Bishop R. R. ROBERTS, he closed his report with these words: "I still have hopes that Chicago will some day receive the gospel." His hopes were fulfilled. In June 1831, Walker, assisted by Stephen R. Beggs, organized the first church in Chicago, with eight members. In 1834 he built a church house twenty-eight by thirty-eight feet in size at a cost of $580. This class became the Chicago Temple (First Church, Chicago).

In 1834 Jesse Walker retired from active work, but he continued to preach. He died on Oct. 4, 1835. He was first buried on his farm on the Des Plaines River, ten miles west of Chicago, but later was interred at Plainfield, Ill., his former home. It was said of him, "When we sought to find Brother Walker, he was always farther on." Governor John Reynolds called him "a kind of Martin Luther of the church of the west, and bore the standard of the cross triumphantly throughout the wilderness country."

WALKER, SAMUEL (1714-1761), Anglican Evangelical, was curate of Truro, Cornwall, from 1746. Converted through George Conon, a Scottish schoolmaster, Walker's preaching filled the church and purged the town. He set up classes in order to conserve the gains of revival and in 1750 founded a Clerical Club. In Cornwall JOHN WESLEY regarded Walker as the sole exception to his somewhat arbitrary rule that no clergyman in a settled parish could do work of lasting worth. Wesley was in considerable correspondence with Walker over the question of separation from the Church of England.

WALLBRIDGE, ELIZABETH (1770-1801), British Methodist, was born at Arretton, Isle of Wight, in 1770. She was converted in 1797 by a Wesleyan Methodist itinerant, and lived an intensely pietistic life until her death at Arretton on May 30, 1801. Legh Richmond (1772-1827), an Anglican parson, made of her life story one of the most successful tracts of the nineteenth century; she is remembered by its title The Dairyman's Daughter (1811).

WALLER, ALVAN (1808-1873), American missionary, minister and university financial agent in the Pacific Northwest. He was a member of the GENESSEE CONFERENCE in New York, when in 1839 he was appointed a member of the OREGON mission. He was a member of a large reinforcement of the mission recruited by JASON LEE, who had made a long trip across country to seek the added workers. Lee brought the new missionaries, not across the plains, but by the long sea voyage around Cape Horn, reaching Oregon in June 1840. When the Indian mission was closed in 1846, Waller remained in Oregon to help build the church among the pioneers who were settling the Oregon country.

His conference memoir states: "For the space of thirty-two years Bro. Waller has been identified with every vital interest of Oregon Methodism. He has labored among the Indians; has been in pastoral work on our circuits and districts; took an active part in establishing the Pacific Christian Advocate; has toiled for years to build up the WILLAMETTE UNIVERSITY; . . . and perhaps more than any other one man has circulated Methodist books among the people."

Overshadowing all other work of this devoted minister was his work for Willamette University, a Methodist university and the oldest in the Pacific Northwest. He served many years as its "Agent," a position which involved raising money to support the school, and of having full charge of all the business of the school. Many years he returned his full salary to the University, and supported his family by selling his land claim, a few acres at a time. In 1860 he launched a campaign for a new building; it required a decade of sacrificial labor to raise the money, and almost as long to build, as Waller sought to pay as he built. He personally supervised the building operations from burning the bricks to the point where the four-story college hall was ready for use in the fall of 1867. It was fittingly named "Waller Hall."

WALLIS, JAMES (1809-1895), New Zealand Methodist minister, was born at Blackwell, London, England. He was received into the ministry in 1833, and came to New Zealand, arriving at Hokianga in December, 1834, where he was appointed to Waingaroa (Raglan). In 1836, when arguments with the Church Missionary Society about spheres of influence arose, he was withdrawn for a period, but returned in 1839, and labored there until 1862. Several Maori chiefs of high rank were converted under his fruitful preaching. In his later years, Wallis entered the European work and served at Onehunga and Pitt Street, AUCKLAND. He became a supernumerary in 1868, and spent a long retirement in Auckland until his death on July 5, 1895.

Wallis imbued his family with missionary zeal to such effect that two daughters, a son, and a grandson became missionaries to the South Seas.

WALLS, WILLIAM JACOB (1885-), a bishop of the A.M.E. ZION CHURCH, a son of Edward and Harriet (Edgerton) Walls, was born at Chimney Rock, N. C., May 8, 1885. He graduated from LIVINGSTONE COLLEGE, Salisbury, N. C., in 1908, and from the Hood Theological Seminary in 1913. He received the M.A. degree from the University of Chicago in 1941. He married Dorothy Louise Jordan. He was pastor of the following churches: Cleveland, Lincoln, and SALISBURY in NORTH CAROLINA, and Broadway, Louisville, Ky. He became editor of the Star of Zion in 1920, serving as such for four years, at which time he was elected to the episcopacy in Indianapolis, Ind. (1924). For a number of years he was secretary of the Board of BISHOPS of the Zion Methodist Church, and for a like period chairman of the Board of Trustees of Livingstone College. From 1921 on he has been identified with the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL. He has also been identified with the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, the World Council of Religious Education, and the NATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. At present he is also the chairman of the Board of Christian Education, Home and Church Division, of the denomination.

WALSH, THOMAS (1730-1759), one of the earliest Irish Methodist preachers, was born in Ballylinn, County Limerick, and brought up as a practicing and sincere Roman Catholic. He became increasingly dissatisfied with his faith, and was advised by an elder brother, who had abandoned the Church of Rome, and by Philip Guier, a notable member of the IRISH PALATINES, to read the Bible. This led to a firm belief in Jesus Christ as the one mediator between God and man, and he abjured the Church of his fathers for that of the Protestant Established Church (Anglican).

He was then nineteen years old, and in that same year he heard for the first time Methodist open air preachers. He noted that their message was in full accord with the Articles and Homilies of the CHURCH OF ENGLAND, and he joined the Methodist Society formed in the town of Newmarket. In Methodism, and particularly as expressed in the hymns of CHARLES WESLEY, he found that full joy in salvation which he sought. He consulted JOHN WESLEY as to whether he should preach. Wesley sent him to Slronil, County Tipperary, in July 1750, and advised him to preach in Irish (his mother tongue) as well as in English.

Thomas Walsh proved a most successful preacher. His zeal triumphed over bitter opposition from mobs. When thrown into prison in Bandon, he continued to preach through the window of his cell. His preaching in the Irish language won many souls in the south and west of the country. His great appeal led Wesley to bring him to England in 1753, and a considerable part of his remaining short ministry was spent in that country. John Wesley said on one occasion, "Give me half-a-dozen men like Tommy Walsh, and I'll turn the kingdom upside down."

He threw himself into Biblical study in the original Hebrew and Greek, and became a recognized expert therein. Wesley said that he was the best Hebrew scholar he had ever met, for he knew the meaning of every word every time it occurred in the Old Testament. In all his activity, his radiant Christian character shone clearly, and no one could doubt but that he deserved to be called a true saint.

All this time, Thomas Walsh never had a whole day free from pain or weakness. His life was described as a lingering death, for he suffered from that scourge of Ireland, consumption or tuberculosis. He accentuated this weakness by failing to take enough rest. He studied late and rose by four every morning. When with Wesley on the latter's first visit to the north of IRELAND in 1756, he was chased by a mob from Newtownards, and received a severe wetting in crossing open fields to escape. This made his health even worse, and his last illness began at BRISTOL in February 1758. He was moved to DUBLIN where he died in one of the rooms of the Whitefriar Street chapel, April 8, 1759, when still only twenty-eight years of age. His remains lie in an old Dublin graveyard called the "Cabbage Garden" from the Capuchin Order which formerly owned the land. He is commemorated by a tablet in Ballingrane Methodist Church, County Limerick.

FREDERICK JEFFERY

WALTER, JOHN (1781-1819), American Evangelical Association minister, was born Aug. 21, 1781 near Quakertown. His parents were too poor for him to receive an education, but he did learn the trade of a tailor and the art of basketmaking. He was converted through the preaching of JACOB ALBRIGHT and became Albright's first assistant in 1802. Although John Walter was often required to spell his texts, he was one of the finest orators that the early EVANGELICAL ASSOCIATION produced.

He was married Aug. 8, 1808 to Miss Christiana Becker, from which union three children were born. In 1810 he published at his own expense the first hymnbook of the denomination, Eine Kleine Sammlung alter und neuer Geistreicher Lieder. It contained fifty-six hymns, a number of which Walter had written himself. The two most popular German camp meeting songs, based on their use in various songbooks, were composed by John Walter and entitled, "Kommt, Bruder, Kommt, wir eilen fort" (Come, Brother, Come, we'll journey on) and "Wer will mit uns nach Zion gehn?" (Who will go with us to Zion?). His itinerating ceased abruptly in 1813 due to tuberculosis. He then did a little farming and tried to support his family, but it became necessary for friends to supply him with the necessities. Death came to him Dec. 3, 1818 at his home in Lebanon County, Pa. His body was laid to rest in a private cemetery where for 112 years the grave was poorly kept. In 1930 the remains were moved to the Evangelical church cemetery at Ono, Pa., and a proper marker was erected.

WALTHAM, MASSACHUSETTS, U.S.A., nine miles west of Boston on the Charles River and known as the home of the Waltham Watch Company from 1854 to 1950, is now the center of 250 diverse industries; here are located Bentley College and Brandeis University. Still standing on Winter Street, across the Cambridge Reservoir from Route 128, and now owned by the Polaroid Corporation, is the house occupied the latter part of the eighteenth century by Abraham Bemis, prominent Methodist layman, whose only daughter Mary married George Pickering, Maryland-born New England Methodist itinerant. Here, in "the Bemis-Pickering homestead," Francis Asbury was entertained on many of his New England travels from 1791 through 1813; he mentions this home at least twenty times in his Journal.

Entertained here over the years were nine bishops and 400 preachers. A Methodist society which took up its location in the adjoining community of Weston and continues until the present was organized in this historic house in 1792. From the Weston society, the first Methodist church in Waltham itself was organized in 1837. Waltham Methodism grew into two churches. The older of these, Asbury Temple, gave up its identity and merged with Immanuel Methodist Church in 1939. This 911-member congregation (1970) is influential in city and conference affairs. Immanuel Church building contains a unique rose window, executed by the Connick Studios of Boston, depicting the life of Christ through plant symbols. Located in Waltham is Grove Hill Cemetery where Pickering, oldest effective Methodist minister at the time of his death in 1846, lies buried.

Polaroid Farmhouse on Winter Street, one mile from Route 128, originally built in 1710, occupied for about a century and a half by the Bemis-Pickering families, then owned for almost another century by the Stewart family, and now the property of the Polaroid Corporation, was, according to tradition, a haven for nine Methodist bishops and 400 itinerants from 1790 to 1850.

GEORGE PICKERING, born in Maryland and converted at OLD ST. GEORGE'S in Philadelphia, itinerated throughout New England and married Mary Bemis (1777-1859), daughter of Abraham, owner of "the farmhouse." Here in this rural setting Methodism found a headquarters for the entire region surrounding Boston. Bishop ASBURY, a frequent sojourner at the farmhouse, wrote in his Journal: "O! a solitary house, and social family; a comfortable table, pure air, and good water, are blessings at Waltham." Other notables definitely known to have tarried here include Jesse Lee, Bishops George, Hedding, Roberts, and Whatcoat.

The four rooms and fireplaces in the front of the building with broad floorboards and rough-hewn basement beams were added in 1793; in 1910 sections constructed prior to 1793 were torn down and certain alterations were made in the structure. Although not open to the public, between 80,000 to 90,000 scientists, engineers, and salesmen from around the world annually spend time in this home-like setting deliberately preserved by the Polaroid Corporation for small, informal, creative meetings. Dr. Edwin Land and his associates, under the banner of science, are endeavoring to enrich life through the projected results of small group meetings in this farmhouse, just as Bishop Asbury and his associates endeavored to do under the banner of religion. The furnishings of the house are eighteenth century reproductions; and on the walls hang engravings and memorabilia of early Methodist leaders.

WAR DAMAGE. The bombing of Great Britain during the Second World War resulted in some three thousand recorded cases of damage to Methodist church buildings. These varied in extent, some being relatively slight and capable of repair, while nearly a thousand involved substantial destruction. This damage was fairly widespread over England, with some in Scotland, but it was most concentrated in the large cities. Government policy, which applied equally to all churches, was that of an ex gratia payment for the repair, reinstatement, or replacement of the fabric of damaged churches, while property generally was dealt with through a contributory fund. A feature of the policy toward churches which was of great importance was known as "portability." This meant that, because of the displacement and rehousing of the population, an assessed church war-damaged payment could be used on another site where there was need. A fund of over £600,000 was raised to supplement government payments, of which half was used for Methodist war damage overseas.

WARD, ALBERT NORMAN (1871-1935), American minister and educator, was born in Harford County, Md., Nov. 27, 1871.

He received his B.A. degree from WESTERN MARYLAND COLLEGE in 1895. His M.A. degree was earned at George Washington University in 1902.

In 1895 Ward entered the MARYLAND CONFERENCE of the M.P. CHURCH. He served churches in BALTIMORE, Md.; WASHINGTON, D.C.; and SEATTLE, Wash. He began his career as an educator in 1913, when he became vice-president of Western Maryland College, serving until 1916.

He then resumed the pastorate until 1919, when KANSAS CITY UNIVERSITY named him its chancellor. In 1920 he returned to his Alma Mater, Western Maryland College, as president. He remained there for fifteen years.

He earned a permanent place of honor at this fine small institution as he guided the college through an era of expansion and development. In 1929 he inaugurated and served two years as chairman of the Liberal Arts Movement for smaller colleges, an association designed to attract nationwide financial assistance for colleges. Western Maryland College's trustees named a boys' dormitory for Ward and a girls' dormitory for his wife.

Several outstanding colleges and universities honored him with honorary doctorates for his work in the field of education. WARD, ERNEST F. (1850-1937), the first Free Methodist foreign missionary, was born in Elgin, Ill., April 25, 1850. He arrived in INDIA in January 1881, as a "faith" missionary, as the FREE METHODISTS had no mission board at this time. Mrs. Ward's savings from her school teaching paid the transportation costs. Their home conference in ILLINOIS recognized the call, gave approval, special ordination, and the promise of prayer!

Ernest Ward reported his work regularly in the denominational paper. Meager support was given. The denominational Mission Board was organized in 1882. Ward accepted it as his "advisory committee." He continued independent planning and financing of his work until 1904, when he asked for missionary appointment under the Board.

Three daughters were born to the Wards while they were in India. Mrs. Phoebe Ward died in 1910 in Seattle. The oldest daughter, Ethel, returned with Ward to India. He was able to speak and write several languages. He retired in 1927 and resided in Los Angeles, Calif., where he died Nov. 3, 1937.

WARD, HARRY FREDERICK (1873-1966), American minister, professor, and social reform leader, was born in LONDON, England, Oct. 15, 1873, the son of Harry and Fanny (Jeffery) Ward. Coming to America in 1891, he studied at the UNIVERSITY OF SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA and won the A.B. degree at NORTHWESTERN (1897) and the A.M. at Harvard (1898). He achieved Phi Beta Kappa, and was awarded the LL.D. by the University of Wisconsin (1931).

Ward was admitted on trial in the SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA CONFERENCE in 1893 and was left without appointment to attend school each year until 1899 when he transferred to the ROCK RIVER CONFERENCE. He was head resident, Northwestern University Settlement, 1898-1900, and served successively as pastor of Wabash Avenue and Union Avenue Churches in CHICAGO and Euclid Avenue Church in Oak Park, 1899-1912. He was professor of social service, BOSTON UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY, 1913-18, and professor of Christian ethics, Union Theological Seminary, New York, 1918-41, when he retired. He continued as a member of the Rock River Conference until his death.

Throughout his life Ward was widely recognized as a social crusader. His colorful personality was a combination of high intelligence, high-strung intensity, and deep commitment. He was instrumental in writing the SOCIAL CREED adopted by the 1908 GENERAL CONFERENCE, and was chairman of the American Civil Liberties Union, 1920-40, and chairman of the American League for Peace and Democracy, 1934-40. He led in founding the METHODIST FEDERATION FOR SOCIAL SERVICE, served as its editorial secretary, 1907-11, and then as general secretary until 1944. Under his vigorous leadership, the Federation was for many years an effective although unofficial social conscience for American Methodism. Prior to unification in 1939, it championed the eight hour day, minimum wage laws, social security, the right of labor to organize, and other causes, and was the most influential organization of its kind in American Protestantism.

Unfortunately as time passed, Ward's blinding vision seemed to blur his good judgment. Under his leadership the Federation for Social Service tacked sharply to the left. Always critical of the abuses of capitalism, the organization began attacking the system itself and embraced the socialist vision of a classless society. Both Ward and the Federation then lost much of the respect which socially conscious Methodists had accorded them. The 1952 General Conference emphatically dissociated The Methodist Church from the Federation and set up its own Board of Social and Economic Relations.

Among Ward's books were: Social Creed of the Churches, 1913; Social Etangelism, 1915; The New Social Order—Principles and Programs, 1919; Our Economic Morality, 1929; Which Way Religion? 1931; In Place of Profit, 1933; and The Soviet Spirit, 1945. He died at Palisade, N. J., Dec. 9, 1966, and was buried at North Bergen, N. J.

WARD, JAMES THOMAS (1820-1897), American minister and M.P. president, was born at Georgetown, D. C., on Aug. 21, 1820, the eldest son of Ulysses and Susan V. (Beall) Ward. He received his education at Columbian Academy, WASHINGTON, D. C. and at Brookeville Academy, Montgomery County, Md. He was licensed to preach in 1840, and after a year of theological studies under Augustus Webster and Andrew A. Lipscomb was received as a ministerial member of the MARYLAND CONFERENCE of the M.P. CHURCH. For twenty-five years Ward served pastorates in MARYLAND, WEST VIRGINIA, PHILADELPHIA and Washington, D. C. In 1886 he moved to Westminster, Md., and assumed teaching duties for a year in the WESTMINSTER SEMINARY (a Literary and Classical School). In 1867 he became traveling agent for WESTERN MARYLAND COLLEGE (opened 1867) and in 1868 its principal. This title was changed to president in 1873. After eighteen years he resigned the College presidency and in 1886 was elected president of the Westminster Theological Seminary (opened 1882), a position he held until his death, March 11, 1897.

Ward received the D.D. degree from ADRIAN COLLEGE in 1871, and that of F.S.Sc.A. from the Society of Science and Art, LONDON, ENGLAND in 1887. His sermons and articles appeared frequently in the periodicals of his denomination and his A Daily Manual for Bible Readers was published in Baltimore in 1894.

RALPH A. WARD

WARD, RALPH ANSEL (1882-1958), American bishop, was born at Leroy, Ohio, June 26, 1882, the son of Fletcher D. and Harriet G. (Walker) Ward. He held the A.B. (1903) and A.M. (1906) from OHIO WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY, the S.T.B. (1906) from BOSTON UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY, and the D.D. (1919) from BALDWIN-WALLACE COLLEGE. He married Mildred M. Worley, Sept. 7, 1905, and they had two daughters. His wife died in 1947, and in 1948 he married Katherine Boeye, a former missionary to CHINA.

Ward was admitted in the NEW ENGLAND CONFERENCE in 1907, ordained DEACON under the missionary rule, and transferred at once to the NORTH OHIO CONFERENCE. He served supply pastorates in MASSACHUSETTS, 1906-09. He transferred to the Foochow China Conference in 1909 and was ordained ELDER in 1910. Devoting one year to language study in China, he was appointed to the Foochow District, 1910-15.

Returning to the United States on furlough in 1916, Ward served three years as associate secretary of the Centenary Campaign, and then was associate secretary of the Board of MISSIONS for Eastern China, 1919-24. He was president of Anglo-Chinese College, Foochow, 1925-27, and then came to America to serve as executive secretary of the Committee on Conservation and Advance, 1928-32. Returning to the mission field, he transferred to the Central China Conference and was appointed city missionary in Nanking, 1933-37. The East Asia Central Conference elevated him to the episcopacy in 1937 and assigned him to the Chengtu Area which included west China. In 1940 he was sent to Shanghai with responsibility for the work in the lower Yantze River valley.

The Japanese imprisoned Ward, Nov. 5, 1942, besieged him with questions, and finally resorted to torture trying to make him confess that he was an American spy. As the ordeal progressed he said, "You can keep this up until you kill me, but remember—I follow a Master who died on a cross!" He was released from prison Sept. 20, 1945, but though he was suffering from malnutrition and though he had not seen his family and had not even been allowed to write to his wife while incarcerated, he declined to return to America and started at once on a 600-mile tour of his episcopal area so that, as he said, he could take to the people of America a story of the bravery and persistence on the part of the Chinese Christians in the face of persecution and destruction of church property.

Following a year of rest in America, Ward returned to China in 1947 and stayed on even after the communists took control. But in 1951, at the urging of Chinese friends and associates, he left mainland China and went to HONG KONG to work among refugees from the interior. Though he retired in 1953, the COUNCIL OF BISHOPS continued to assign him to administer the work in Hong Kong and TAIWAN. He led in strengthening Methodism in both places, including the relocating of Soochow University on Taiwan. During his last illness Bishop Ward ordained three young Chinese men who knelt at his bedside. Moments after telling them in a weak voice to go and preach, he passed into a coma. He died in Hong Kong, Dec. 10, 1958, and the funeral was held there four days later.

WARD, ROBERT (1816-1876), New Zealand PRIMITIVE METHODIST minister, to whom belongs the distinction of establishing the connection in New Zealand, was born in Spore, Norfolk, England, in 1816. He entered the ministry in 1835, where he served for nine years in English circuits, proving his gifts as a preacher and winning more than four hundred people to Christ. Selected by the missionary committee to go to New Zealand, he and his family arrived in New Plymouth in the latter part of August, 1844.

While ministering to a European congregation, he also sought to evangelize the Maori people. In this latter work he had some success, but the scattered nature of the Maori work made this very arduous, so that reluctantly he relinquished his efforts and concentrated on building up the European congregations. At the same time his interest in the Maori people never wavered, as is evident in his published work, Life among the Maori People in New Zealand. During his term of ministry in New Plymouth of nearly nine years, he visited Wellington in 1847. He spent nine years in Auckland, which was followed by a second term in New Plymouth of nine years. In 1868, he was transferred to Wellington, where he remained until his death on Oct. 13, 1876. His ministry of forty years, of which over thirty were spent in New Zealand, was a marvel of sustained and divinely blessed activity.

SETH WARD

WARD, SETH (1858-1909), American bishop, was born in Leon County, Texas, Nov. 15, 1858, the son of Samuel Goode and Sarah Ann (Wyche) Ward. Samuel, a native of Lynchburg, Va., left the University of Virginia in 1837 without graduating and went to TEXAS. A soldier in the Mexican War, he was wounded at San Jacinto and was present at the fall of Mexico City.

Seth Ward lived and worked on a farm until he entered the ministry at twenty-three. His formal education was limited to five months in a country school. However, his father instructed him, and in time he became an assiduous reader, mastered good books, and acquired a personal library which included the best volumes. He was gifted as a poet and had an interest in geology. SOUTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY awarded him the D.D. degree in 1900. He married Margaret E. South, Jan. 5, 1886, and they had two sons and one daughter.

Ward was converted at thirteen, and, influenced by his mother, joined the NORTHWEST TEXAS CONFERENCE in 1881. He was ordained deacon in 1883 and elder in 1885. In 1882 he transferred to the TEXAS CONFERENCE. His appointments were: 1881, West Corsicana Circuit; 1882, Centerville Circuit junior preacher; 1883, Kosse Circuit; 1884-85, Calvert and Hearn; 1886-89, St. James, Galveston; 1890-93, Huntsville; 1894-95, HOUSTON District; 1896-98, Shearue, Houston; 1899, commissioner of education for Texas Methodism; 1900-01, Central Church, Galveston; and 1902-05, assistant secretary, General Board of MISSIONS.

Ward rose rapidly in the conference, filling strong appointments and being accorded positions of leadership. He was elected to four GENERAL CONFERENCES, 1894-1906, leading his conference delegation each time. He was chosen a delegate to the 1901 ECUMENICAL CONFERENCE in LONDON but did not go because he felt obligated to stay in Galveston which had not recovered from the 1900 hurricane which devastated the city and killed 6,000 people. Deeply interested in education, he organized a theological department at Southwestern University and served as a trustee of both that institution and VANDERBILT. Serious and yet amiable and cheerful, he was regarded as a man of sound judgment, an able preacher, and a good executive.

Elected bishop in 1906, Ward was assigned to supervise the mission work in CHINA, JAPAN, KOREA, and MEXICO. He soon won the admiration of workers on the mission fields. Though ill in the summer of 1909 with what was later believed to be a brain tumor, he sailed for the Orient and died in Kobe, Japan, on Sept. 20. Interment was in Houston, Texas, where he lived after his elevation to the episcopacy.

JESSE A. EARL

WARD, THOMAS (1823-1894), bishop of the A.M.E. Church and organizer of African Methodism in the far west, was born in Hanover, Pa., Sept. 28, 1823. Admitted into the New England Conference in 1846, he was ordained deacon in 1847 and elder in 1849. His effective work as Missionary Superintendent of the Pacific Coast in 1856 resulted in the organization of the California Conference (AME) in 1865, extending the denomination's boundaries from coast to coast. Following his election to the bishopric in 1868, Ward further developed the work of the church in the west and southwest by organizing Oklahoma (Indian Territory Mission) Conference in 1879; the Iowa Conference in 1883; and the Rocky Mountain Conference in 1892. Bishop Ward was awarded the honorary D.D. degree by WILBERFORCE UNIVERSITY later in his ministry. He died at Washington, D. C., on June 10, 1894.

GRANT S. SHOCKLEY

WARD, VALENTINE (1781-1835), British Methodist, was born at Madeley, Shropshire, on Jan. 4, 1781. He became a Wesleyan itinerant in 1801. He played an important role in the development, or misdevelopment, of Wesleyan Methodism in SCOTLAND, where he was chairman of one or other of the Scottish districts for about thirteen years. He was stationed in Glasgow, for example, 1811-13, 1820-22, and again in 1827-28, while he was in Edinburgh, 1814-16, and in 1823; from 1817-19 he served in Aberdeen. His building program was an important factor in the numerical decline of Scottish Wesleyanism between 1819 and 1856: the legacy of debt which resulted crippled the societies. In one case it is said that he bought for a society of thirty members a chapel holding 1,300 people. Ward's reputation did not suffer in his own lifetime, however, and in 1834, when a dispute broke out in Jamaican Methodism, he was appointed as General Superintendent of West Indian Missions and sent out to effect a settlement. He was having some success when his health broke down and he died at Montego Bay, JAMAICA, on March 26, 1835.

G. E. LONG

WARD, WALTER WILLIAM (1887-), American clergyman and church hospital sponsor, was born June 7, 1887, near Hillsboro, Texas. In early manhood he became a registered pharmacist. He attended Polytechnic Prep School and College before receiving the A.B. degree from SOUTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY; he later attended the School of Theology at SOUTHERN METHODIST UNIVERSITY. The D.D. degree was conferred on him in 1935 by Southwestern University, and the LL.D. degree in 1969 by Texas Christian University. He joined the Central Texas Conference in 1918; he has served several pastorates and was twice district superintendent. Since 1950 he has served in various capacities with Harris (Methodist) Hospital in Fort Worth; for nine years he was commissioner-chaplain; for two years he handled public relations; and since 1960 has been field representative. He was a delegate to General Conferences in 1934, 1938, 1939, and 1944, and to jurisdictional conferences in 1940, 1944, and 1948. He served as conference secretary from 1938 to 1951, and delivered the 75th anniversary address of Central Texas Conference in 1941. He was a member of the Texas Methodist Historical Commission, 1950-60; and of the Texas Methodist Planning Commission for several years. He has served as a trustee of Southern Methodist University, 1932-59; of WESTERN METHODIST ASSEMBLY, 1929-30; of Texas Christian University's Harris College of Nursing since 1947. He has directed a program of scholarships for nurses in training, which has assisted nearly 500 during the last ten years, and has secured $300,000 for a scholarship endowment.

He entered the PRIMITIVE METHODIST ministry in 1901. In 1933 he was president of the Society for Old Testament Study; he was a lecturer—and later reader—in the Old Testament at Manchester University. He died in 1946.

J. T. WILKINSON

historian of its sessions, was born in Greenwich, N. J., Dec. 19, 1758. He united with a Methodist society and at FRANCIS ASBURY's solicitation commenced a public ministry. Ware was present at the Christmas Conference in 1784 when the M.E. Church was organized, though he seems to have been more of an interested observer than a participant in all that took place—possibly because he was then quite young. In 1785 he received a regular appointment and in 1787 volunteered to go to east Tennessee where he traveled extensively through both Tennessee and North Carolina. He was instrumental in the conversion of General Russell and his wife, MADAME RUSSELL (nec Elizabeth Henry), who was a sister of Patrick Henry. Ware returned to the east in 1791 and after other appointments was placed in charge of a district on the Peninsula (Delaware and Maryland). At the General Conference of 1812, he was elected Book Agent and after holding this office for four years, returned to the pastorate and continued in the itinerancy until 1825.

Thomas Ware wrote an article on the Christmas Conference published in the Methodist Magazine and Quarterly Review for January 1832, and this article has often been cited by historians of early Methodism in its analysis of men and events at that important organizing Conference. He was a great champion of Coke and Asbury, and defended the positions they took at the Christmas Conference and subsequently. Methodist constitutional historians rely greatly on Ware for their judgment on these and kindred matters. He died at Salem, N. J., March 11, 1842.

WARFIELD, GAITHER POSTLEY (1896-), American minister and missionary to POLAND, was born in Rockville, Md., on Feb. 13, 1896. He was the son of Robert Clarence and Maggie (Webb) Warfield, and was educated at DICKINSON COLLEGE (A.B. in 1917, M.A. in 1923, and the honorary D.D. in 1942). He also became a B.D. of DREW UNIVERSITY and studied later at Union Theological Seminary in New York. He joined the BALTIMORE CONFERENCE of the M.E. Church, South in 1922, and was transferred to the WEST VIRGINIA CONFERENCE (MES) in 1924, in which Conference he was ordained DEACON and ELDER and came into full connection in 1926. He served in the first World War, 1918-20, as a second lieutenant, and was decorated with the Officer's Cross of Order of Merit First Class (Germany).

In 1924 he went as a missionary to Poland, then being opened up by the activity of the Centenary Commission (CENTENARY FUND) of the M.E. Church, South. He served in various capacities in Poland and while there married Hania Maria Droupowski, the daughter of Dr. Peter Z. Wladyslaw Droupowski. The second World War broke, Poland was invaded, and Warfield was taken prisoner by the Russians and kept as a prisoner of war for sometime, finally obtaining his release since he was an American citizen, and going back to Warsaw. He remained in Poland until Germany declared war upon the United States and as Warsaw was occupied by the German army, he then was put in a German prison camp, where he was kept until the summer of 1942, finally obtaining release as a non-combatant and sailing with his wife and daughter, Monica (Mrs. Charles M. Kulp), to NEW YORK.

Following these experiences and narrating them, he and his wife published a book, Call Us to Witness, in 1944.

While granted the status of "a missionary on furlough," 1942-46, he was drawn into relief work on the staff of the recently organized METHODIST COMMITTEE FOR OVERSEAS RELIEF. He served for six years as executive officer for this organization. In 1952 he was elected General Secretary of this organization, in which capacity he served until his retirement in 1966, his work taking him over the world in assisting and directing in the expenditure of vast funds for the needy in various lands. He kept a residence in his native town of ROCKVILLE, where his father-in-law came to live after the Communist take-over in Poland. Dr. Warfield holds membership in the VIRGINIA CONFERENCE of The United Methodist Church and continues to reside in Rockville.

WARING, EDMUND H. (1826-1916), American minister and historian, was born on Oct. 17, 1826 at Brienton, Herefordshire, England and attended school there. He came to the United States in 1842, attended school for a year and became a cabinet maker apprentice in Bellefonte, Pa. He began local preaching in the Erie Conference of the M.E. Church in 1849 and filled an exhausting circuit of 277 miles in six counties. In 1850 he transferred to the Baltimore Conference as a circuit rider and was ordained deacon in 1852 and elder in 1855. He transferred to the Iowa Conference in 1857 and served a succession of charges at Kossuth, Des Moines, Oskaloosa, Burlington, Keokuk, Ottumwa, Fairfield and Knoxville and was presiding elder of the Mt. Pleasant District. Stricken with severe bronchitis, he retired from pastoral work in 1876, although he continued active in other areas of church life. He had been an official reporter for the General Conferences of 1860 and 1864 and served as official delegate from Iowa in 1868 and 1872. In retirement he acted as a Court Reporter in his Judicial District and devoted himself to historical studies. At his death on Oct. 5, 1916, he was senior minister of the Iowa Conference.

Waring was a trustee of Iowa Wesleyan University 1864-67. His long service as Secretary of the Conference (1859-75) aroused his historical interests. He delivered sermons and addresses for many anniversary observances of Iowa Methodism and of Iowa Wesleyan University, some of which were published. These studies culminated in 1910 with his History of the Iowa Annual Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, which covered in considerable detail the period from 1833 to 1909. The book is based upon a study of all published histories of Methodism for the middle west and upon a firsthand examination of Iowa Conference records. It is the most important contribution to the Iowa Conference history written to the present time. Iowa Wesleyan granted him an honorary D.D. in 1910.

LOUIS A. HASELMAYER

WARNE, FRANCIS WESLEY (1854-1932), American bishop, was born at Erin, Ontario, Canada, Dec. 30, 1854, the son of Francis and Agnes (McCutcheon) Warne. The elder Warne was a local Methodist preacher for sixty years. Young Francis was converted as a boy of thirteen in a revival, and one critic then complained that the meeting was a failure because it won only one lad. He was educated at George Town Academy and Albert College in Ontario, and GARRETT BIBLICAL INSTITUTE (B.D., 1884). The D.D. degree was awarded him by NORTH-WESTERN UNIVERSITY (1900) and Toronto University (1924). He married Margarette E. Jefferis, May 15, 1879, and they had one daughter.

Deciding for the ministry at seventeen during the funeral of his elder sister, Warne joined the Toronto Conference in 1874 and was ordained in 1876. After serving circuits in Toronto, he volunteered for missionary work in the wilds of Manitoba in 1879 and established five churches in three years. After graduating from Garrett, he was received on credentials in the ROCK RIVER CONFERENCE in 1884, and was appointed to Pullman, Ill., that year, and to Austin, 1885-87.

On hearing Bishop JAMES M. THOBURN tell of the need for missionaries in INDIA, Warne offered himself for service there. He transferred to the BENGAL CONFERENCE, arrived in CALCUTTA in January 1888, and was immediately appointed pastor of the Thoburn (English-speaking) Church. From 1890 to 1900 he served both the church and the Calcutta District.

The 1900 GENERAL CONFERENCE elected Warne and E. W. PARKER missionary bishops for Southern Asia. Due to the death of Parker and the failing health of Bishop Thoburn, for most of the quadrennium Warne superintended all the work in India, BURMA, MALAYSIA, and the PHILIPPINES. He organized the M.E. Church in the Philippines in 1903, ordained the first Filipino Protestant minister, and dedicated the first Filipino Protestant church at Pandacan near MANILA. In 1904 Warne was assigned to LUCKNOW. There in North India in the next twenty years he did his greatest work, becoming the leader of the Mass Mission Movement which won 30,000 converts a year for twenty years. In 1924 he was assigned to Bangalore and supervised the work in South India and Burma. He retired in 1928. Meantime, the 1920 General Conference elected him a bishop or general superintendent of the M.E. Church.

A man of ability characterized by evangelistic zeal, Warne became an acknowledged leader in the work in Southern Asia soon after arriving in India. As a bishop in the region he rendered distinguished service to the church. A prolific writer, some of his works were: The Darjeeling Disaster, Its Bright Side, 1900; The India Mass Mission Movement, 1915; A Tribute to the Triumphant, Mrs. L. S. Parker, 1915; and The Lord's Supper, 1924.

Warne was unusually active during retirement. His platform ability, wide experience, and evangelistic and missionary zeal kept him in great demand for sermons and addresses at CAMP MEETINGS, youth gatherings, and retreats. He died Feb. 29, 1932, at the Methodist Hospital, BROOKLYN, N. Y., and was buried at his own request at Ballinaford, Ontario, Canada, in the little country churchyard adjoining the church where he preached his first sermon sixty years before.

After withdrawal for health reasons in 1940, he served in the BALTIMORE CONFERENCE. For several years he was associate pastor of the Mount Vernon Place Church, WASHINGTON, D.C.

He was born in Hamilton, Va., Oct. 28, 1885, and was educated in RANDOLPH-MACON and ASBURY COLLEGES, graduating from Asbury in 1908. On Aug. 9, 1910, he married Helen Gertrude Leggett of Mississippi, also a graduate of Asbury, and they departed for India a few weeks later. Their first appointment was to Basim, Berar, where their work was of a quality that attracted attention and evoked strong expectations. A year later he was appointed to the pastorate of Bowen Church, Bombay.

Later appointments included the superintendency of Nagpur and Bombay Districts. He and Mrs. Warner formed a hard-working and effective partnership in service. Their influence was felt in a wide circle and at all levels of society. They corresponded with many congregations, church organizations, and individuals in America and stimulated their participation in missionary work.

Warner was awarded the honorary D.D. degree by his Alma Mater. His Annual Conference elected him to GENERAL CONFERENCE, and he was a familiar and influential member of several sessions of the CENTRAL CONFERENCE and executive board of the Methodist Church in Southern Asia.

Mrs. Warner was responsible for compiling and editing the book, Moving Millions, published by the Central Committee on the United Study of Foreign Missions. She wrote the first chapter, entitled "The Miracle of Modern India."

ELMER T. CLARK

WARREN, JOHN (1814-1883), NEW ZEALAND Methodist minister, was born in Norfolk, England. In 1836 he became a probationer and served in the Ipswich Circuit. Designated for missionary work in New Zealand, he served temporarily in TASMANIA, and arrived in New Zealand in 1840. One of his first tasks was to accompany SAMUEL IRONSIDE and some of the Hokianga chiefs to the Bay of Islands for the signing of the Treaty of Waitangi. Some time was spent at Mangungu, learning to speak Maori, and then Warren was appointed to open a new station at Waima, where he served for sixteen years. While there, his wife planted a young oak tree grown from an acorn which she had brought from England. This resulted in the growth of the largest oak tree in New Zealand, with a spread of branches reaching 130 feet.

Transferring to the European work in 1855, Warren filled appointments in Nelson, Wellington (1860), Auckland (1865), and Onehunga (1866), retiring in 1869. He died in Auckland on Nov. 23, 1883.

He attended the Oneida Conference Seminary for two terms, beginning in 1851, and completed his studies at Oberlin, Ohio. His health gave way and he had to leave college for a time, but later joined the Oneida Conference in 1862, and filled appointments at Waterville, Utica, Cazenovia, Ithaca and Baldwinsville. At the latter place he took a supernumerary relation because of the illness of his wife, and began to engage more definitely in literary work. After a time he became assistant editor of the Northern Christian Advocate and upon the death of its editor, Dr. Lore, in 1875, conducted this paper as acting editor until the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1876, which unanimously elected him editor for the succeeding four years. His writings include a book, The American Episcopal Church. Orris H. Warren died at Syracuse, N. Y., on Nov. 23, 1901.

BRYON S. LAMSON

WARREN, ROBERT HOPKINS (1876-1938), FREE METHODIST bishop, was born in Glenwood, N. Y., March 7, 1876. Largely self-educated, he was a wide reader and became one of the denomination's most gifted preachers. He was called to the ministry at eighteen years of age, and gave forty-four years of service to the Church. He served as pastor in COLORADO, WISCONSIN, KANSAS, NEW YORK, WASHINGTON and CALIFORNIA. In the last three conferences he served also as district elder. He was elected bishop in 1935, but served only three years before he died Sept. 6, 1938. For three years he was Chairman of the Commission on Christian Education.

BYRON S. LAMSON

WARREN, SAMUEL (1781-1862), British preacher, helped to found the WESLEYAN METHODIST ASSOCIATION. He became a Wesleyan itinerant in 1802 but was suspended in 1834 for conducting a public agitation against the decision to establish the theological institution. He then began a lawsuit, contesting the connecational control of the Oldham Street Chapel, MANCHESTER, in the circuit of which he was SUPERINTENDENT. Judgment was given against him, and thus the legal validity of the DEED OF DECLARATION was confirmed. Expelled by the Conference of 1835, he took with him about eight thousand members to form the Wesleyan Methodist Association, which was joined in 1836 by the LEEDS PROTESTANT METHODISTS. He soon left the association, received Anglican orders in 1838, and became rector of All Souls, Manchester, where he died on May 23, 1862.

WARREN, WILLIAM FAIRFIELD (1833-1929), American minister, scholar, educator and university president, was born at Williamsburg, Mass., on March 13, 1833. He graduated with the A.B. degree from WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY in Connecticut, and pursued advanced studies in Halle and Berlin Universities in GERMANY. He served as pastor of Methodist churches in Andover, WILBRAHAM and BOSTON, Mass. He taught in the Methodist Mission Institute at BREMEN, Germany. This Institute was later moved to Frankfurt-on-Main, and still exists.

In 1867, when what is now BOSTON UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY was moved from CONCORD, N. H., to Boston, Warren was appointed president. He assisted Methodist laymen in securing from the Great and General Court of Massachusetts a Charter for Boston University with which was to be merged the School of Theology. Warren was formally elected president of Boston University in 1873, and served thirty years until 1903.

Warren was a truly great educational statesman. He was always progressive, never radical. He gave Boston University its character, and made it intellectually respectable anywhere. Even before the University had achieved fame, he assembled a faculty which included such notables as Alexander Graham Bell, who invented the telephone while at Boston University; BORDEN PARKER BOWNE, who was regarded as one of America's greatest philosophers; Dallas Lore Sharpe, one of the greatest nature writers of his generation; and HENRY CLAY SHELDON, a universal scholar. Warren was the author of numerous books, which showed thorough scholarship within his chosen field—the history and philosophy of religions. His hymn “I Worship Thee O Holy Ghost” was one of the most beloved hymns in the 1932-1964 Methodist Hymnal. He died on Dec. 6, 1924.

WARREN, OHIO, U.S.A. First Church is the largest Protestant church in the city, and the largest Methodist church in the Youngstown District. It is located downtown in the heart of the city, and architecturally is an excellent example of classic Greek design.

The church was organized in 1819, just twenty-one years after the city had been settled. The first church structure was located on the banks of the Mahoning River. In 1837 a downtown location was purchased for the building of a new church. In 1917 the present edifice was constructed on North Park Avenue, under the leadership of J. C. Smith. From this time membership grew considerably, and during the past fifteen years has averaged around 2,700.

Former pastors have included CHARLES BURGESS KETCHAM (later president of MT. UNION COLLEGE) and Harold Mohn (later General Secretary of the Advance Program of the Methodist Church). In 1969 the church observed its sesquicentennial.

The church recently sponsored the establishment of a new church in the suburb of Howland, Ohio.

In 1970 First Church reported 2,340 members and property valued at over $1,250,000.

WARRENER, WILLIAM (1750-1825), British Methodist, was the first missionary appointed by the Wesleyan Conference. Born in 1750, he became a preacher in 1779 and volunteered for America in 1786. With WILLIAM HAMMETT, ADAM CLARKE, and THOMAS COKE, he landed after being driven off course at St. John's, ANTIGUA, on Christmas morning 1786, where the preachers found JOHN BAXTER's slave congregation. Coke left Warrener in charge of the work in Antigua, and the appointment was confirmed by the 1787 Conference. In 1790 he was transferred to St. Christopher and remained in the WEST INDIES until 1797. He remained active in Britain until 1818, and was a speaker at JABEZ BUNTING's inaugural meeting of the WESLEYAN METHODIST MISSIONARY SOCIETY at LEEDS, at the Old Boggard House, on Oct. 6, 1813. Warrener died at Leeds, Nov. 27, 1825.

WARRENITE CONTROVERSY. An agitation led by SAMUEL WARREN against a proposal of the WESLEYAN METHODIST CHURCH to found a theological institution for the training of its ministers (see Theological Colleges). For this he was expelled by the Conference of 1835, founding the WESLEYAN METHODIST ASSOCIATION. The controversy resulted in a huge mass of pamphlet literature and newspaper publicity.

REUBEN P. JOB

WASHINGER, WILLIAM H. (1862-1928), American United Brethren minister and bishop, was born at Jacksonville, Pa., on Sept. 9, 1862. He was converted Jan. 3, 1881, and joined the Church of the UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST. He prepared himself for teaching in the public schools, and devoted five years to this service. In 1885 he married Miss Romaine E. Funkhouser.

In 1889 Washinger was granted an annual conference license and became a member of the PENNSYLVANIA CONFERENCE. He received his ordination in 1894. He graduated from LEBANON VALLEY COLLEGE in 1891.

He served pastorates at the Otterbein Church, HARRISBURG, Pa., and Chambersburg, Pa., and also organized the Derry Street mission in Harrisburg. He served fifteen years as superintendent of the Pennsylvania Conference.

He was elected bishop in 1917 and became supervisor of the Pacific Area, which included CALIFORNIA, OREGON, COLUMBIA RIVER, and MONTANA CONFERENCES. After making a thorough survey of this field he adopted a program of evangelism and one of finance. Bishop Castle, who once served this field, wrote of him, "No such report ever has been made of work on the Pacific District."

He served a period of time as a member of the board of trustees of Lebanon Valley College and also of Baker Home. In the midst of public duty, after a brief illness, Bishop Washinger died at Dayton, Ohio, May 18, 1928.

WASHINGTON, U.S.A. population 3,352,892 in 1970, is in the Pacific northwest. It is bounded by CANADA on the north, IDAHO on the east, OREGON on the south, and the Pacific Ocean on the west. The Cascade Mountains divide the state into east and west Washington. With one-half of its 68,192 square mile area in forests, the state has one-sixth of the standing saw timber in the land. The Grand Coulee and other dams on the Columbia River furnish low-cost electric power. Manufacturing includes aircraft and other products. With heavy crops of fruits and berries, the state leads the nation in the production of apples. Washington was organized as a territory in 1853, and it was admitted to the Union in 1889.

Following the Snake and Columbia Rivers, the Lewis and Clark Expedition in 1805 touched what is now Washington. The first white settlement in the region was made in 1810 by David Thompson of the British Northwest Company. In 1811 Americans under John Jacob Astor erected a fort in north central Washington. In 1846 Britain ceded all territory below the forty-ninth parallel to the United States. In 1863 Idaho Territory was carved from Washington Territory.

Methodism first touched Washington on Sept. 2, 1834 when JASON LEE and his party arrived at Fort Walla Walla. The earliest Methodist work in the area was the Indian Mission which Lee established July 10, 1834 at Nisqually near Olympia. In 1836 Marcus Whitman and his wife started a mission at Wailatpu near present Walla Walla. On Aug. 23, 1853 JOHN F. DEVORE organized a Methodist society at Steilacoom and built there that year the first Methodist church in the territory. In December 1853, First Methodist Church, SEATTLE was organized. Within two more years there were Methodist societies at Vancouver, Olympia, and several other places.

All Methodist work in Washington was a part of the OREGON CONFERENCE until 1873 when the East Oregon and Washington Conference (called COLUMBIA RIVER CONFERENCE after 1876) was formed; it included the churches in east Washington. The work in west Washington continued with the Oregon Conference until 1884 when the Puget Sound Conference was organized. The division of the Washington work between two conferences continued until 1929 when the Puget Sound Conference merged with the Columbia River Conference to form the PACIFIC NORTHWEST CONFERENCE. The Oregon part of the Columbia River Conference was placed in the Oregon Conference in 1922. Since 1929 all of Washington Methodism has been in the Pacific Northwest Conference.

The M.E. Church had foreign language work in the northwest. The North Pacific German and Northwest Norwegian-Danish Missions were organized in 1888 and the Pacific Swedish Mission Conference was started in 1908. The German mission became a mission conference in 1892 and was designated as the Pacific German Conference in 1905. The Norwegian-Danish work became the Western Norwegian-Danish Mission in 1892 and was made the Western Norwegian-Danish Conference in 1896. All of these foreign language bodies covered Washington, Oregon, Idaho, and Montana, and in the case of the Swedish conference, all states west of the Rocky Mountains. Since each body had more churches in Washington than in any other one Northwestern state they are mentioned in this article. The German and Swedish work was merged with the English-speaking conferences in 1928, but the Norwegian-Danish body continued and was absorbed in 1939.

A METHODIST PROTESTANT church was founded in Seattle in 1864. Some work of the denomination continued in the state until unification in 1939 when three Methodist Protestant churches with a total of about 800 members entered the Pacific Northwest Conference of The Methodist Church.

The M.E. Church, South, through its Columbia, East Columbia, and Northwest Conferences (see OREGON), maintained a few churches in the state of Washington from about 1866 to 1939. At the time of unification it had only two churches in the state with a total of 394 members.

In 1970 the Pacific Northwest Conference had in the state of Washington 236 pastoral charges, 101,718 members, and property valued at $52,416,524.

WASHINGTON, ARKANSAS, U.S.A., is historically significant because ARKANSAS Methodism began three miles from the town, and because it was the gateway through which Methodism entered northeastern Texas, southeastern Oklahoma, and portions of northern Louisiana; and also because the present church building, a well preserved colonial style edifice, dates from 1860.

In 1814 WILLIAM STEVENSON, a Methodist preacher from MISSOURI, visited and preached in the vicinity of what is now Washington. In 1816 the newly organized MISSOURI CONFERENCE appointed Stevenson to the Hot Springs Circuit in Arkansas. Stevenson preached at Pecan Point on the Red River in Texas, and as presiding elder in Arkansas, 1819-21, the Pecan Point Circuit was in his district.

Stevenson's family and other Methodist families from Bellevue Valley, Mo., moved to Mound Prairie, Hempstead County, Ark., in 1816. In 1817 they built Mount Moriah Church at Mound Prairie, the first Methodist church to be erected in Arkansas. The next year the congregation rebuilt a mile away and called it Henry's Chapel, the name it bore for half a century. The LITTLE ROCK CONFERENCE has now placed a marker on the chapel site which is some three miles from Washington.

Hempstead County was organized in 1818, and Washington was laid out as the county seat in 1820. The Methodist Church at Washington was organized in 1822. The Washington District of the Arkansas Conference was formed in 1842 and it continued until 1896. The Arkansas Conference met in Washington in 1838 and 1847. The Ouachita Conference was there for its first session in 1854, and the Little Rock Conference convened there in 1870. Washington was the capital of Arkansas, 1863-65 (during the Civil War), and it claimed a population of about 40,000 at that time. A school called the Washington Male and Female Academy was operated in Washington for about fifteen years prior to the Civil War.

Washington began to decline after the railroad from Little Rock to Texarkana passed it by in favor of Hope ten miles to the southeast. In time Hope became the county seat as well as the head of the Methodist district. In 1970 the Washington church had eleven members, and it was one of five churches on the Washington Circuit.

WASHINGTON, D. C. (population 746,169), is the capital of the United States, situated on the Potomac River, and was named after George Washington. It has been the seat of government since 1800, and has grown rapidly until today it is one of the great cities and the prime showplace of the nation. GEORGETOWN was situated on the bluffs of the Potomac above the site selected for the Capitol, and while now considered the northwest section of Washington, D. C., Georgetown was a sedate and conservative old MARYLAND town before Washington City ever began to grow up around it.

This section of the country was within the bounds of the old Frederick Circuit and was visited by ASBURY as early as 1772. In 1797 he speaks of visiting a famous bridge above Georgetown—no doubt the well-known "chain bridge" as it has been known since that time—and of finding WILLIAM WATERS in charge of Georgetown circuit. In 1802 Washington is mentioned in connection with Georgetown, William Waters being pastor. In 1805 Washington appears as a separate appointment and reported in the following year sixty-one white and twenty-five colored members. The church grew rather slowly in Washington, having in 1812 only ninety-one white and fifty-one colored members. This was about the time of the commencement of the second war with England. During that war, Washington itself was burned, including the Capitol and official buildings.

After the war HENRY FOXALL—some say in gratitude for his foundry being spared by the British—gave a gift of ground and building, and a second appointment in Washington was added, called thenceforth, Foundry Church—now on Sixteenth Street. To this Thomas Burch was appointed pastor, and from that time the church grew rapidly. With the increase of the population other charges were added and in due time a separate Negro church was formed.

The A.M.E. and the A.M.E. ZION CHURCHES also established congregations in Washington, where at present there is an enormous Negro population, making up at present almost half the population of the District.

In 1853 a lot was secured and steps were taken toward the building of a Metropolitan Church, but the agitations that shortly followed concerning slavery, and the excitement in the public mind, and then the Civil War, held up the building of this church. At the close of the war, however, another effort was made to erect a church, and under the labors of F. S. DeHass a large and impressive building was erected (see Metropolitan Church). Metropolitan was sometimes called the "Church of the Presidents" because of the attendance there of Presidents Grant and McKinley and its nearness to the Capitol.

The BALTIMORE CONFERENCE, within whose territory Washington has always been situated, divided in its allegiance between the South and the North at the time of the Civil War. Following the war, there were two Baltimore Conferences each having churches in Washington. Also, the MARYLAND CONFERENCE of the M.P. CHURCH had certain strong churches there. Washington being a border city, rivalry between the three Methodisms was somewhat more intense there than in other cities of the border. The M.E. Church, South in 1850 began a congregation which in 1917 built Mount Vernon Place Church to be the "representative church of Southern Methodism" in the capital.

Memberships in the various Methodisms grew as the city itself grew, and this growth has been enormous within the years since the first World War, and even more since the second. Southern Methodism was never quite as strong within Washington City as was the M.E. Church, and the drawing of the Jurisdictional line by the PLAN OF UNION—the Potomac River—put all Methodists on the southern side of the Potomac within the VIRGINIA CONFERENCE, and all those north of the Potomac within the Baltimore. Union was in due time agreed to by all, and the Methodist Church and churches have grown greatly in the metropolitan area of Washington since that time.

The establishment of AMERICAN UNIVERSITY and the bringing in upon its grounds the WESLEY THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY from Westminster, Md., and the support of the entire church for American University as promoted and in a large measure obtained by Bishop G. BROMLEY OXNAM, has greatly helped Methodist influence in the capital city in the educational aspects of its work.

As is well known, Washington has come to be more and more dominant not only as the capital of the nation, but as a major influence of all world affairs. The residence of the M.E. bishop of the area was moved from Baltimore to Washington following the death of Bishop AMES in 1879 and has since been located there.

Administratively, Washington is presently divided into three districts: Washington Central; Washington East; and Washington West, with each of these districts reaching out into contiguous Maryland territory in their respective directions. Latest statistics indicate that something like 90,000 Methodists are in the metropolitan Washington area north of the Potomac. The Alexandria and Washington Districts of the Virginia Conference across the River have also grown enormously of late years, and many Methodists, of course, live in those districts and work in Washington. Since 1940 Bishops ADNA LEONARD, EDWIN H. HUGHES, CHARLES W. FLINT, G. Bromley Oxnam, and JOHN WESLEY LORD have administered the Washington area with the Baltimore Conference, the overarching conference containing the District of Columbia.

Asbury Church for 132 years has stood at the corner of Eleventh and K Streets, Northwest, in Washington city. Asbury has sometimes been referred to as the "daughter" of Foundry Church, since in the years between 1814 when Foundry was organized and 1836 when Asbury Church began, there was a felt need for a separate church for the Negro membership in the city. Eli Neugent, Benjamin McCoy, and others sensed this need and had much to do with the selection of the site at the K Street corner. This came about in 1836, and Asbury began its development there in a frame building. An increasing membership came because the location was accessible to the many Negro people to whom it was expected to minister. In the same year the QUARTERLY CONFERENCE met and gave to the church its official name—Asbury Methodist Church—in honor of Francis Asbury. In 1845 membership had increased so greatly that a brick church was erected on the original site, and then in 1916 the present church was erected there.

From 1836 to 1863 the Board of Trustees was composed of both whites and Negroes. Only white pastors were at that time appointed to the church, and local Negro preachers were called on to assist them. In 1864, however, Negro trustees were elected to succeed the white trustees.

The Washington Annual Conference, which was a Conference of Negro churches and members, was organized on Oct. 27, 1864, in the Sharp Street Methodist Church in Baltimore, Md., and Asbury Church took its place in that. At that time Elisha P. Phelps was serving as pastor of both Foundry and Asbury. After the Washington Annual Conference organized, Asbury was continuously served by ministers of its own group. Among those were: J. M. Peck; JAMES THOMAS; E. W. S. Peck; N. M. CARROLL; J. H. Dailey; J. W. E. BOWEN—later a bishop; D. W. Hayes; I. L. Thomas; MATTHEW W. CLAIR, Sr.—later a bishop; Julius S. Carroll; James U. King; J. H. Jenkins; Robert Moten Williams, and James D. Foy.

With the absorption of the Washington Conference in the surrounding Baltimore Conference, Asbury with other churches of that Conference in Maryland and the District of Columbia went into the Baltimore Conference—now of The United Methodist Church. The present membership of Asbury is 2,130.

Capitol Hill Church, completed and consecrated in June 1967, now stands five blocks from the United States Capitol, Washington, D. C., an imposing new church building. Its history is as follows:

After some groundwork by two district superintendents, four Quarterly Conferences of Methodist churches within eleven blocks of the United States Capitol voted to combine in a city parish with one pastor and assistant. The plan was for the parish to give a united ministry to the area which was then starting a renaissance in remodeled homes, as it was then becoming fashionable to buy and remodel a house on Capitol Hill. Edward B. Lewis, then pastor of a large suburban church of Washington, was asked to come to Capitol Hill and help start the project. Thomas C. Starnes was the first assistant during the parish days. J. H. Searls followed him as assistant through the uniting and building days.

After three months as minister of the parish, the pastor presented to the four Official Boards a plan to unite the four churches into one within that conference year (1960-61). He challenged them to make a great Christian witness by uniting as one effective congregation on Capitol Hill. The vote was almost unanimous—only seven against out of more than 100 officials who were thus challenged.

The congregations continued to meet in their respective churches during that conference year until May 1961. The fifth Sunday of each month was a united morning worship. Advent and Lenten services were held together. Following disciplinary requirements, the congregations were united as one on April 30, 1961, using one building, Old Trinity, selected by a conference committee, for the site of the new building. Bishop John Wesley Lord presided in the uniting service with the District Superintendent Orris G. Robinson. The name selected was The Capitol Hill Methodist Church.

Plans then began for the new church. The three abandoned churches and parsonages were sold over a period of time to obtain money. The united congregation began growing with new spirit, and pledged enough over the following three years to make it possible to borrow the further needed funds. Fifth and Pennsylvania Avenue, S.E., at 421 Seward Square proved a good location. During the construction of the church building, the united congregation worshipped in the Methodist Building across the street from the Capitol, and beside The Supreme Court building. Three and four services were held in the little Methodist Building chapel with the large lobby also holding people listening through the public address system broadcast in each area. The congregation grew in numbers and popularity during these years. The Capitol Hill Community continued to attract new families and career people from the government, as well as students and professional people.

The new Capitol Hill Church enjoys large congregations with leading members of government attending the services. Its membership includes different races and national backgrounds. It serves all economic classes through education, community programs and Christian opportunities. Its program is attracting youth and young couples. Waugh, Trinity, North Carolina Avenue (M.P.), and Wilson Memorial were the four churches which united in this effective and promising way.

Dumbarton Avenue Church. In October 1772, the first Methodist sermon preached in Georgetown was delivered by ROBERT WILLIAMS, an Englishman who was an itinerant preacher, according to an account published in 1806 by William Watters, the first native American itinerant. Watters accompanied Williams on the occasion of his preaching in Georgetown, and the first meetings were held in a cooper's shop near N and 31st Streets.

Bishop Asbury's first visit appears to have been in the late fall of 1772 when he preached to a large number of slaves who were collected to hear him. From Asbury's Journal there is this notation about Georgetown, dated March 8, 1773: "I was also much comforted by a letter, which I lately received from RICHARD OWINGS part of which was as follows, 'I know not what it will come to. Almost every person seems to be under a religious concern. There are about twenty-two persons already joined in society at Seneca. At George-town, four have been lately enabled to rejoice in God; and one at Rock-creek. Blessed be GOD, who hath not forgotten to be gracious.'"

On Dec. 24, 1772, ROBERT STRAWBRIDGE and Richard Owings were sent by Francis Asbury to build up the cause of Christ in Frederick County.

On Nov. 2, 1795, Bishop Asbury recorded in his Journal that he had come to Georgetown and "found a congregation waiting at the new chapel." This building was located on Montgomery (28th) Street near Bridge (M) Street. The "new chapel" was a simple brick building, thirty by forty feet, on a lot fifty-six by 120 feet. In 1806 this meeting house was enlarged to forty by sixty feet, and two stories high.

In subsequent years, Bishop Asbury made frequent journeys to Georgetown to visit the congregation and Henry Foxall. Foxall and Asbury were boyhood friends in Birmingham, England. Before becoming a Methodist minister, Asbury worked in Foxall's father's foundry in England.

In 1801 Thomas Lyle was appointed to Georgetown, which appears for the first time in the minutes, and which includes, also, the city of Washington. The Georgetown Church became a separate station in 1805 and reported the following year 202 members.

The church school has had a most interesting history.

In 1819 Samuel McKenny and John Dickinson, with other zealous Methodists, started a small school for the religious instruction of the young. Records of the church school from 1819, as well as records of the church from 1800, are in the archives of the Dumbarton Avenue Church.

In 1849 the building was sold to the municipal corporation of the town for $1,200 for use as a public school and a new church was built at 3133 Dumbarton Avenue. HENRY SLICER, then the pastor, visited many of the larger cities in the East, at the request of the official board, to solicit subscriptions, and he received many liberal contributions. The new church was dedicated July 3, 1850, when the pastor was JOHN LANAHAN.

During the years 1862-63 the church was used by the federal government as a hospital, and the congregation met in rooms of the old customs house over the post office on 31st Street. Soon after the building was reopened for worship the Baltimore Conference was in session there. The Washington Star of March 10, 1863, reports that President Lincoln was a visitor at the service on Sunday, March 8, 1863, (during this Conference) and that Bishop MATTHEW SIMPSON preached the sermon on that occasion.

In 1897-98 the building was completely remodeled, enlarged, and redecorated. A modern facade was built, new stained glass windows were installed in memory of honored and deceased members, and the organ was rebuilt and improved. The first level was restored in 1961.

The Dumbarton Avenue Church has become known as the Mother Church of Washington Methodism. Other churches of Washington which have their heritage in Dumbarton are Foundry, St. Luke's, Eldbrooke, Mt. Zion and Capitol Hill.

Foundry Church was the first Methodist church to be started in the central section of the city. The land and the first building were the gift of Henry Foxall, iron founder, Methodist lay preacher, frequent contributor to Methodist activities, and friend of Francis Asbury, Thomas Jefferson and many other religious and political leaders. Traditionally, he provided the new church, a few blocks from the White House, in gratitude and thanksgiving when his foundry was spared during the British attack on Washington in August 1814. The first church building was dedicated Sept. 10, 1815, by NICHOLAS SNETHEN. Foundry's name is derived from two sources, JOHN WESLEY's "Old Foundry" in London and Foxall's foundry in the Georgetown section of the District of Columbia.

After nearly ninety years Foundry's first location became principally a business district, and the church moved in 1904 to a more residential area, its present site at 16th and P Streets, Northwest, approximately one-half mile north of the White House. The present church is Gothic in style. A modern educational building of matching stone and architecture was added in 1961. The McDowell Pulpit, whose design and beauty is much commented on, was the gift of Methodists throughout the United States in memory of Bishop WILLIAM F. MCDOWELL. The lectern, symbolic of unification of the three branches of Methodism in 1939, is in memory of Bishop EDWIN HOLT HUGHES.

From the first, Foundry's congregation has included among its worshippers many who have worked for the Federal Government—from lowly clerks to cabinet officers—as well as many senators, congressmen and presidents. Most of the presidents since John Quincy Adams have attended Foundry one or more times. Abraham Lincoln became a life director of the Methodist Missionary

FOUNDRY CHURCH PULPIT, WASHINGTON, D.C.

Society on Jan. 18, 1863, after hearing a missionary sermon by Bishop Matthew Simpson. Lincoln's certificate of membership is on display in the church. Rutherford B. Hayes attended Foundry nearly every Sunday during his administration. Franklin D. Roosevelt and Winston Churchill attended a special Christmas day service in 1941. In addition many ambassadors, students and visitors from around the world have participated in the church's activities.

Among the ministers at Foundry, FREDERICK BROWN HARRIS served the longest, thirty-one years (1924-55). In addition he was Chaplain of the U.S. Senate for many years. Three other Foundry pastors have served as chaplains of the Senate and the House of Representatives for shorter periods of time. Theodore Henry Palmquist's ministry from 1955 to 1964 was the second longest. Three Foundry pastors have been elected bishops. These were JOHN EMORY, JESSE T. PECK and LUTHER B. WILSON, who were at Foundry in 1818-20, 1852-54 and 1900-03, respectively.

Pastors and members have had important roles in social problems at times. For instance, Henry Slicer's sermon on duelling in 1839 has been credited with passage of legislation which outlawed duels in the District of Columbia. After many decades of participation in various temperance movements, members of Foundry helped to establish the American Anti-Saloon League in 1896.

Foundry's varied programs have included a Sabbath school started in 1819, a missionary society in 1828, a drama group in 1934, an opportunity class for handicapped children in 1962, and a pastoral counseling service, since expanded into an area wide service, in 1961. Members of Foundry started or helped to form at least six new congregations in Washington—one M.P. and five M.E. churches—during the nineteenth century.

The neighborhood has changed where Foundry is located. Upper middle class, one-family residences have given way to rooming houses for government employees. Later they became homes for some of Washington's more impoverished citizens. Multiple story apartment buildings and headquarters for trade and professional organizations are following these. The Foundry membership of 1,723 (1970) is drawn not only from the immediate neighborhood but the more remote sections of the District of Columbia and suburban communities in Virginia and Maryland. The church has continued to be influential through its mission, concern and outreach.

Georgetown is a restored pre-Revolutionary town which has been engulfed but not lost in the nation's capital. The historic town lies approximately one mile and a quarter west-northwest of the White House. The old part of the town is nearly a mile square. On the west lies Georgetown University; to the north is famous Dumbarton Oaks; on the east are Rock Creek and The Potomac Parkway; and to the south are The National Monument Canal and The Potomac River.

Georgetown was settled late in the seventeenth century. It was laid out as a town in 1751, chartered as a city by the Maryland Assembly in 1789, merged into the District of Columbia in 1871, and annexed to the city of Washington in 1878.

To perpetuate the historic town, the eighty-first congress passed legislation in 1950 to preserve the character of this section of Washington, D. C. Hence it was to be known as "Old Georgetown." Furthermore, legislation was passed regulating the height, exterior design and construction of all private and semi-public buildings in the area to conform with the colonial and federal homes which are there.

Methodism as has been indicated grew very slowly in Georgetown until the 1790's when the construction began on the site for the national government, Washington, D. C. Georgetown became the residence for the planners and many of the workers who were building the new city. During Asbury's visits to Georgetown he was usually entertained by Lloyd Beall and Henry Foxall, two very prominent members of the church. Foxall was mayor of Georgetown from 1821-23. A close friend and neighbor of Foxall was Francis Scott Key, who wrote the National Anthem in 1814.

Methodism continued to grow in Georgetown with the establishment of Mt. Zion in 1816, a Negro congregation; Congress Street M.P. Church, 1829; Mt. Tabor M.P., 1874; and Aldersgate M.E. South, 1914. Subsequently the Congress Street, Mt. Tabor and Aldersgate Churches merged to become in 1946 St. Luke's Church, which is located a few blocks northwest of "Old Georgetown." The mother church, Dumbarton Avenue, and Mt. Zion are the two remaining churches in the old Georgetown section.

Although Methodism continued to be strong in Georgetown until 1945, the town became less significant from 1860 until the renovation of the old federal and colonial homes began in the 1930's. This restoration of the town continued until most of the city had been completely restored by 1960.

In addition to attracting some of the major leaders of our nation to reside in Georgetown during the 1960's, many young people began frequenting the town by 1964. The major ministry of Dumbarton Avenue Church in Georgetown in the latter part of the 1960's was to the youth and young adults.

Methodism has had a significant role in one of America's oldest existing towns. "Old Georgetown."

Metropolitan Memorial has long been considered a church of connection-wide import. Old Washingtonians used to call it "the church of the Presidents" because Presidents U. S. Grant and William McKinley were wont to attend services there.

A movement to erect this church began in 1852 at the session of the GENERAL CONFERENCE of the M.E. Church with a memorial "touching the erection of a house of worship in Washington city." This memorial was approved and the members present voiced their intention to aid in its promotion. The Baltimore Conference meeting the next year, appointed one of their leaders, Henry Slicer, to solicit funds. On Oct. 23, 1854, the cornerstone was laid at the corner of John Marshall Place and C Street, Northwest. Bishop Matthew Simpson delivered the address. Due to the Civil War the building was not completed until 1869. The building then erected was a churchly one in every respect, large and imposing with a tall steeple. It was one of the landmarks of Washington during the last half of the nineteenth century. Not too far from the capitol, the building dominated the region at and around the lower end of Pennsylvania Avenue, and was frequently used for meetings of church-wide import.

On Feb. 28, 1869 Bishop Simpson dedicated the church in the presence of a large congregation from all parts of the country. On Easter Sunday, March 28, 1869, the church was formally declared organized with JOHN P. NEWMAN as minister. Ninety-four persons were received by letter and three on probation. In the congregation at this service were the President of the United States Ulysses S. Grant; the Vice-President Schuyler Colfax; the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, Salmon P. Chase, and many members of Congress. President Grant was the first chairman of the Board of Trustees, and occupied the Presidential Pew for eight years.

Newman was three times appointed pastor of Metropolitan, and was elected bishop in 1888 while still its minister. Another minister of Metropolitan was later elected bishop, FRANK M. BRISTOL, who served the church ten years before being elevated to the episcopacy in 1908.

In "Old Metropolitan" Bishop JOHN F. HURST publicly presented the plan for American University on March 25, 1890. In October of 1891 the Second ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCE was held in the church with delegates from every quarter of the world in attendance. President Benjamin Harrison addressed the Conference. From 1897-1901 President William McKinley regularly attended the services of the church. He always stayed for communion and insisted on kneeling at the altar rail with others just as they happened to come from nearby pews.

In 1930 a shifting population made it desirable to relocate. The present site was selected in northwest Washington opposite American University, and on June 22 ground was broken for a new sanctuary. Bishop William Fraser McDowell presided over this building's dedication on Feb. 7, 1932. The then Vice-President of the United States, Charles Curtis, was the speaker. In 1951 the Parish Hall was constructed and dedicated by Bishop CHARLES WESLEY FLINT and Dr. EDWARD C. LATCH.

Increased membership and attendance at Sunday morning worship services soon made it imperative that the sanctuary be enlarged, and the church was extended forward four bays, making it possible to seat 900 to 1,000 persons at each service. The present sanctuary was dedicated Feb. 22, 1959, by Bishop G. Bromley Oxnam.

Wall tablets memorialize Presidents Grant and McKinley as well as many other prominent national figures. Worked into the chancel floor is a marble tile brought from the ruins of Solomon's Temple by Bishop Newman. A Keystone originally over the pulpit in Old Metropolitan was cut from a stone also brought from the ruins of Solomon's Temple. This Keystone is now on the east wall of the Baptistry. The present pulpit and altar rail were made in part from olive wood from the Garden of Gethsemane and Mount of Olives and cedar wood from Mt. Lebanon. This wood was brought from the Holy Land in rough logs.

In recent years Metropolitan, along with American University and Wesley Seminary, entertained the North-eastern JURISDICTIONAL CONFERENCE in 1960; and the Baltimore Conference held its annual sessions here in 1948, 1964, 1965, 1966 and 1969. In 1970 the membership was 2,648. There are four full-time ministers on the staff plus a part-time Seminary student. The annual budget is in excess of $280,000.

MOUNT VERNON PLACE CHURCH, WASHINGTON, D.C.

Mount Vernon Place Church was founded in 1850 as the "Representative Church" of the M.E. Church, South, in the Nation's Capital. William W. Bennett served a year as the pastor, later distinguishing himself in Southern Methodism as a minister and as a historian. During 1851 the forty-five member congregation organized a Sunday school, and purchased a building from another Protestant church, which bequeathed its communion service. Six years later the church sold the building and moved into temporary quarters until 1863, when it constructed its own edifice.

This Southern congregation worshipped as well as it could during the Civil War. In 1865 William V. Tudor, an urbane young bachelor, became the minister and revitalized the church. A new building was erected in 1869. The church named itself Mount Vernon Place in 1872.

Outstanding preachers filled the pulpit during the next several decades, among them ALPHEUS W. WILSON, later a bishop, and FORREST J. PRETTYMAN. Samuel W. Hadaway organized the first mission church.

The years 1858 and 1918 had a mutual significance. At its General Conference of 1858, the M.E. Church, South, passed a "memorial" that a Representative Church should be erected in Washington, D. C. This new edifice was occupied during 1918, and came to full power under the pastorate of CLOVIS G. CHAPPELL.

Six pastors served within the next two decades, including W. ANGIE SMITH (1934-36), one of four Mount Vernon ministers who later became bishops. During the Depression of the 1930's a Relief Committee was organized to help the homeless and the hungry.

Two pastors served between 1936 and 1966. Both advocated a full continuous program, and each added a new educational building. JOHN W. RUSTIN (1936-50) inspired government and military personnel to make Mount Vernon their church home while in Washington during World War II, and encouraged the creative use of drama in the Church through a group known as the Mount Vernon Players. Later ALBERT P. SHIRKEY (1950-69), led Mount Vernon Place Church in its ministry as a downtown church to meet the problems of the changing urban community, regardless of race. Mount Vernon is one of the outstanding churches of the National Capital Area and of Methodism.

WASHINGTON, MISSISSIPPI, U.S.A., in the southern part of the state six miles from the Mississippi River, was laid off by Andrew Ellicott near a spring known since that time as Ellicott Spring. Here in 1799 the first Methodist congregation was formed by TOBIAS GIBSON, missionary from SOUTH CAROLINA. This consisted of Randal Gibson and his wife, William Foster and his wife, Caleb Worley, and Sarah Bullen, with some others who joined before the organization was fully perfected in the spring of 1800. The Washington church organization, which is the oldest in Mississippi, has worshipped in three buildings, the first a union structure, built in 1805 and burned in 1810; the second inside the campus of Jefferson College, in which the Mississippi constitutional convention of 1817 was held; and the present building, which was constructed in 1827-28. This last is now the second oldest Methodist building in Mississippi.

Jefferson College, later known as Jefferson Military Academy, was chartered in 1802 and opened for students in 1811. This school continued until 1962. Elizabeth Academy was opened for students in 1818, and was one of the first schools for the higher education of young women in the United States. It continued its useful career until around 1845.

Washington was the territorial capital at the time of the formation of the state government and was the capital of Mississippi for a number of years. The first station on the Natchez Trace out of Natchez was at Washington, and the building still stands just back of the Methodist church. The oldest Presbyterian church in Mississippi, now at Pine Ridge, was organized at Washington in 1807.

WASSON, ALFRED WASHINGTON (1880-1964), American missionary to Korea and Mission Board Secretary, was born near Fayetteville, Ark., May 7, 1880. He graduated from the University of Arkansas in 1902, and received his B.D. from VANDERBILT University in 1905, going to KOREA the same year.

He was admitted on trial in the China Annual Conference under the missionary rule—which waives certain normal training requirements. From 1905 to 1922 he served as head of the Sogdo High School (originally Anglo-Korean School) and did evangelistic work in the Sogdo area. From 1922 to 1926 he was president of the Union Methodist Theological Seminary in Seoul.

In 1926 he became Professor of Missions and comparative religion in the PERKINS SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY at Southern Methodist University. From 1934 to 1940 he was foreign secretary of the Board of MISSIONS of the M.E. Church, South, at Nashville. With the union of Methodism in 1939, he became Associate Secretary for missions in Latin America for the Board of Missions of The Methodist Church with headquarters in New York City.

Wasson was a delegate to the Madras Conference of the INTERNATIONAL MISSIONARY COUNCIL in 1938, and to the Foreign Missions Conference of North America, 1934-50; he was chairman of the Committee on Cooperation in Latin America, 1940-50; a member of the FEDERAL COUNCIL Committee on Religious Work in the Canal Zone, 1940-50, and was delegate to the General Conference (MES), 1926 and the UNITING CONFERENCE of Methodism in 1939.

Coming to New York as he did in 1940, when the mission work of the Southern Church had to be consolidated into the new world-wide empire of American Methodism, Wasson had considerable pioneering work to do in his new executive position. He was a quiet man of singular sweetness of spirit, consecrated to his work and unflagging in carrying out any task the church gave him.

He served as visiting professor during the summers of 1947-49, at GARRETT BIBLICAL INSTITUTE. Retiring in 1950 he returned to DALLAS, where he was visiting professor at Perkins School of Theology, 1950-52. He filled the same role at SCARRITT COLLEGE in Nashville in the spring quarters of 1951-53.

He was author of Church Growth in Korea, 1934; the Invincible Advance, 1938; and Influence of Missionary Expansion Upon Methodist Organization, 1948.

He held an LL.D. degree from the University of Arkansas, 1926, and a Ph.D. from the University of Chicago, 1931.

He died in Dallas, Texas, on Sept. 6, 1964, and was buried in Hillcrest Memorial Park.

WATCHMAN, THE, the first British Methodist newspaper, begun in 1834 to defend Wesleyan Methodism against the attacks of reformers, and continuing as a conservative weekly until 1885. (See MAGAZINES AND NEWSPAPERS OF BRITISH METHODISM.)

WATCH-NIGHT. The first watch-night service was held at Kingswood, England, sometime prior to April 1742. "The custom was begun at Kingswood by the colliers there, who, before their conversion, used to spend every Saturday night at the ale-house. After they were taught better, they spent that night in prayer. Mr. WESLEY hearing of it, ordered it first to be once a month, at the full of the moon, then once a quarter, and recommended it to all his Societies." (Myles, p. 17.)

John Wesley's account of Watch-night is: "I was informed, that several persons at Kingswood, frequently met together, at the school, and (when they could spare the time) spent the greater part of the night in prayer and praise and thanksgiving. Some advised me to put an end to this; but upon weighing the thing thoroughly, and comparing it with the practice of the ancient Christians, I could see no cause to forbid it. Rather, I believed, it might be made of more general use. So I sent them word, 'I designed to watch with them, on the Friday nearest the full of the moon, that we might have light thither and back again.' I gave public notice of this, the Sunday before, and withal, that I intended to preach, desiring they, and they only, would meet me there, who could do it without prejudice to their business or families. On Friday abundance of people came. I began preaching between eight and nine, and we continued until a little beyond the noon of night, singing, praying and praising God." (Ibid.)

Wesley explained his position more fully in a letter written at Limerick June 8, 1750 to the Rev. John Baily of Killycully, Cork: "You charge me fourthly, with holding 'midnight assemblies.' Sir, did you never see the word Vigil in your Common Prayer Book? Do you know what it means? If not, permit me to tell you that it was customary with the ancient Christians to spend whole nights in prayer, and these nights were termed Vigiliae or Vigils. Therefore, for spending a part of some nights in this manner, in public and solemn prayer, we have not only the authority of our own national Church, but of the universal Church in the earliest ages." (Letters, Vol. III, 287.)

In his Journal Wesley writes under the date of April 9, 1742, "We had the first Watch-night in London." In 1789 it was stated that "every watch-night should be held until midnight."

Watch-Night in America. On Thursday, Nov. 1, 1770

the first watch-night service in America was held at Old St. George's, PHILADELPHIA by JOSEPH PILMORE. Another Watch-night Service was held in New York on November 5, and a third such service was held in Philadelphia on December 31, the first time that a watch-night was held on New Year's Eve in America. According to Asbury's Journal a watch-night service was held also at Old St. George's on Nov. 4, 1771. It was not until sometime later that the service began to be held exclusively on New Year's Eve.

Francis H. Tees records the following story about an historic watch-night service. In the year 1776 George Washington was hard pressed for funds to keep his struggling Revolutionary Army together at Valley Forge. "He wrote to his friend, Robert Morris, banker and merchant, of Philadelphia, beseeching him to send him $50,000 in cash . . . on Wednesday morning, Jan. 1, 1777, long before daylight, Morris set out for the homes of his friends, roused them from their beds and finally got the money which he sent to Washington." (p. 149)

Tees claims there is sufficient circumstantial evidence to prove that Morris "told his friends that he had just come from an all night prayer meeting in St. George's Methodist Church where prayers were offered that God would open up the hearts of the people to furnish the money needed to pay the troops at Valley Forge that the Army might be saved." (p. 149)

Watch-night services have been held continuously at Old St. George's since that first service in 1770.

FREDERICK E. MASER

WATERBURY, CONNECTICUT, U.S.A., is a city of 107,000 and is in the NEW YORK CONFERENCE of The United Methodist Church. It began as a plantation known as Mattatuck, established in the Naugatuck Valley by young men from the Farmington Colony, on land purchased from the Indians. Articles of agreement were signed on June 6, 1674 whereby each man agreed to live four years at Mattatuck, pay his taxes and build a mansion house of sufficient size, in return for eight acres of land on the town spot and a certain amount of meadow land.

In Bishop ASBURY's Journal, dated Sept. 23, 1796, he mentions preaching in the Separatist Meeting House located in that part of ancient Waterbury known as "Columbia." A Methodist class, numbering five persons, was formed in the Pine Hole District of Waterbury, in the summer of 1815, by Samuel Cochrane, preacher in charge of the Litchfield Circuit. This was the beginning of First Methodist Church. Mrs. Mary Peck, a member, invited those living in the center to hold their meetings in her small red house. When attendance increased, meetings were sometimes held in school houses. The first Methodist sermon in the center is said to have been preached in a hotel ballroom.

Following a revival in 1830, membership increased to about 100. School houses were no longer available for religious purposes and it became necessary to erect a house of worship. For a long time it was impossible to get anyone to sell a lot to the Methodists. It was argued that the Methodists wherever they gained a foothold "were like Canada thistles—they were sure to spread and could not be kept down." It was "easier to keep them out than to root them out when once in." Finally a lot was obtained and the first house of worship was built. In the spring of 1833, Davis Stocking was appointed as the first of a long line of stationed preachers.

In 1850 the congregation had grown so large that a lot had to be purchased and the second house of worship erected. In this new home the church enjoyed twenty-four years of marked activity and steady growth. Missions were started by consecrated laymen who went into outlying districts. The Waterville mission was started in 1872 and a chapel built there in 1875. In 1884 this mission was deeded to the trustees of the Grace Methodist Church, without encumbrance.

A Sunday school started in August 1886, in a vacant store, was the beginning of St. Paul's Church. In 1886 Timothy Church, a trustee in First Church, gave a lot on the west side of the Naugatuck River to the people of that section for a church. Services were first held in a vacant store about 1916. Timothy Church's lot was sold and a larger lot purchased. Work was begun in 1931 on the West Side Hill Church. Unavoidable circumstances delayed completion of the building and services could not be held there until 1941.

In 1876 Anson F. Abbott, a member of the First Church, offered a lot on the corner of North Main Street and Abbott Avenue as a free gift, without conditions except to build a church thereon. The offer was accepted and the present First Church edifice was dedicated in May 1878.

In 1970 there were two United Methodist churches with a total membership of 899 in a city which is more than seventy percent Roman Catholic. Representing the Negro Methodists is the Mount Olive A.M.E. Zion Church.

Difficult decisions must be made by the Methodist churches, but the Waterbury people, with the tradition that is behind them, expect to face and overcome contemporary obstacles.

WATERHOUSE, RICHARD GREEN (1855-1922), American bishop of the M.E. Church, South, was born near Spring City, Tenn., on Dec. 4, 1855. He joined the HOLSTON CONFERENCE in 1878 and served the Altamont and Spencer Mission, and Jonesboro. In 1881 he was junior preacher on the Abingdon Circuit and during his tenure there he attended EMORY AND HENRY COLLEGE, from which he graduated in 1885. Then he served Centenary and Church Street Churches in KNOXVILLE and the Radford District.

In 1892 he became a professor in Emory and Henry and the following year he was elected president, occupying this position until 1910. He was a member of all the GENERAL CONFERENCES from 1894 to 1910.

In 1910 he was elected a bishop and assigned to the Pacific Coast with headquarters at Los Angeles. Here he remained four years. Then he returned to the Holston Conference and presided over it in 1915 and 1916. Ill health forced his retirement in 1918.

Waterhouse married Miss Carrie Steele of Crystal Springs, Miss., on Feb. 3, 1887, and on her death he married Mrs. Mary Thomas Carriger of Morristown, Tenn., on Oct. 10, 1894. He was the father of a daughter and two sons. He died as the result of an automobile accident at Knoxville on Dec. 8, 1922, and was buried at Jefferson City, Tenn.

WATERLOO, IOWA, U.S.A. First Church is a mid-city church. Asbury Collins preached the first sermon there the fall of 1846 in a log cabin on the west bank of the Cedar River. Three emigrant wagons had arrived and the people owning them settled there.

The church was known as "Big Woods Mission" in 1853. This was one year before Waterloo was platted. In 1855 the church was moved from the log cabin to the Waterloo Seminary, corner of Eighth and Bluff Streets. In 1856 services were transferred to the newly built Benight's Hall, corner of Fourth and Commercial Streets. In 1861 the First Methodist parsonage was erected, valued at $1,650.

In 1863 the First Church was erected. Only the basement was finished. In 1864 the first Annual Conference was held here in the basement of the church. A new church was built in 1889 at the corner of Fifth and Jefferson Streets. Valuation of this church was $16,500. Crowded conditions made it necessary to build the present building at West Fourth and Randolph in 1911. The church was dedicated on March 5th of that year. On the night before the dedication the building caught fire near the organ, and about $20,000 damage was done. The dedication was thereupon held at the Syndicate Theater. The church was erected at a cost of $75,000, and had a seating capacity of 1,500 in the sanctuary. The present education building was dedicated May 4, 1951.

In 1970 First Church had 2,319 members and property valued at $1,000,000.

WATERS, EDWARD (1780-1847), American bishop of the A.M.E. Church, was born near West River, Md., on March 15, 1780. A former slave, he was converted in 1798 and licensed to preach in 1810 by the M.E. Church. He was ordained a DEACON in 1818 and an ELDER in 1820. He itinerated from 1820 to 1836, when he was elected bishop by the A.M.E. Church. He resigned in 1844 and died June 5, 1847.

Edward Waters was actually an "assistant" bishop. He never held an annual conference or ordained a minister. The first college for Negroes in the State of Florida, Edward Waters College, was named in his honor.

WATERS, FRANCIS B. (1792-1868), American minister and educator, was born on Jan. 16, 1792, in Somerset, now Wicomico, County, Md. He graduated from Pennsylvania College at eighteen years of age. He gave up law for the ministry and was licensed to preach while yet a youth. At twenty-six years of age he was made president of Washington College, serving at this time for five years, and after an interim of connections with other institutions of learning and periods of preaching he accepted a second election to the presidency of Washington College. At the age of thirty he received the D.D. degree from Washington College.

Waters was also a contributor to religious periodicals and was one of the founders of the M.P. Church, being president of the Convention that gave the new church its Constitution and Discipline in 1830. It was at his suggestion that the name Methodist Protestant Church was adopted. He was president of the GENERAL CONFERENCES of 1846 and 1862.

Waters was married twice, first to Margaret Chairs of Queen Anne's County, Md., in 1818; and in 1833 he married Elizabeth Chairs, sister of his former wife. He died on April 23, 1868, and is buried in Baltimore.

WATERS, GEORGE STWIRE (1842-1924), American Indian minister, was born May 7, 1842, near Astoria, Ore. He was a full-blooded American Indian of the Klickitat Tribe, and was educated in the Fort Simcoe Indian School conducted by JAMES H. WILBUR and the Chemawa Indian School near SALEM, Ore. He returned home to Fort Simcoe where Wilbur gave him instruction in Bible and other subjects preparing him for the Christian ministry.

He was received on trial in the OREGON CONFERENCE of the M.E. Church in 1869 and became a full member of that Conference and was ordained DEACON by Bishop E. S. JAMES in 1871. He was a charter member of the COLUMBIA RIVER CONFERENCE when it was organized in 1874. All his appointments were to the Simcoe Indian Mission or missionary at large.

Waters was a successful pastor and an efficient evangelist to the Indians of WASHINGTON, OREGON and IDAHO. He was especially remembered by the Nez Perce Indians among whom he, and his brother Joe Stwire (the noted Chief, White Swan), and THOMAS PEARNE held a revival meeting in which more than 300 were converted and added to the church.

His mother had heard the preaching of JASON LEE at The Dalles, Oregon, and was very glad to have her son go to school and be a minister.

He died May 13, 1924, and was buried in the White Swan Methodist Cemetery, a part of the land donated to the Methodist Church by Chief White Swan for church, camp meeting and cemetery.

WATKIN, JAMES (1805-1886), New Zealand Methodist minister, was born at Manchester, England. Entering the ministry in 1830 he served some years in Tonga and later in New South Wales. While in Tonga he wrote a pamphlet called Pity Poor Fee-Jee, which not only inspired many to offer for missionary work, but has been described as "one of the most precious and fruitful bits of missionary literature ever given to the world."

In 1840, he transferred to the New Zealand Mission and was appointed to Waikouaiti, where the presence of a missionary had been requested by the well-known whaler and storekeeper, John Jones. From this base, Watkin made extensive journeys throughout the area in his pastoral care, which, after the withdrawal of Samuel Ironside from CLOUDY BAY in 1843, stretched from the Seaward Kaikouras to Stewart Island. Under his influence J. F. H. Wohlers of the German Mission settled at Ruapuke Island in Foveaux Strait and labored there for forty years. Watkin was replaced at Waikouaiti by CHARLES CREED in 1844.

He later returned to Australia where he became president of the General Conference in 1862. In 1869 he became a supernumerary and spent his retirement near Sydney until his death on May 14, 1886. He was buried at Rookwood, New South Wales.

WATKIN, WILLIAM JAMES (1833-1909), New Zealand Methodist minister, was the son of JAMES WATKIN, early Wesleyan missionary to both Tonga and New Zealand. Entering the ministry in 1857 he became much sought after as a preacher for special occasions. Though possessed of a ready wit, he was an excessively modest man and labored in many hard country circuits.

During the years 1882-84 he was principal of Wesley College and in 1889 was elected president of the New Zealand Wesleyan Conference. In 1893 he superannuated and spent his declining years as a most effective preacher in the Onehunga and adjoining circuits until his death on Sept. 28, 1909.

WATKINS, ALEXANDER FARRAR (1856-1929), American minister and educator, was born in Natchez, Miss., on Dec. 18, 1856, a son of W. H. and Elizabeth Jones WATKINS. He attended CENTENARY COLLEGE, then received the A.B. degree at VANDERBILT UNIVERSITY.

He was licensed to preach in 1880, was admitted to the MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE where he served the following appointments; First Church, JACKSON; Crawford Street Church, VICKSBURG; president of Whitworth College (two years); Financial Secretary of the Superannuate Endowment Fund (a connectional appointment); presiding elder of Jackson District; First Church, Hattiesburg; president of MILLSAPS COLLEGE (twelve years); First Church, Yazoo City; Central, MERIDIAN; and Brookhaven.

Watkins was secretary of the Mississippi Conference for twenty-eight years. He was a member of the General BOARD OF MISSIONS (MES) from 1906 until his death. He was eight times a delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCE, and was secretary of the General Conference from 1906 until his death. In 1908 he was named a delegate to the Federal Council of Churches. In 1911 he was a member of the ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCE in Toronto, Canada. He served on the Committee of Fifteen to draft a Constitution for the M.E. Church, South, which, however, failed of adoption.

In June 1892 he married Lula Gaudling of Arkadelphia, Ark. Seven children were born to them. Death came to him on July 26, 1929, at Brookhaven, Miss. He was buried at Jackson, Miss.

WATKINS, OWEN (1842-1915), Wesleyan Methodist minister, pioneer missionary and first chairman of the TRANSVAAL and Swaziland District, SOUTH AFRICA, was born at Worsley, near Manchester, England, on July 17, 1842, and was accepted for the Wesleyan ministry in 1863. He was sent to RICHMOND COLLEGE to be a missionary student but ill health compelled him to remain in England. However, after a later illness his doctors advised removal to South Africa and his missionary vocation at last found fulfillment. He was sent to Pietermaritzburg, NATAL, in 1876 and served as secretary of the Natal Synod until his appointment as chairman and general superintendent of the newly constituted Transvaal and Swaziland District in 1880. Watkins adopted the strategy of WILLIAM SHAW and proposed to extend three chains of missions into Central Africa from Swaziland in the east, Pretoria in the center and Bechuanaland in the west. This plan was not fully carried out, but he travelled indefatigably throughout the Transvaal laying the foundations of a thriving work. Assisted by colleagues such as GEORGE WEAVING he made contact with African evangelists who had independently begun Methodist work (see TRANSVAAL AFRICAN PIONEERS), purchased a number of mission farms such as Kilmerton and provided pastoral care for white communities, especially along the newly-discovered Witwatersrand gold reef. His address at the May Meetings in 1884 and his fascinating reports aroused much interest and enthusiasm in England.

In 1891 he was sent north with Isaac Shimmin to establish missions in Mashonaland (part of RHODESIA) which was being opened up by Cecil Rhodes and his Chartered Company. Rhodes had earlier promised assistance, and Watkins obtained three mission farms and stands in the new townships of Salisbury and Umtali. Leaving Shimmin at Umtali, he walked 200 miles to the east coast port of Beira, contracted fever en route, and arrived home in PRETORIA on the point of death.

Watkins was sent to England to recuperate and in 1892 was elected to the Legal Hundred. He hoped to return to Africa and to lead a Wesleyan advance across the Zambesi, but his wish was not granted and he spent the rest of his ministry in British circuits.

A man of strong personality, iron will and great ability to adapt himself to demanding situations, Watkins was one of the greatest missionaries to serve in South Africa. He died on Dec. 22, 1915 and was honored by a special resolution of the 1916 Conference.

WATKINS, WILLIAM HAMILTON (1815-1881), American minister and leader of MISSISSIPPI Methodism, was born in Jefferson County, Miss., April 11, 1815, one of several children of Asa and Sarah Watkins. He joined Cane Ridge Church in September 1831, and was soon after given a license to preach and recommended for admission into the MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE, which came about in 1835. During his long ministry he served pastorates in NATCHEZ, VICKSBURG, JACKSON, Woodville, and NEW ORLEANS, as well as a term of service as presiding elder of the NATCHEZ District. He was for one year president of CENTENARY COLLEGE, then at Jackson, La., and also principal of the Woodville Female Seminary in connection with his pastorate at that place. Centenary College conferred upon him the honorary D.D. degree; he is said to have been the first native Mississippian ever to receive this degree. He was a member of the LOUISVILLE CONVENTION in 1845 that organized the M.E. CHURCH, SOUTH; and in 1866, 1870, and 1878 he was a member of the GENERAL CONFERENCE.

Watkins was married on Dec. 18, 1842 to Mrs. Elizabeth Johnson in New Orleans. Two of their sons became ministers, ALEXANDER F. WATKINS, for twelve years president of MILLSAPS COLLEGE, and Calvin C. Watkins. A grandson, Herbert B. Watkins, was a member of the Mississippi Conference, and a granddaughter, Janie Watkins, was a missionary to CHINA.

William H. Watkins died on Feb. 5, 1881, at his home in Jackson; his final resting place was in the historic Cane Ridge cemetery in Jefferson County.

WATKINS, WILLIAM TURNER (1895-1961), American editor, and bishop, was born at Maysville, Ga., May 26, 1895. Of Welsh origin, his family came to America in the eighteenth century. They settled first in Maryland and Virginia, one ancestor moving to GEORGIA about the time of the Revolution. Reared in a dedicated home, joining the country church in childhood, called to preach in early youth, he moved on to become a teacher of church history at EMORY UNIVERSITY, Atlanta, Ga.

He was educated at YOUNG HARRIS COLLEGE and Emory, Ph.B., 1926; D.D., 1939; student at Edinburgh University, Scotland, 1926-27; Yale Divinity School, New Haven, Conn., 1927-28. He was awarded the honorary D.D. by Union College, 1949. He married Frances Edith Hancock, Jan. 21, 1914, and they had five children.

Watkins joined the NORTH GEORGIA CONFERENCE in 1914, and served various appointments in it until 1930. His first assignment was Middleton Circuit, Elbert County, Ga. His last pastorate was Emory University Methodist Church, 1928-30. He then became professor of church history at Emory, 1930-38. While teaching he ably edited the Wesleyan Christian Advocate, 1932-36, official organ of Georgia Methodism. He was a delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCE (MES) in 1934 and 1938, when he was elected bishop; he was the youngest of the bishops elected in 1938 by his denomination, and the last bishop consecrated by the Southern Church as Methodist union came the next year. His areas were COLUMBIA, S. C., 1940-44; LOUISVILLE, KY., 1944-56.

A liberal on the social aspects of the Gospel, Bishop Watkins was "supremely at home in the pulpit" and was in constant demand at notable gatherings.

He wrote Out of Aldersgate in 1938; and The Christian Hope in 1953.

For twenty years he took no vacation, and rose each day at 4 a.m. to begin his work. A mild heart attack in 1956 was followed two years later by physical and nervous exhaustion. He retired early (October 1959) but never regained full health, dying on Feb. 6, 1961. He was buried in Louisville, Ky.

WATKINSON, JOSEPH (? -1950), New Zealand Methodist layman who arrived in Auckland in the ship "Suret" after a passage of 112 days from England. An active local preacher and Sunday school teacher, he also became treasurer of the children's fund and missionary treasurer. He was a man of rare personal charm and Christian grace. Only his excessive modesty kept him from reaching even higher places in the church.

WILLIAM L. WATKINSON

WATKINSON, WILLIAM L. (1838-1925), British Methodist, was born at Hull in 1838, and entered the WESLEYAN METHODIST ministry in 1858, after a bare six-weeks' training at RICHMOND THEOLOGICAL COLLEGE, LONDON. He was sent as a supply to the Stratford upon Avon Circuit, and found himself in sole charge when the superintendent died. He rose rapidly to prominence as an outstanding preacher and as a popular religious writer and journalist. Numerous volumes of his sermons were published, including The Blind Spot (1899) and The Shepherd of the Sea (1920). Denied early educational opportunity, he was an omnivorous reader all his life, especially in the fields of theology, science, and philosophy. He delivered the FERNLEY LECTURE of 1886 at WESLEY'S CHAPEL, LONDON, on the typically original subject, The Influence of Scepticism on Character. From 1893 to 1904 he was connectional editor; he introduced pictures into Methodist Magazine, and generally enhanced its popular character, "but the drudgery of the position was never." (F. CUMBERS, The Book Room, (London, 1956) p. 124.) it has been said, "congenial to him." He was elected president of the Wesleyan Methodist Conference in 1897. He died in 1925.

WATSFORD, JOHN J. (1822-1907), was the first Australian-born Methodist minister. His father, converted under SAMUEL LEIGH, was one of the original PARRAMATTA Methodists. He himself owed his awakening to DANIEL DRAPER in 1833—a period which he had thought peculiarly unproductive. His ministry stretched through sixty-six years. In his early years he played a great part in the heroic age of South Sea Missions.

Originally a pioneer missionary in FIJI, Watsford returned to proclaim the need of a strong Church in the homeland if ever the people there were to fulfill their obligations to the brown races of the Pacific. Strong in intellect and of powerful physique he possessed great spiritual capacity and power. The tremendous impetus given to sane evangelism by his personal example and advocacy has not spent itself but abides to this day. Victoria is a missionary spirited state to a large extent as a result of Watsford's impact upon it.

His active ministry extended to every part of AUSTRALIA, and everywhere there were hundreds who traced to him their spiritual birth. During his term in SOUTH AUSTRALIA he was largely responsible for the founding of Prince Alfred College, ADELAIDE.

In 1871 he was president of the Australasian Wesleyan Conference. Seven years later he became president of the first General Conference. In 1881 he was in LONDON as representative to the ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCE. To a remarkable degree he was representative of everything that is characteristic of Methodism. He was ardent, fearless and untiring.

In 1875 he was appointed general secretary of the Home Mission Society. When John Watsford was asked to undertake this work he at first hesitated because he loved circuit work, and because he loved his home and large family. But he was appointed general secretary, year by year for eight years. He travelled thousands of miles annually, preaching, lecturing, holding revival services, and in every way directing and helping the work.

In 1886 he became editor of the Spectator and was also appointed organizer of the Jubilee Thanksgiving Fund, when £30,968 was raised.

"Watsford," wrote Dr. FITCHETT, "would have been a man of mark in any calling. He has many of the qualities of an orator, and a natural faculty for leadership which is felt by everyone who comes within the range of his influence. A fearless man, who speaks the truth and does the right in scorn of consequence. Rich in a strong fibred, clear-eyed common sense, which sees the path to be trodden when subtler intellects often stumble and grope."

During sixteen years of retirement he was known and revered as "Father Watsford"—the saint and patriarch of the Church. For the last three or four years he felt that God had given him a ministry of intercession, and he lived in an atmosphere of prayer for the Church, for the unconverted, for Christ's Kingdom.

WATSON, EDWARD L. (1861-1936), American minister, was born in BALTIMORE, Md., Feb. 6, 1861 of Roman Catholic parents. Converted in Jefferson Street M.E. Church at age fifteen, he became a traveling preacher at age nineteen ably filling eleven BALTIMORE CONFERENCE Stations and a presiding eldership besides Hennepin Avenue, MINNEAPOLIS. While assistant at First Church, Baltimore (LOVELY LANE), he completed undergraduate and graduate studies at Johns Hopkins University. His marriage to Edith Hann was blessed with five children.

Association with JOHN F. GOUCHER and the University fueled his zeal for history and led to service of forty years with the American Methodist HISTORICAL SOCIETY, the last fifteen as president. In 1925 he was elected the first president of the Association of Methodist Historical Societies, continuing until his death. He played a great part in getting the FRANCIS ASBURY equestrian statue erected in WASHINGTON, D.C. Appropriate marking of the SESQUICENTENNIAL of American Methodism was his concern from 1927; and as acting president of the Baltimore Sesquicentennial Commission, he led in bringing the great 1934 celebration to pass.

Although technically retired in 1932, he was on his way to broadcast a radio message when suddenly stricken Dec. 29, 1936.

EDWIN SCHELL

WATSON, ELLA B. (1863-1940), American lay woman and a native of Illinois, grew to young womanhood in that state, being a graduate of Hedding College. She went with her family to NEBRASKA and settled in LINCOLN, where she became a member of Trinity Church, remaining so until her death.

She was a school teacher for a short time and began her work as corresponding secretary of the NEBRASKA CONFERENCE, WOMAN'S FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY (MES), in 1885. In 1906 she was elected to the task of corresponding secretary of the Topeka Branch of the Society. She carried on a heavy correspondence with individuals and societies, much of it by longhand. She also wrote many articles for missionary publications.

In addition to her writing, Miss Watson spent much time in traveling, speaking at Women's Foreign Missionary gatherings, at annual conferences, and at other Methodist gatherings. On several occasions she traveled abroad.

Miss Watson was a lay delegate to several GENERAL CONFERENCES, and on her way to that of 1940, she became ill and died in the home of friends in Montclair, N. J., on April 24, 1940. Word came to the Nebraska Conference delegation shortly before the opening session. Bishop WILLIAM C. MARTIN announced her passing to that session, and a prayer was offered in her memory. Her body was returned to Lincoln, where she was buried. She left a great impression on Methodism of the midwest.

EVERETT E. JACKMAN

WATSON, RICHARD (1781-1833), British Methodist, was born on Feb. 22, 1781, at Barton-on-Humber, Lincolnshire. He entered the WESLEYAN ministry in 1796, but in 1800 withdrew on doctrinal grounds, becoming an itinerant in the METHODIST NEW CONNEXION in 1803. Partly through the influence of JABEZ BUNTING he returned to the Wesleyan ministry in 1812. He rapidly made a reputation as a writer, and in 1818 wrote a reply to ADAM CLARKE's unsound doctrine of the Eternal Sonship: this public disagreement with Clarke was the root of much later bitterness in Wesleyan Methodism, as it was never forgiven by JAMES EVERETT. In 1820 Watson published Observations on Southey's Life of Wesley, an official answer to Southey's book. Always interested in overseas missions, Watson was secretary to the WESLEYAN MISSIONARY SOCIETY from 1821-1825 and honorary secretary from 1827-1831. He was the leading Wesleyan opponent of slavery.

In 1823 Watson began to publish his Theological Institutes, which formed the Wesleyan theological mind until W. B. POPE replaced them. In 1829 at the time of the

RICHARD WATSON

LEEDS organ controversy (see Leeds Protestant Methodists), Watson wrote An Affectionate Address to the Trustees, Stewards and Local Preachers of the South London Circuit; this was the classic statement of the conservative Wesleyan view of Church government. In 1831 he wrote a Life of John Wesley, which remained standard for many years. Watson was president of the Wesleyan Methodist Conference of 1826. At the time of his death, on Jan. 8, 1833, he stood second only to Jabez Bunting in the estimation of the connection.

JOHN KENT

WATT, ROLLA VERNON (1868-1925), American layman of the CALIFORNIA CONFERENCE and considered to be the leading Christian layman of the Pacific Coast, was born in Ohio. He came to SAN FRANCISCO when nineteen, and lived there for fifty years. He was an active member of the Central Methodist Church official board for forty-two years, superintendent of its Sunday school for thirty-three years, a director and/or president of the city Y.M.C.A. for twenty-nine years and for a like period as trustee of the UNIVERSITY OF THE PACIFIC.

He was the organizer in 1889 of the California Conference Lay Association, and one of its early presidents. When the GENERAL CONFERENCE adopted that organization as part of its denominational machinery he was its first vice-president and then its president. He was elected to the General Conference in 1900, and to each of the succeeding sessions until his death—seven times in all. He was long a member of the BOOK COMMITTEE which had supervision of the publishing interests of the church.

His business field was insurance, and he was the Pacific Coast agent for several of the larger companies. Developing a large earning capacity, he started as a tither, but increased his giving until it was the large part of his income. He continued in business in his later years that he might assist especially Central Church and the University.

Endowed with a large body and an attractive presence, Rolla Watt matched these in his gracious religious personality.

WATTERS, WILLIAM (1751-1827), first native-born American to enter the Methodist itineracy, was born Oct. 18, 1771, in what is now Harford County, Md., the son of Godfrey and Sarah Watters. He was educated at a neighborhood school. Originally Anglican, the family was won to Methodism by ROBERT STRAWBRIDGE and others. William was converted in 1771.

In October 1772, he joined ROBERT WILLIAMS on a preaching tour to NORFOLK. Though not present at the first conference in PHILADELPHIA in 1773, that body appointed him to NEW JERSEY as junior preacher with JOHN KING. However, he continued at Norfolk until September, and then was sent by THOMAS RANKIN to the Kent Circuit. He attended the 1774 conference, was admitted on trial, and was appointed to Trenton, N. J. Thereafter he served circuits in MARYLAND and VIRGINIA until 1784 when he located. He was active again a few months in 1786, and during 1801-05, and was a local preacher the rest of his life.

Watters loved the itineracy and had good success, but marriage and poor health compelled location. He married Sarah Adams, June 6, 1779; they had no children.

Watters played an important role during the controversy over the administration of the sacraments. He presided at the 1778 conference, the first native-born American to function in that capacity, when the Virginia and NORTH CAROLINA preachers agreed to wait one year before deciding whether to proceed with administration of the sacraments. He was the only preacher to attend both conferences in 1779. Though not invited to attend the conference to be held by ASBURY in DELAWARE in April, he learned about it and determined to go with the aim of persuading Asbury to be present at the May conference in Virginia. He wanted Asbury's help in dissuading the preachers from taking a step that would mean schism. Asbury could not go to Virginia, but he did write letters to the leaders of that conference. Unmoved, the majority of the southern preachers proceeded to administer the sacraments.

At the conference in Baltimore in 1780, Asbury, Watters, and GARRETSON were appointed a committee to attend the conference of the southern preachers in Virginia and try to dissuade them from their course, and in the end they succeeded; the sacraments were suspended until JOHN WESLEY could take action.

During the controversy some preachers on each side accused Watters of favoring their opponents, but on the whole he kept the good will of both groups; the pro-sacrament preachers said that Watters was the only man on the other side who treated them with affection. In his autobiography Watters declares that his one aim throughout the controversy was to prevent schism, that he could have conscientiously administered or not administered the sacraments, provided all the preachers would have agreed on the one or the other course.

Watters died at his farm home in Fairfax County, Va.,

March 29, 1827, and was buried there. In 1859 the VIRGINIA CONFERENCE erected a monument over his grave.

BASCOM WATTS

WATTS, HENRY BASCOM (1890-1959), American bishop, was born at Yellville, Ark., Nov. 6, 1890, the son of Joseph H. and Mary T. (Sims) Watts. His father, a pastor in the then Arkansas Conference, transferred to the NORTHWEST TEXAS CONFERENCE in 1896. Bascom Watts was educated at SOUTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY (A.B., 1813, D.D., 1932), Amarillo; 1915-16, Ochiltree; 1917-21, Lockney; 1922, First, Cisco; 1923-25, St. John's, Waco; 1926-29, University, Austin; 1930-35, Laurel Heights, SAN ANTONIO; 1936-38, First, LITTLE ROCK; 1939-40, Boston Avenue, TULSA; and 1950-51, Tulsa District.

Admitted on trial in the Northwest Texas Conference in 1914, Bascom Watts was ordained DEACON in 1916 and ELDER in 1918. His appointments in the Northwest Texas, CENTRAL TEXAS, WEST TEXAS, LITTLE ROCK, and East Oklahoma CONFERENCES were: 1914, Buchanan Street, Amarillo; 1915-16, Ochiltree; 1917-21, Lockney; 1922, First, Cisco; 1923-25, St. John's, Waco; 1926-29, University, Austin; 1930-35, Laurel Heights, SAN ANTONIO; 1936-38, First, LITTLE ROCK; 1939-40, Boston Avenue, TULSA; and 1950-51, Tulsa District.

Though Watts was a "transfer" man who served in five annual conferences, he was also a conference minded man who willingly worked on boards and committees and was soon recognized as a conference leader wherever he was. In both the West Texas and Little Rock Conferences he was chairman of the board of education. In the East Oklahoma Conference he was chairman of the commission on world service and finance and chairman of the Oklahoma Methodist Foundation, and in addition he served on the board of trustees of Southern Methodist University and represented the Oklahoma-New Mexico Area on the Jurisdictional Council. He was a delegate to the 1934 GENERAL CONFERENCE from West Texas and he led the East Oklahoma General Conference delegation in 1948-52 and was a reserve delegate in 1944. He was elected bishop in 1952 and was assigned to the NEBRASKA Area which he superintended until his death, Nov. 3, 1959. Burial was in Tulsa, Okla., following a funeral service in Boston Avenue Church at which the church choir sang, in accordance with his request, "A Charge to Keep I Have" and the "Hallelujah Chorus."

WATTS, ISAAC (1674-1748), AND THE WESLEYS. In their enthusiastic appreciation of the hymns of JOHN and CHARLES WESLEY some Methodist scholars have tended to overlook the important contribution both to the practice of hymn singing and to the corpus of Christian hymnody of Isaac Watts, and the Wesleys' acknowledged debt to him. Watts' Hymns and Spiritual Songs was published in 1707, shortly before the birth of Charles Wesley, and while John was a young child not yet old enough to begin those incomparable lessons at his mother's knee. It seems likely that at Epworth there was little singing apart from the New Version of metrical psalms by Tate and Brady—certainly John Wesley characterized the Old Version by Sternhold and Hopkins as arrant doggerel.

Watts was a different proposition altogether. His Psalms of David (1719) became firm favorites with both John and Charles, and were regularly sung by the members of the HOLY CLUB at Oxford both as a group and as individuals. To these and the New Version were gradually added some of the few samples of hymns written by the Wesleys' father and elder brother, especially "Behold the Saviour of mankind," by the rector of Epworth. On the voyage out to GEORGIA the treasures of German hymnody were introduced to the two brothers by the Moravians, and John speedily began learning German and translating some of these into English verse.

In 1737 John Wesley published America's first hymn book. (Earlier compilations from the Bay Psalm Book of 1740 onwards had been restricted to metrical psalms, and poems of human composition were frowned upon in divine worship.) He had varied material to hand, yet half of his Charleston Collection of Psalms and Hymns—thirty-four out of seventy items—came from Isaac Watts. It is true, however, that Wesley's editorial pen was just as active upon the hymns of Watts as on most other writings which he published, and his alterations tended to make Watts' hymns still more personal and evangelical.

The same was true in the following year of 1738, when Wesley published in London a second collection with the same title, begun in Georgia: of seventy items thirty-three were from Watts, including his "Our God, our help in ages past," altered by Wesley to what became its best known form, "O God, our help. . . ." In Hymns and Sacred Poems, which appeared the following year, the compositions of Charles Wesley first began to appear, and John forsook his heavy dependence upon Watts, except for metrical psalms. But hymns and poems (and especially psalms) continued to appear in Methodist publications: in a third Collection of Psalms and Hymns (1741), in a three-volume Collection of Moral and Sacred Poems (1744), in the famous Collection of Hymns for the use of the People called Methodists (1780), and in the Collection of Psalms and Hymns for the Lord's Day, appended to the Sunday Service of the Methodists in 1784.

The Wesleys certainly gratefully acknowledged the important pioneer work of Isaac Watts, and enjoyed a session of walking and singing with him on 4 October 1738. John Wesley felt unhappy about some of Watts' later Arian tendencies, but gladly abridged a part of his Ruin and Recovery of Mankind to form Serious Considerations concerning the doctrines of Election and Reprobation (1740), and prepared a brief biography of Watts for inclusion in the Arminian Magazine. It is good to know that the admiration was mutual, and that before his death in 1748 Watts paid high tribute to Charles Wesley's verse, testifying that "that single poem 'Wrestling Jacob' [Come, O thou traveller unknown] was worth all the verses he himself had written."

WATTS, MARTHA HITE (1845-1909), American educator, first missionary sent to BRAZIL by the WOMAN'S FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY of the M.E. Church, South, was born in Bardstown, Ky., on Feb. 13, 1845. Her father was a prominent lawyer, and Martha grew up in an atmosphere of culture, social gaiety, and world interests. Grieved by the death of her fiancé in the Civil War, she decided to prepare herself for teaching, went to the Louisville Normal School, and then taught in the city schools.

Though nominally a Christian, Martha had never experienced a real conversion until she attended a revival at Broadway Methodist Church. Almost at once she began giving herself to Christian Service. She organized a missionary society for young girls before such a group had been authorized—as was then necessary—by the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1878. From then on, close association with two outstanding Methodist women of that day, Mary Helm and Maria Gibson, led her into missionary work. She applied, was accepted, and appointed to Brazil by Bishop J. C. KEENER in February 1881; and went to that country in company of the early missionaries, J. J. RANSOM, J. L. KENNEDY, and J. W. KOGER. They arrived in RIO DE JANEIRO on May 16, 1881.

Martha Watts was sent at once to PIRACICABA, São Paulo, for the express purpose of establishing a school for girls. Its foundations had been laid a few years before by Annie and Mary Newman, daughters of J. E. NEWMAN, a Methodist preacher, one of the self-styled "Confederate exiles" who had come to Brazil in 1867. This was the first Methodist educational institution in Brazil and was named Colegio (later Instituto Educacional) Piracicabano. It opened officially on Sept. 13, 1881, with only one little pupil, Maria Escobar, but for three months Miss Watts kept the school going. She often told of conditions in those days when "respectable ladies" did not go alone on the streets; so to protect herself, she always carried books and an umbrella—badges of propriety.

Under her the school pioneered in the teaching of social sciences, for which there were not even any textbooks at the time; in languages; bookkeeping, for a short period in 1882; and kindergarten (1884). She introduced coeducation in the lower grades. There was strong persecution instigated by the Roman Catholic Church, but despite opposition the school's advanced curriculum, high standards, discipline and moral education, won the esteem of the most prominent families of the area. One of the local papers wrote: "The great importance of this school is not only in the instruction it affords, but in the moral education it imparts, which will lead to the regeneration of our customs."

Prudente de Moraes Barros, who became governor of the state when the Republic was proclaimed in 1889, and was later elected first civil president of Brazil, held Miss Watts in such high esteem that he invited her to become his minister of education. This position she declined, as she had dedicated her life to the service of the Church.

Successful in this school, Miss Watts was appointed twice to found others—the Colegio Americano in Petropolis (which was the precursor of Colegio Bennett, Rio de Janeiro); and the COLEGIO IZABELA HENDRIX in BELO HORIZONTE, Minas Gerais. Undergirding all she did was a profound love for her "girls"—not just to see them "educated" but to instill love of truth, self-discipline, and the ideal of service.

Severe illness forced her retirement in 1909. She returned to Louisville, Ky., where she died on Dec. 30, 1909, and was buried in Cave Hill Cemetery. Former students in Brazil, led by Eugenia Smith Becker, placed a bronze plaque in Broadway Church as a "tribute of love and gratitude for the influence she had exerted in their lives by her beautiful service."

BEVERLY WAUGH

WAUGH, BEVERLY (1789-1858), American bishop, was born in Fairfax County, Va., on Oct. 25, 1789, the son of Captain James Waugh, a Revolutionary veteran. He received a secondary education and became the manager of a store in Middleburg, Va., in 1807. Two years later he joined the BALTIMORE CONFERENCE on trial and was appointed to the Stafford and Fredericksburg circuit. His other appointments were Greenbrier (now in WEST VIRGINIA); Washington in 1811 and again in 1817; Stephenburg (Virginia); five times to BALTIMORE; presiding elder of the Potomac District, Montgomery, Berkeley, Pell's Point, GEORGETOWN and FREDERICK.

When the reform movement which resulted in the formation of the M.P. CHURCH arose, Waugh was favorable to the election of PRESIDING ELDERS and as a consequence he was not elected to the GENERAL CONFERENCE in 1824. However, he adhered to the M.E. CHURCH and eventually lost interest in the matter and championed the prevailing order.

In 1828 he was elected assistant BOOK AGENT with JOHN EMORY, and in 1832 he became Book Agent when Emory was elected a bishop. He was a member of the General Conferences of 1816, 1820, 1828, and 1836. As Book Agent he paid the indebtedness on the PUBLISHING HOUSE and erected a new building on Mulberry Street in NEW YORK. On Feb. 18, 1836 the Publishing House was burned, the manuscript journals of FRANCIS ASBURY and JESSE LEE being destroyed in the fire. The loss was estimated at $200,000. Waugh at once began raising funds for rebuilding and was engaged in this task when he was elected bishop on the first ballot at the General Conference of 1836.

His first episcopal assignment was to the TROY CONFERENCE. In the next twenty-two years he traveled 100,000 miles and made 12,000 appointments in all sections of the Church.

When the abolition agitation became acute in the Church he held to a neutral course. Although a Southerner he was opposed to SLAVERY, but he refused to allow the extremists to present their resolutions in his conferences. At the General Conference of 1844 he tried to avert a division of the Church by urging that the case of Bishop ANDREW be deferred. But when the division came he adhered to the northern branch of the Church.

Bishop Waugh died in Baltimore on Feb. 9, 1858, as the result of exposure at a camp meeting and was buried in Mount Olivet Cemetery near Bishops Asbury, GEORGE and Emory. His ruling that the annual conference year commences when the appointments are announced at an annual conference and continues until the announcing of appointments at the next annual conference has become authoritative Methodist law.

WAUGH, JAMES WALTER (1832-1910), American missionary to INDIA, was born in Mercer, Pa., Feb. 27, 1932. He was graduated from ALLEGHENY COLLEGE in 1854, and in 1856 won his M.A. degree. In 1858 he was received on trial in the SOUTHERN ILLINOIS CONFERENCE, with permission to attend GARRETT BIBLICAL INSTITUTE as a "missionary student." He sailed for India in 1859, and received his B.D. degree from Garrett in absentia. Ten years later he was awarded the D.D. degree.

Waugh was a practical printer, and in 1860 was appointed to BAREILLY to establish the press which in 1866 was transferred to Lucknow. He was four times the agent of the Methodist Publishing House of India. He also served as superintendent of the Bareilly, LUCKNOW, and Kumaon districts. For three years he was principal of the Kanpur Memorial School, and was the first principal of Oak Openings in Naini Tal, later named Philander Smith College. A former pupil of his said: "He was the best Christian I ever knew."

Waugh had a fluent use of Hindustani. He was also a gifted singer, and a number of the hymns he used were of his composition. He was a good translator, an excellent accountant and business man.

He died in Moradabad, India, Jan. 21, 1910, and was buried there. An Indian preacher said: "He loved us and in proof of it he left his body in our midst, buried here in India. He loved us, he worked for us, and died among us."

WAUGH, THOMAS (1853-1932), British WESLEYAN METHODIST and connexional evangelist, was born on Sept. 3, 1853, in Cumberland, and was renowned in his youth as a wrestler. Converted in 1876, he entered Headingley College in 1880. In 1883 he joined Thomas Cook as a connexional evangelist, remaining in this work until 1910. This was part of an attempt to combine the revivalistic methods of Moody and Sankey with the circuit system. Even after his final superannuation, Waugh continued lecturing and preaching. He published The Power of Pentecost. He died Oct. 17, 1932.

WAUKEGAN, ILLINOIS, U.S.A. First Church is located on the west shore of Lake Michigan in Lake County, Ill., in one of the fastest growing and most prosperous counties of the state. It is a downtown church, across the street from Waukegan's spacious new library. City Hall is a block south, and Y.M.C.A. a block east. Nine other churches are within four blocks.

In 1847 Waukegan was first listed in the ROCK RIVER (now Northern Illinois) Conference. At that time Waukegan was a part of Old Lake Circuit—changed in 1847 to Little Fort, the name Waukegan bore from early days until 1848. First Church's first official board meeting was Aug. 11, 1849, JOHN F. DEVORE, pastor. There were seventy-one members. On Oct. 10, 1849 the first church building was dedicated, with Hooper Crews, circuit rider of northern Illinois from an early date, preaching the dedicatory sermon. That building was replaced by the present sanctuary during the pastorate of J. W. Funston (1913-18). During the time of Harold McElvany (1955-59) an educational building, chapel, and other facilities were constructed. In 1966 the church was free of debt, and membership that year was over 2,200.

In 1956 First Church sponsored a new Methodist congregation (Faith), located on the west edge of Waukegan, about two miles from First Church. From 1945 to 1965 six young persons of First Church entered full-time Christian service. In 1963 the church for the first time had two full-time conference members as pastors: W. Gehl Devore (same last name as the first pastor in 1849), senior minister; Richard A. Brewer, associate; and a full-time Director of Christian Education. Membership in 1970 was 1,973.

In addition to serving Waukegan, First Church has many contacts with the Navy personnel at Great Lakes Naval Training Center, about four miles south.

W. GEHL DEVORE

WAUSAU, WISCONSIN, U.S.A. First Church is the oldest congregation in Wausau, dating back to 1847 when a Methodist circuit rider arrived in Big Bull Falls (Wausau), when the population included but five women. Since that time the congregation has erected five buildings (one having been destroyed by fire in 1869, supposedly started by the Indians). The present unit, costing approximately a million dollars, was completed in 1966.

Located in downtown Wausau the church is community minded, as evidenced in its many concerns. A week-day class for retarded persons began in 1959, and was a pioneer project in the area; the early establishment (1957) of an "open door" policy holding that persons of all nationalities, races, or economic conditions should be included in the fellowship of First Church; exchange programs with Negro young persons and churches of the CHICAGO area to provide experiences in inter-racial living for persons in this "all-white" community; work with patients from the Marathon County Hospital by staff and college students; a growing educational concern for peace and world order; and continuous broadcasts of the Sunday morning services since 1958.

The educational ministry of the church holds itself to be creative and unique. Unusual interest is always taken in certain expressions of religious art to be seen in the church. Among these are the large painting, "If Thou Hast Known" in Memorial Chapel, painted in 1917 by Louis Amorosi (using Rib Mountain, near Wausau, as the setting for his sketch); the great facade stained-glass window on the south wall of the sanctuary, more than two stories high and entitled "Come Unto Me," featuring the figure of Christ surrounded by persons of all races; the large mosaic on the north wall behind the altar symbolizing Christ's last week; and the art work in the Wesleyan Room featuring important events and emphases of early Methodism, and the life of JOHN and CHARLES WESLEY.

First Church, one of three Methodist churches in the Wausau area, had a membership of 954 in 1970, a total raised for all purposes of over $100,000, and a paid staff totaling eight persons.

WAUWATOSA, WISCONSIN, U.S.A. Wauwatosa Church, the largest Methodist church in Wisconsin, came into being in pioneer days. A circuit rider, J. Lackenbie, brought the small group of settlers together in various homes for several years before the church officially came into being in May of 1848, shortly before Wisconsin became a state. The ecumenical interests of this community were manifested early: the village schoolhouse was used by all Christians for their worship, including Roman Catholic and Protestants. On Sunday morning in May of 1919, the sanctuary was burned to the ground. The Masons offered the use of their Temple across the street for the services and meetings of the Methodists, an offer they gratefully accepted. A Gothic style church building of Lannon stone was created in 1923 and this was three times enlarged over the succeeding years.

Fifty-two ministers have served the people of Wauwatosa through this church, which was originally called "First Methodist," and then, later, simply, "Wauwatosa." Five young men have been trained for the ministry from this church and are now serving as ministers: Edwin Beers, James Collins, Charles T. Hein, Robert Kuhn, and James Scott. Two young men are missionaries: John Frenc and James Newing, though each is now affiliated with other than the Methodist church. Five young men are currently studying in preparation for the Methodist ministry. One minister was elected an episcopal leader of the denomination from this church: FRANCIS E. KEARNS. Three ministers are currently serving this congregation of 2,139 members.

WAVELAND, MISSISSIPPI, U.S.A., has been the site of a summer assembly and training center for what has been the CENTRAL JURISDICTION of The Methodist Church. Bishop ROBERT E. JONES of the M.E. Church, seeing the necessity for such a center for the Negro Conferences of his Church, became instrumental in establishing such a center at Waveland on the Mississippi Gulf Coast just west of Bay St. Louis. The center grew in influence and importance with several buildings being added to the original one and training programs of significance being held there, especially through the summer season. The devastating hurricane, Camille, of 1969 largely destroyed the Waveland buildings, but these have been put back and repaired to a great extent through the help of the general Church. Although the Central Jurisdiction is being dissolved, Waveland bids fair to continue its work in the foreseeable future. Several sessions of the MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE (CJ) have been held at Waveland.

N. B. H.

WAVERLEY, New South Wales, Australia, was established to commemorate the end of World War I. The Rev. James Green (president) was set aside to visit the circuits and collect funds. On May 30, 1922 the family of the late EBENEZER VICKERY, JR. offered to the Conference their large home, "Edina," and two acres. The hospital was opened on Feb. 5, 1919, with Matron Hunter, M.B.E., as matron. On Nov. 11, 1922, "Edina" was handed over to the church. Since then it has developed into a very well equipped private hospital with 102 surgical beds, thirty-two maternity beds, with three operating theater rooms and modern equipment. It deals with about 3,500 patients each year. There have been 320 nurses trained to become Registered Nursing Sisters. In 1933 a chapel to the memory of Jane Ellen Vickery was erected.

WAY, SAMUEL JAMES (1836-1916), was a distinguished citizen and churchman in SOUTH AUSTRALIA for over fifty years. His father, James Way, was a leading BIBLE CHRISTIAN minister who pioneered the denomination's work in South Australia. Samuel Way was born in England and educated at the Bible Christian college at Shebbear in Devon. He joined his family in South Australia in 1853.

Way's contribution to South Australia was a many-sided one. He was called to the Bar in 1861, was made a Queen's Counsel in 1871 and five years later, after a short time as Attorney General in the State legislature, was appointed Chief Justice. He later became Lieutenant Governor and on a number of occasions acted as the Queen's representative. He was made a baronet in 1899. In the legal sphere he achieved eminence and was the first Australian to be nominated to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

Way gave his support to numerous philanthropic and educational organizations, serving both as Vice Chancellor and Chancellor of the University of Adelaide. On his death it was said that "it will be impossible to write the history of many of our great institutions without taking his contribution into account."

Way came from a notable Bible Christian family but his ecclesiastical interests became increasingly catholic in character. He was a Bible Christian delegate to the ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCE held in WASHINGTON in 1891, the New York Christian Advocate describing him as "the most distinguished lay member of the Conference from abroad." He was one of the state's leading advocates of Methodist Union and spoke at the inaugural service of the new church in Adelaide on Aug. 14, 1899. At the time he was circuit steward of the Bible Christian Church in Franklin Street.

WAYMAN, ALEXANDER WASHINGTON (1821-1895), American bishop of the A.M.E. CHURCH, was born in Caroline County, Md., in September 1821. A meager education was self acquired and later in his life he was awarded the D.D. degree by Howard University. He was converted in 1835 and later united with the M.E. Church. After transferring his membership to the A.M.E. Church in 1840, he was ordained DEACON in 1845 and ELDER in 1847. Wayman was pastor of churches in NEW JERSEY, PENNSYLVANIA, WASHINGTON, D. C., MARYLAND and VIRGINIA. Elected to the EPISCOPACY in 1864, he served the Second, Fourth, Third, Seventh, Ninth and Tenth Episcopal District Areas. WAYNESBORO, GEORGIA, U.S.A., is in Burke County and Methodism has been a part of Burke County history almost from the beginning, as revealed by Bishop ASBURY, who visited Methodist and other churches in the vicinity several times. An entry in Asbury's Journal indicates that he was not favorably impressed with Waynesboro: "Let preachers or people catch me in Waynesboro (again) until things are altered and bettered." (Journal, Feb. 25, 1792.)

Fortunately for posterity, conditions altered. BASCOM ANTHONY, pastor of the Waynesboro Methodist Church from 1858 to 1892, wrote in his delightful book, Fifty Years in the Ministry: "When I reached there a hundred years later, they had greatly changed, and that for the better . . . it was in many ways the most delightful people I have ever lived among."

Few accurate church records are today available due to disastrous fires which twice have destroyed church buildings and twice the county courthouse. The Waynesboro church was established between 1812 and 1815, and since 1857 has occupied its present site. On this, four successive edifices have been built.

In 1970 there were 741 members on the church roll, and the congregation worships in a churchly sanctuary. There is on the wall a plaque noting that Bishop ARTHUR J. MOORE was admitted to the SOUTH GEORGIA CONFERENCE in this church. A modern education and recreation building has been added to the church plant in recent years.

WEATHERBY, SAMUEL S. (1840-1924), was a Methodist missionary about whom little is known, but that little is enough to warrant inclusion of his name among significant Methodists. For three years he served in Gonda, United Provinces, INDIA, 1870-73, immediately following the pioneer, SAMUEL KNOWLES. He loyally followed the policies of his predecessor, touring extensively and inviting his hearers to confess their sins and declare their faith.

One young high-caste man, in his late teens, heard the preaching with joy and followed the missionary from place to place. At length, on the third or fourth day, he responded to the invitation and was baptized with the name of "Thomas." He accompanied Weatherby home to Gonda and later went with him to Lucknow, always eager to learn more about Christ. He was soon an established Christian, married to a Methodist, and became the father of three sons and two daughters who were educated in the colleges in Lucknow. One son became chief justice of the high court of Oudh and was knighted as Sir George Thomas. Two sons, Charles and Edward, entered the provincial civil service and rose to be district magistrates and collectors. A daughter became an inspectress of schools and married a distinguished surgeon. The other daughter became the wife of a convert from Islam who inherited a large estate and the title of Rajah. As Rani Sheba Nawab Ali, she was true to her Christian profession and is gratefully remembered for her philanthropies.

Weatherby supervised the building of a district parsonage in Conda. From Conda he went in 1873 to Pauri, GARHWAL, and during a stay of three months built and opened a dispensary which continued in valuable community service for over seventy years. He died on Sept. 2, 1924.

WEATHERFORD COLLEGE, Weatherford, Texas, was founded by the Masonic Lodge at the close of the Civil War. In 1884 the Weatherford Masonic Institute was renamed Cleveland College in honor of President Grover Cleveland. In 1889, Granbury College was moved to Weatherford, merged with Cleveland College, and chartered as Weatherford College.

In 1913 the college became the property of the CENTRAL TEXAS CONFERENCE of the Methodist Church, and in 1944 was merged with SOUTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY (Texas). Because of inability to secure adequate financial support, Southwestern University in 1949 deeded the Weatherford College properties, endowment, and loan funds to the Parker County (Texas) Junior College District formed for the purpose of operating Weatherford College as a tax-supported institution. It operates now as a public junior college.

WEATHERHEAD, LESLIE DIXON (1893-), British Methodist minister, son of a Scots Presbyterian, was born in London in 1893, and educated at Newton Secondary School, Leicester, RICHMOND THEOLOGICAL COLLEGE, Surrey, and London and Manchester Universities. During the first World War he served the British Armed Forces in India and Mesopotamia, first as an officer, then as a CHAPLAIN. In 1919 he was placed in charge of the English Methodist Church in Madras. Returning to England in 1922 he was stationed first at the Oxford Road Methodist Church, Manchester, whence he moved to an even more outstanding ministry at Leeds Brunswick (1925-36). Here he developed a clinic for psychotherapy by close co-operation between physicians, psychiatrists, and ministers of religion. The Methodist Conference then permitted him to serve the interdenominational City Temple, London (1936-60), of which he remains the Minister Emeritus. In 1955 he was elected President of the Methodist CONFERENCE. Through his teaching (especially in the field of psychology), preaching, and writing, he became one of the best known Methodists on the British scene, with an international reputation. Among many honors he was made a Freeman of the City of London, a Commander of the British Empire (1959), and President of the Institute of Religion and Medicine (1966). The best known of his many writings (of which thirty-five are listed in Who's Who) are probably The Transforming Friendship (1928), Psychology in the Service of the Soul (1929), Psychology and Life (1934), and Psychology, Religion, and Healing (1951).

WEAVER, CHARLES ANDERSON (1880-1956), American educator and lay missionary to BRAZIL, was born in Atlanta, Ga., on Oct. 13, 1880. Upon graduation from EMORY COLLEGE in 1900, he taught at WEAVERVILLE COLLEGE, and then at DAVENPORT COLLEGE, both in NORTH CAROLINA. There he met and married Margaret Umberger. Feeling the call to mission service, he applied to the Board of Missions (MES) and was sent to Brazil in 1911. His first appointment was to Colegio Uniao in URUGUAIANA, state of Rio Grande do Sul. There he served as professor, and then as Reitor (principal). In 1918 Mrs. Weaver died from childbirth complications. Weaver came to the United States with his four small children, arranged with relatives for their care, and returned to Brazil at the end of the year.

He was next appointed to Instituto GRANBERY, JUIZ DE FORA, remaining there as professor, then as Reitor. In 1927 he married Dona Eunice Gabbi (see EUNICE C. WEAVER), a young Methodist woman who had been educated in Methodist and other schools, and this proved a most happy and fruitful union.

In 1928 Weaver was granted a leave of absence from Granbery in order to accept an invitation to teach on a so-called "Floating University" that visited forty countries. Eunice Weaver accompanied him as a student. At the end of his term at Granbery, in 1934, Weaver served as superintendent of the Peoples' Institute (Instituto Central do Povo) in RIO DE JANEIRO, until 1939. In this interim, the family had been reunited, as Eunice Weaver made a home for the children.

Forced to retire from active work because of a crippling disease, he was able to help his wife on the long trips she had to make in behalf of her work for children of leprosy parents. Today—from the Amazon to Central and South Brazil—at least nine homes and libraries for these children are named in his honor.

Weaver died in Rio de Janeiro on Jan. 10, 1956. The city press honored him with splendid tributes. He was buried in the Gamboa (British) Cemetery.

WEAVER, CHARLES CLINTON (1875-1946), American minister, educator and Conference leader in Western NORTH CAROLINA, was born in Ashe County, N. C., June 21, 1875. His father, J. H. Weaver, had been a distinguished Methodist preacher and presiding elder.

He was received on trial in the WESTERN NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE in 1901. He received his education at Trinity College (now DUKE UNIVERSITY) and at Johns Hopkins (Ph.D.). Trinity College also bestowed a D.D. degree on him.

In 1901 he became president of Rutherford College, where he stayed until 1903 when he became president of DAVENPORT COLLEGE. In 1910 Weaver transferred to the HOLSTON CONFERENCE where he became president of EMORY and HENRY COLLEGE until 1920.

Returning to his home Conference in 1920, he served pastorates at Monroe (Central), WINSTON-SALEM (Centenary), ASHEVILLE (Central), CHARLOTTE (First) and as presiding elder or district superintendent of the Greensboro and Winston-Salem Districts.

In 1944 he became superintendent of the Hugh Chatham Memorial Hospital in Elkin, N. C., where he remained until his death Feb. 19, 1946. He was a member of the General Board of Missions, trustee of many institutions and a member of every GENERAL CONFERENCE between 1915 and 1944 except in 1926; he was a member of the 1939 UNITING CONFERENCE and the SOUTHEASTERN JURISDICTIONAL CONFERENCE of 1940 and 1944.

On June 18, 1902 he was married to Florence Stacy, who became the first president of the Western North Carolina Conference WOMAN'S SOCIETY OF CHRISTIAN SERVICE. Their four sons and one daughter have assumed active roles in North Carolina education and church life.

CHARLES D. WHITE

EUNICE GABBI WEAVER

WEAVER, EUNICE GABBI (1902-1969), Brazilian Methodist social worker, educator, organizer of national and international work in behalf of leprosy victims, was born on Sept. 20, 1902, in São Manuel (state of São Paulo). She received her education in Methodist schools in BUENOS AIRES, ARGENTINA, where her parents then lived; at Colegio União (URUGUAIANA, Brazil); and in PIRACICABA (São Paulo), where she graduated from the normal school, specializing in sanitation.

From earliest childhood, she had been shocked and grieved by the plight of begging lepers, and determined to give her life to their relief. In 1927 she married CHARLES ANDERSON WEAVER, a missionary of the Methodist Church, whose wife had died nine years previously. This proved a happy union and one which encouraged her to continue with her ideals. In 1925 the couple toured the world on a so-called "Floating University," he as teacher, she as student. Everywhere the ship anchored, Eunice Weaver inquired as to what was being done or could be done for lepers.

When they returned, Weaver was appointed superintendent of the Peoples' Central Institute (Instituto Central do Povo) in RIO DE JANEIRO. Mindful of the lepers' plight, Mrs. Weaver began work by organizing Brazilian women, whatever their religious affiliation—Catholic, Protestant, or spiritualist—into local societies for aiding leprosy victims. Since the Vargas administration was then establishing needed colonies for the segregation and treatment of lepers, Eunice Weaver concentrated on helping the still uncontaminated children and the families broken up by the "colonization" of parents. Leprous mothers, knowing of this service, turned over their newborn babies willingly to the care of the "homes." As this project expanded, it was aided financially by state and federal governments.

In 1935 Mrs. Weaver organized the locals into a National Federation of Societies, whose objective was caring for and educating the children for self-support, thus preventing them from becoming dangers to society as beggars, prostitutes, and criminals. She was director of the program from its inception. As knowledge of the work spread, she was invited by nine other Latin American countries to advise and help them organize the same type of work. In Brazil itself, there are now 168 societies in which some 18,000 women work as volunteers; and thirty homes that care for about 5,000 children.

In 1938 Brazil sent Eunice Weaver as its representative to the Cairo International Congress on Leprosy, where she was the only woman to read a paper before the scientists and missionaries. Later she was sent to a similar gathering in Havana, Cuba. In 1942 the Brazilian government sent her as its delegate to the Pan-American Child Congress in Washington. The U. S. Department of State invited her while there to speak before colleges and universities, and to observe social conditions in the States. This same year the government of Brazil listed her in its Book of the National Order of Merit, with the title of "Comendadora" given the first time to a woman. The radio program of Standard Oil also gave her its coveted "Honor to Merit" diploma and gold medal.

In 1956 she was the first woman not directly associated with the Brazilian Airforce (F.A.B.) to receive its Order of Aeronautical Merit. In 1963 she became the first Protestant to receive a bronze plaque with her name, from the Roman Catholic "Damien-Dutton" Society. And in July 1965, at the celebration of the fortieth anniversary of Rio de Janeiro's daily, O Globo, Eunice Weaver was one of forty outstanding citizens to be named as among the "notables" of the country.

In 1955 she lost her husband and great moral support, Anderson Weaver. She continued directing and expanding the work of the federation from its headquarters in Rio de Janeiro until her death from a heart attack Dec. 9, 1969, while supervising work in PORTO ALEGRE. She was buried in the Cambôa Cemetery in Rio.

WEAVER, JAMES B. (1833-1912), American political reformer, was born June 12, 1833, at Dayton, Ohio. The family in 1835 removed to Cassopolis, Mich., and from thence in 1843 to a quarter section in Davis County, Iowa, where Weaver attended school. From 1847 to 1851 he carried mail between Bloomfield and Fairfield and later worked in a store. In 1856 he graduated from Ohio State Law School, Cincinnati, and practiced law in Bloomfield. He served with the Second Iowa Infantry during the Civil War, and was brevetted brigadier-general March 13, 1865. General Weaver, in 1866, became district attorney of the Second Iowa Judicial District and was a federal assessor of internal revenue, 1867-73.

"Calamity Jim" Weaver, whose reform views blocked his Republican political advancement, was a Methodist Sunday school superintendent. In 1871 he spoke at the first State Methodist Convention, held at Iowa City, and was a General Conference delegate, 1876. Turning to the Greenback Party, he served in the U.S. House of Representatives, 1878-81, and was Greenback Party presidential candidate in 1880. From 1885-89 he was again in Congress, backed by the Democratic and Greenback-Labor parties.

Becoming identified with Farmers' Alliance, an agrarian reform movement which became the Populist Party, General Weaver was a presidential candidate again in 1892. Although defeated he received twenty-two electoral votes. From 1904-06 he was mayor of Colfax, Iowa, and died Feb. 6, 1912, at Des Moines, Iowa.

WEAVER, JONATHAN (1824-1901), American UNITED BRETHREN bishop, was born Feb. 23, 1824, in Carroll County, Ohio. Although his parents were strict on such matters as the observance of the Sabbath and his mother was diligent in giving spiritual guidance, young Jonathan Weaver never attended a Sunday religious service until he was fourteen, as there were no churches in the vicinity of the Weaver's frontier home. Whenever Methodist or United Brethren ministers came to the area, they held meetings in private homes, usually on week nights.

At the age of seventeen, Jonathan was converted at a camp meeting; but he feared how his father might react since he was not a professing Christian. He was joyfully surprised when his father urged him to stick with his decision, and shortly thereafter he was influential in bringing his entire family to Christ. Several other members of his family later went into Christian service.

Jonathan had no sudden impulse to enter the ministry and when he started to give thought to the matter, he feared that his meager education would be a hindrance. The concern about his own lack of education prompted him to campaign in later years for an educated ministry and in support of the movement to establish colleges. He spent seven years as soliciting agent for OTTERBEIN UNIVERSITY (now Otterbein College), the first such institution of the Church of the United Brethren in Christ, founded at Westerville, Ohio, in 1847. He succeeded his older brother Solomon, who played a prominent role in the establishing of two other United Brethren colleges.

Ordained in 1848, Jonathan Weaver soon established himself as a strong and noted preacher, but he was so serious about his work that he was always disappointed with the results. He gained a reputation as a writer for the Religious Telescope; but in 1865, his supporters failed to have him elected as its editor. However, the same GENERAL CONFERENCE that failed to elect him editor turned about and elected him bishop, a position he held until 1893.

During his tenure as bishop, Jonathan Weaver was identified with the liberalizing tendencies within the denomination. Most significant of all was his gradual change from an anti-secret society position to the pro side of the debate. His numerous books and pamphlets helped to mold the organization and doctrinal position of the church. Death came to him Feb. 6, 1901, and he was buried in the Woodland Cemetery, Dayton, Ohio.,

WEAVER COLLEGE, Weaverville, N. C., known as "Weaverville College," "Weaverville Male College," and after

1912 as "Weaver College," was chartered as an independent co-educational college on Dec. 7, 1873, and deeded in 1883 to the WESTERN NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE of the M.E. CHURCH, SOUTH. A local academy in Weaverville had been destroyed by fire in 1873, and the citizens decided not only to rebuild it but to expand its program into a college. Montraville Weaver gave the ground on which the first building, the Administration Building, was located. A second tract of land was donated by R. W. Pickens. Eventually the campus covered fifty-five acres. For a number of years the college conferred the B.A., B.S., and M.A. degrees. However, the M.A. degree was not offered after 1896 and after the school became a junior college in 1912 no degrees were granted. From 1912-34 the academic program consisted of two years of high school and two years of college work. Membership in the various literary societies was compulsory. No tuition charges were made to itinerant preachers or their children. An Alumni Association was established in 1915.

J. A. Reagan, M.D., was the first of a number of men who served as president of Weaver College. In the summers of 1923 and 1924 the Board of Young People's Work of the NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE of the M.P. CHURCH held ten-day Young People's Conferences at Weaver College. In 1934 the Western North Carolina Conference of the M.E. Church, South, merged Weaver College, Rutherford College and Brevard Institute into the present-day BREVARD COLLEGE.

WEAVIND, GEORGE (1850-1916), WESLEYAN METHODIST missionary in the TRANSVAAL, SOUTH AFRICA, was born at Worcester, England, on April 13, 1850, and was sent to the 'Vaal River Mission' in 1873. He learned to speak Dutch, became a burgher (citizen) of the Republic and married Wilhelmina van Boeschoten, sister of the then secretary of the Transvaal Republic, on May 12, 1875. This gave him an understanding of and sympathy with the Boers which helped to establish good relations between the mission and the civil authorities.

Weavind erected the first Methodist church in PRETORIA and became secretary of Synod when the Transvaal and Swaziland district of the British Conference was constituted in 1881. When ill-health compelled OWEN WATKINS to relinquish the chairmanship in 1892, Weavind took his place and continued in office until 1901. He established a Training Institution at Potchefstroom. This was later moved to Kilnerton and Weavind served as Governor from 1892 to 1901. From 1889 to 1892 he superintended the rapidly developing work in Johannesburg and along the Witwatersrand. In addition he served at Mafeking (1902-03), Krugersdorp (1905-06), and among the African and Cape Colored people of Pretoria (1907-16). Weavind was dedicated to his work and combined a flair for administration with a simple piety. He died in Pretoria on May 16, 1916.

After serving in churches in Johannesburg and PRETORIA, he began his twenty-year ministry at the Methodist Central Hall, Johannesburg in 1942. He became the best-known clergyman in SOUTH AFRICA through his preaching, broadcasting, public speaking and writing, and was elected president of the Methodist Conference of South Africa in 1949, 1954 and 1961, the only minister ever to serve as president three times. THOMAS WEBB

WEBB, ("CAPTAIN") THOMAS (1724-1796), was a lay pioneer of American Methodism. Enlisting in 1744 in the Forty-eighth Regiment of Foot, he went to America in 1755 and lost an eye in 1759, while serving with Wolfe in Quebec. Webb married Mary Arding of New York in 1760.

Captain Webb's life in America was not without colorful interest. He was sent to Albany, N. Y., about 1764 and put in charge of the barracks, and then hearing of a Methodist society being organized in New York paid it an early visit. The few persons assembled in PHILIP EMBURY's house were astonished and alarmed to see a British officer in uniform enter their room, but they were agreeably surprised when he made known to them that he was himself a Methodist, who had been converted in England, meeting WESLEY in BRISTOL, and had been licensed to preach. He became for a time their most active preacher and was a leading spirit in obtaining the site for the JOHN STREET CHURCH, heading the subscription with thirty pounds, which was then the largest amount contributed by any individual. During the building of the church, he visited PHILADELPHIA where he organized a Methodist society and collected thirty-two pounds to aid the church building in New York. In 1769 he helped JOSEPH PILMORE and the society in Philadelphia to purchase ST. GEORGE'S CHURCH, and contributed largely also to this. He extended his effort upon Long Island and to many places in NEW JERSEY and DELAWARE and also visited BALTIMORE.

He began to preach, always with a drawn sword laid across the pulpit, and to form societies, particularly in New Jersey, PENNSYLVANIA, and Delaware. During a second visit to England, 1772-3, he begged the Leeds Conference to succor the American work, and he married his second wife, Grace Gilbert of ANTIGUA.

He endeavored to get JOSEPH BENSON to come to America, but failing in this, he came back with THOMAS RANKIN and Mr. Yearby.

John Wesley said of him in writing to a friend in Limerick, "Captain Webb is now in Dublin—invite him to Limerick; he is a man of fire and the power of God constantly attends his word." Charles Wesley, always a bit more careful than John, did not regard the Captain so favorably, saying that "he is an inexperienced, honest, zealous, loving enthusiast." But in 1774, John Adams, the patriot of MASSACHUSETTS, heard him preach in St. George's, and gave this account, "In the evening I went to the Methodist meeting, and heard Mr. Webb, the old soldier, who first came to America in the character of a quartermaster under General Braddock. He is one of the most fluent, eloquent men I have ever heard." (Simpson, Cyclopaedia.) Although a prisoner of war as a Loyalist for a time early in the American Revolution, Webb managed to get back to England and built the Portland Chapel in Bristol at his own expense. He was not a thorough scholar, but was in the habit of using the Greek Testament, and before leaving America he gave his copy to a brother minister, and it subsequently came into the possession of Bishop LEVI SCOTT. MATTHEW SIMPSON comments upon Webb, "He well deserved the title of the first Apostle of Methodism in America."

In 1783 he settled in Bristol, where he died on Dec. 20, 1796. He is buried in Portland Chapel, which he helped to build.

WEBB, WILLIAM ROBERT (1842-1926), American educator and for a time U. S. Senator from TENNESSEE, was born Nov. 11, 1842, in Person County, N. C., the son of Alex Smith and Cornelia Adeline Stanford Webb. He entered the University of North Carolina but his schooling was interrupted by the Civil War. After the war he received the B.A. degree in 1869. He married Emma Clay in 1873 and to them were born eleven children.

Young Webb enlisted in the Confederate Army in 1861 and took part in the battles of Seven Pines, Savage Station, Malvern Hill, where he was wounded, and on recovery became adjutant of Company K, North Carolina Cavalry. He fought at Spottsylvania Courthouse, Yellow Tavern, Five Forks. He was captured at Amelia Cross Roads, and for a time was a prisoner at Harts Island, N. Y.

Returning to Tennessee he organized the Webb School at Bell Buckle and in this school was destined to make for himself a national reputation. His service as a teacher really extended over a period of sixty years, the last fifty-six of which at Bell Buckle were spent within the bounds of the TENNESSEE CONFERENCE.

The Webb School at Bell Buckle became known at an early date for the strictness of its discipline, and the thoroughness of its scholastic training in all the disciplines of life. So strict was the discipline and so successful those who graduated from the school, that Bell Buckle for a time was considered a school for incorrigibles—which it was not—though many a difficult youth "found himself" there. Webb's discipline was strict but always just. The one thing he would never tolerate was falsehood or deceit—one who lied to him or his fellows, being dismissed at once. "What Thomas Arnold was to England, that William R. Webb was to the Southland," stated W. F. TILLET, in a formal memoir read to and published in the minutes of the Tennessee Conference at Webb's death.

Among the pupils and graduates of the Webb School were such church leaders as E. B. CHAPPELL, W. W. PINSON, John E. Harrison, W. H. Hlyce, J. K. Lee, George L. Beals, George A. Morgan, W. K. Matthews, Berry J. Duncan, R. R. Paty, J. T. Curry, CLOVIS CHAPPELL, C. A. Waterfield, F. F. Shannon and Josiah Sibley.

For a time under gubernatorial appointment, Webb served as U. S. Senator from Tennessee, Jan. 24—March 4, 1931. A layman, he enjoyed enormous influence within the Tennessee Conference. He died in Bell Buckle on Dec. 19, 1926.

WEBSTER, THOMAS (1809-1901), Canadian minister, was born in Wicklow County, Ireland, Oct. 24, 1809. In 1812 he moved with his family, first to New York, and then to a pioneer farm near London, Upper CANADA. There his family reestablished their Methodist connections, and his aspirations soon turned toward the ministry.

At this point (1838), the M.E. Church was being rebuilt in the wake of the 1833 union. Webster identified himself with that body, and in 1838 was taken on trial. He was ordained ELDER in 1842 and preached thereafter on many circuits in Ontario.

As were his rivals, EGERTON RYERSON and JOHN CARROLL, THOMAS WEBSTER was keenly interested in religious journalism. He was one of the founders of the Canada Christian Advocate, the newspaper of the M.E. Church, and its editor for several years. He is better known, however, for his History of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Canada (1870), and for his Life of Reverend James Richardson (1876). The history is a useful but scarcely impartial work. It reflects very accurately the animosities which bedeviled the Wesleyan-Methodist Episcopal relationship until shortly before the union of 1884. In contrast, the biography of Bishop RICHARDSON embodies the understanding and respect of one of his close associates.

Webster was a PRESIDING ELDER for many years, a senator of ALBERT COLLEGE, and regularly a delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCES of his church. He received a D.D. from ILLINOIS WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY.

Shortly after the union, which he reluctantly accepted, Webster retired from the active ministry. He died in Newbury, Ontario, May 2, 1901. His brethren remembered him affectionately as a saintly man who had labored faithfully for the honor and welfare of his church.

WEDGWOOD, JOSIAH (1730-1795), famous British potter and creator of the Wedgwood china, was born in Burslem in Staffordshire; and his daughter Susannah was the mother of Charles Darwin, the naturalist. The Wedgwood potteries produced a valuable black basalt bust of JOHN WESLEY and the well-known teapot which is preserved in Wesley's house on City Road, London. The teapot has the Wesley graces written by John Cennick. The design is said to have been copied from Wedgwood's wife's apron and is called "calico" or "Wesley Wedgwood." It is still used by the company.

WEED, BARTHOLOMEW (1793-1879), American pioneer preacher, was born March 6, 1793, in Danbury, Conn. He was trained as a Calvinist, but joined the Methodists at the age of eighteen. During the early years of his ministry, it is recorded, he preached at a camp meeting on the Stony Ground, near Flemington, N. J. He was received into the PHILADELPHIA CONFERENCE in 1817.

Weed transferred to the ILLINOIS CONFERENCE in September 1837, and served Galena District (a work including the Iowa work north of the Iowa River) as PRESIDING ELDER in 1837 and 1838. He was assigned to be the pastor of the Iowa City work in 1839 and organized that church in 1840, after Joseph L. Kirkpatrick of Iowa River Mission held the first religious services in Iowa City in 1839.

When the Iowa District was divided in 1840, Weed became presiding elder of Dubuque District, ROCK RIVER CONFERENCE, and traveled that territory for three years. He became presiding elder of Burlington District in 1843, serving this work for two years. While still a member of Rock River Conference he was elected as delegate to the historic GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1844. Weed was one of the presiding elders at the organization of the IOWA CONFERENCE and an original member of its first session in 1844.

Weed transferred to the NEW JERSEY CONFERENCE in 1845. His last years were spent in the NEWARK CONFERENCE, where he superannuated in 1864. The last seven years of his life were spent as chaplain of the Essex County jail. He died in Newark, N. J., on Jan. 5, 1879.

WEEKLEY, WILLIAM MARION (1851-1926), American United Brethren bishop, was born five miles from Centerville, Va. (now WEST VIRGINIA). His parental home was the stopping place for both preachers and worshippers. As a lad, he had major church responsibilities and felt the call to the ministry. Beginning in 1870 in the Parkersburg Conference, CHURCH OF THE UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST, he served as a circuit rider among scattered people over the rough, hilly roads of West Virginia. He married Rosa L. Wilson in 1875.

In 1878 he was elected presiding elder (later called Conference Superintendent). A walk of twenty-five miles to visit some of his churches was not unusual. He limited his service in "the eldership" to four years, as he believed that long terms for presiding elders were inadvisable.

From 1882-84, he was pastor of the church in Parkersburg, W. Va., during which time his wife died. In June 1885, he married Miss Emma Gibson. A few months later he was again elected presiding elder and served four years followed by a pastorate at Buckhannon, W. Va., for one year. Pressure from general church leaders led him to transfer to the Rock River Conference (U.B.) in northern ILLINOIS, where his assistance was needed to strengthen that conference as it had been severely weakened by the church schism of 1889. From 1892-95, he was presiding elder. Then in 1895 he became General Secretary of the Church Election Board and had phenomenal success during his ten years in office.

He was elected bishop in 1905 at TOPEKA, Kan., and was assigned to the Western District of the United States, headquarters at DES MOINES, Iowa for a time and later at Kansas City, Mo.

Despite impaired health much of his life William Weekley had wide interests and whole-hearted commitment to the work of his Church. In 1913 he was transferred to the Eastern District. He requested retirement as bishop in 1917, but he did accept the office of Superintendent of Evangelism and traveled constantly until 1921.

Bishop Weekley wrote several books: Twenty Years on Horseback; Getting and Giving, and From Life to Life. With BISHOP H. H. FOUT he produced a two-volume set of biographies entitled Our Heroes.

A dynamic leader, he died June 8, 1926, at his home in Parkersburg, W. Va. Interment was in the Odd Fellows Mausoleum, Parkersburg.

Change in conference boundaries made him a member of the TEXAS CONFERENCE, and by transfers he became a member of the WEST TEXAS CONFERENCE, 1904; the NORTHWEST TEXAS, 1915; the OKLAHOMA, 1926; and the NORTH TEXAS, 1928. Appointments were Augusta Circuit, 1891-93; Center Station, 1894-97; Rusk Station, 1898; First Church, Marshall, 1899; San Augustine district, 1900-02; Central Church, GALVESTON, 1903; Marlin, 1904; West End, SAN ANTONIO, 1905-06; San Antonio district, 1907-10; Superintendent, Home Missions for Texas and NEW MEXICO, 1911-12; First Church, SAN ANGELO, 1913-14; Yoakum, 1915; Clarendon, 1916-17; Stamford district, 1917-18; Editor, Texas Christian Advocate, 1919-22; Editor, Missionary Literature of General Board PUBLICATIONS, M.E. He was a delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCE (MES) of 1902 and 1910; the ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCE, LONDON, England, 1921; the sixth Ecumenical Conference, 1931, being secretary of that conference till his death. He was also a delegate to the Universal Conference on Life and Work, STOCKHOLM, Sweden, 1925. He was a member of the JUDICIAL COUNCIL (MES) from 1934 to 1939.

Bishop H. A. Boaz said of Weeks, "He was unlike anyone I ever knew, a man of unique personality, being in a class to himself. He had an unusual mind. He was a clear thinker, a close observer, and a student of human nature. He was a man of worldwide vision, interested in everything that concerned the Christian church over the world." His piercing sense of humor and his unstinted devotion to all good things in all areas of the human scene endeared him to all who knew him.

WEEKS, HARRY HANSON (1877-1962), was a M.E. missionary in INDIA from 1907 until the achievement of union made him a minister of the Methodist Church in Southern Asia. He was born in the coastal village of Vik, in Helgeland, NORWAY, and was known as Harry Hanson. Migrating to the United States in 1893, he joined relatives in a part of SOUTH DAKOTA where Scandinavians predominated. There were so many Harry Hansons that he added his birthplace to his name, and Vik was soon changed to "Week." His school fellows called him "seven days." Another change made him "Weak," and the lads called him "strong man" (he was tall, big and strong). A fourth and last change made him Harry Hanson Weeks. Before that time another HARRY HANSON had joined his annual conference in India.

He graduated from DAKOTA WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY in 1907 and went to India. On furlough he earned the M.A. degree from NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY. In 1925 Dakota Wesleyan conferred on him the honorary D.D. degree.

His appointments included: principal, Boys' Vocational School, Lodhipur, Shahjahanpur; superintendent, BAREILLY, Shahjahanpur, GARHWAL, Bijnor, and Moradabad Districts; and principal and manager of the Messmore

High School at Pauri. For outstanding service in the Messmore School and to the public welfare he was honored by the British king with the coveted Kaiser-i-Hind Gold Medal. He retired in 1944 and died in 1962.

WEEMS, CLARENCE NORWOOD (1875-1952), American missionary to KOREA, was born in Oostanula, Gordon Co., Ga., on Feb. 18, 1875. He graduated from the University of Arkansas in 1899, and received the M.A. degree from EMORY UNIVERSITY in 1925. At an early age, Weems felt a call to religious work and after ten years of teaching in ARKANSAS and KENTUCKY entered missionary service.

He was appointed to Korea in 1909, where he served for thirty-two years. His first assignment was to Songo where he was in charge of educational work as well as serving either as district missionary or district superintendent. In 1933 he was transferred to Wonsan to continue the same activities, "a career district superintendent," until retirement. Especially active in the training of preachers in Korea as well as America, he had an unusual record in the number of promising young men sent to the United States for further study.

Weems was a member of both the Korea and NORTH GEORGIA CONFERENCE. He was a member of the Commission of Twenty appointed to draft plans for organization of the Korean Methodist Church in 1930. Three of his four sons served in Korea, with either the U. S. Armed Forces, or the U. S. State Department, and the fourth was a missionary to Korea until he retired for family health reasons.

Clarence N. Weems officially retired in 1941 and died in Decatur, Ga., Feb. 26, 1952.

WELLINGTON, New Zealand. Wesley Church, Taranaki Street, has had an honored history. Methodism's witness in Wellington began among the Maoris who had settled there before the first immigrants arrived.

On the first immigrant ships there were many Methodists, and services were soon commenced: first probably in a cottage, and then in a large Maori meeting house. Here John Aldred, the first resident minister, met his congregations. Later the people met in a Maori church, but this was blown down in a gale. The congregation then gathered in "the Exchange" until a small weatherboard church, twenty-two by sixteen feet, was built. This building was enlarged to hold 130 people. In 1843 it was replaced by a brick church seating 300, but in 1848 it was destroyed in a tremendous earthquake. The new church was opened in February, 1850, and for eighteen years this was well filled. In 1868, a handsome church was opened in Manners Street, but eleven years later, a fire, originating in the opera house opposite, spread to the church which was destroyed. WILLIAM KIRK and his officials thereupon bought an acre of land nearby in Taranaki Street for £3,000; and in March, 1880, the new church, largest in NEW ZEALAND, was opened. It seated 1,200 people. An organ costing £600 was built, and the debt on the property was £6,000. Part of the Manners Street land was sold to help pay off this debt, and the rest of the land was leased. For many years the congregation filled the large church, which still houses a thriving work. A complete modernization of the church interior was undertaken in the early 1960's, and the site was greatly improved by the city's street-widening program.

In 1882, a schoolhouse with a large central hall and seventeen class rooms were built behind the church. The cost was £1,200, raised largely by the teachers themselves. In 1898 a large infant school to hold 250 children was built for £460. At this time the total school roll was about 800.

The first parsonage was built of raupo reed. A weatherboard house in Manners Street replaced it, and in 1865 a new two-story house was built on the same site. Ten years later a commodious house was bought on "The Terrace" and in 1882, it was sold to help build a large house next to the Taranaki Street Church. The cost was £1,100.

The present parsonage in Macfarlane Street was built in 1913 for £1,500, and the former parsonage was leased as a boarding house. Later still, it became a hostel, but was demolished in 1965.

Wesley Church Social Services Trust Board, Inc., was formed in 1949 to administer all social services undertaken by the central Wesley Church in the city on Taranaki Street. These include:

Wesleyhaven Eventide Homes Settlement. In 1949, Mr. and Mrs. W. T. Strand gave the Methodist church about 150 acres of land for the specific purpose of establishing an Eventide Homes Settlement. The first buildings erected were a block of service flats including eight self-contained private villas, nurses quarters and charge room, a superintendent's cottage, and a settlement kitchen. With the necessary road construction and other expenses, the cost was approximately £60,000, the state providing nearly half by way of subsidy. These buildings provide accommodation for thirty elderly people. In 1957 negotiations took place with the Deckston Hebrew Trust for a Jewish accommodation block as a unit within Wesleyhaven. Since then the ladies' auxiliary of the Associated Churches of Christ have also provided a villa on the same terms. Expansion of the settlement is still going on and provides a permanent service for the elderly folk of Wellington.

Epworth House. This hostel was opened in February, 1959, for young women. It accommodates twenty-one boarders and a matron. Costing only £11,000, it is claimed as one of the finest hostels in the city.

Church House. In 1953, the old parsonage next door to Wesley Church, which for over thirty years had been leased as a boardinghouse, became available to a group of twelve young men of the church, who lived there on a community basis. The building was demolished in 1965.

In 1966 careful thought was being given to ways in which the work of the trust board might best be integrated into the general work of the Central Districts Methodist Social Services Association.

WELLINGTON (New Zealand) CHARITABLE AND EDUCATIONAL ENDOWMENT was originally a trust founded for educational purposes. After the Maori Wars, it was decided to establish four institutions in the North Island for the education of Maori children under the care of the Wesleyan Church. Three were actually opened near AUCKLAND, New Plymouth, and Wanganui. In 1852 George Grey, the governor, conveyed seventy-three acres of the town lands of Wellington to the Wesleyan Church "for the instruction of our subjects of all races, and of children of other poor and destitute persons being inhabitants of islands in the Pacific Ocean."

However, it was found impossible to begin a school in Wellington. The seventy-three acres produced no revenue. The Maori population near the city steadily declined. Land disputes led to unsettlement, and ultimately, in 1865, the government took seventy of the acres for botanical gardens and a recreation reserve. The remaining three acres were then let for residential purposes. About £4,228 was received, and some of it was used to buy land in the Manawatu area, and later near Wellington. In 1872 a day school was opened in Dixon Street, but in 1879 it burned down, and the work was carried on in a building rented from the Central Wesleyan Church.

In time the education work was centered in kindergarten schools, but first one and then another was closed because of decreased attendance. In 1921 an orphanage was opened at Masterton, called Homeleigh, and year by year the board of the endowment has assisted in its maintenance.

In 1940, the board began to make an annual grant toward the Rangiatea Maori Girls' Hostel at New Plymouth, of the Home and Maori Mission Department. The board's present policy is to divide its net revenue equally between the Masterton home and the New Plymouth hostel. The assets of the board in 1966 exceeded £100,000.

WELLS, ELIZABETH JEANNE (1877-1941), began in 1901 a notable career of missionary service in India. She was born May 20, 1877, at Pleasant Hills, Iowa. Her father was a farmer. She was converted at the age of nine and joined the church the same year. With the hope of becoming a missionary, at home or abroad, she entered Missouri Wesleyan College at Cameron, Mo., and before her graduation decided for India. After receiving the B.S. degree, she went to the Chicago Training School. In March 1901, she was appointed to India by the Des Moines branch of the WOMAN'S FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY. Her first responsibility was as superintendent of the orphanage in the Methodist Girls' School at HYDERABAD. Later she served as principal of a girls' primary school at Vikarabad and lifted its boarding school enrollment from twelve to 100.

She was very versatile. One year she vaccinated 150 persons. She was a zealous evangelist, often going into villages to make friends with all classes of people and to bear witness about Christ. She studied the abilities of her girls and guided many of them into activities and studies in which they became highly proficient.

In her later years she started a school in rural surroundings near Hyderabad in the hope that it might help improve rural homes and farms. After some years the school was moved to Zahirabad, where it has become highly successful in her declared aims. She died July 15, 1941.

WELLS, JOSEPH (1798-date of death uncertain), American M.P. layman of Wellsville, Ohio, served his church as trustee, class-leader, steward, delegate to numerous ANNUAL CONFERENCES, four GENERAL CONFERENCES and two conventions of his denomination. He was born on March 21, 1798, in Washington County, Pa., but he spent most of his life in Wellsville, Ohio, which was named for his family. A M.P. CHURCH was organized in his home by George Brown in 1829 and the church was thereafter affectionately known as "Uncle Josey's Church." For seven years prior to the establishment of this church he lived in the community but refused to unite with the M.E. CHURCH of which his relatives were members. He was liberal in his gifts to the church and its interests and is remembered as a pioneer layman in the M.P. Church.

WELLS, JOSHUA (1764-1862), American minister, was born in Maryland, Dec. 6, 1764. He joined the M.E. CHURCH in 1787 and entered its BALTIMORE CONFERENCE in 1789. During the deistic decade and ministerial shortage after 1790, he became a trusted elder who was shifted by Bishop ASBURY to fill strategic stations at NEW YORK, BOSTON, BALTIMORE, PHILADELPHIA, and WILMINGTON, Del. From the latter place he was assigned to Wilmington, N. C., thence he came back to the Baltimore Conference where he married a widow, Mrs. Eve Reinicker, in 1812. He was superannuated in 1821, but continued to be a delegate to GENERAL CONFERENCES, serving altogether in nine of them—1800-32. During the 1820 General Conference, Wells, WILLIAM CAPERS, S. G. ROSZEL and Bishop ENOCH GEORGE attempted to work out a compromise over the question of the elective PRESIDING ELDERSHIP. After a prolonged debility, Wells died in Baltimore, Jan. 25, 1862.

WELSH ASSEMBLY. (See Wales.)

WELSH CALVINISTIC METHODISM. Perhaps even more than England, Wales was spiritually dead at the beginning of the eighteenth century, in spite of an occasional exception like GRIFFITH JONES, rector of Llanddowror. A new warmth of evangelism was introduced by the conversion in 1735 of HOWELL HARRIS, a young layman of Trevecka, Brecknockshire, who soon began to exhort his neighbors to flee from the wrath to come, with rapidly increasing success. Simultaneously a young clergyman, DANIEL ROWLANDS, was converted, and began an evangelical ministry in Llangeitho, Cardiganshire. Under their ministry others were converted and began to preach in their own area and to itinerate in the surrounding countryside, especially HOWELL DAVIES in Pembrokeshire, WILLIAM WILLIAMS of Pantycelyn, Carmarthenshire (author of "Guide me, O thou great Jehovah"), and Peter Williams, also of Carmarthenshire.

In 1742 this group assembled at Watford for their first "Association," inviting GEORGE WHITEFIELD, who had already expressed his sympathy to Harris, to preside. National and regional Associations continued to be held both annually and quarterly, presaging the annual CONFERENCE and the QUARTERLY MEETING so important in Wesley's Methodism. In spite of the theological differences between them the Wesleys wished the Welsh Calvinistic Methodists well, and co-operated with them as far as possible, especially through their itinerant spokesman, Howell Harris. Like the Wesleys, they too were members of the Church of England, whose hope it was that they might bring about a spiritual awakening within that church; indeed they owed the title "Methodist" to this fact. They also formed local societies under the pastoral oversight of lay "overseers," "exhorters," and "stewards." These societies at first met in private houses, but later in special meeting places, in which the Lord's Supper was administered by Methodist clergy. Like the English Methodists they too were subjected to persecution by hooligans, mobs, and unfriendly clergy. In spite of the similarities, however, there was relatively very little contact with Wesley's Methodists, and no official connection.

A struggle for leadership between Rowlands and Harris, exacerbated by a period of mental instability through which the latter passed, brought about a temporary disruption in 1750. Harris himself retired to Trevecka, where he organized an experimental religious community known as the "Family," which secured the support of the COUNTESS OF HUNTINGDON, and by 1755 had grown to over a hundred members, with fifty more in neighbouring farms. By 1760 Harris had returned to his preaching itinerancy, but his "Family" survived him for almost seventy years, though their links with Welsh Calvinistic Methodism were very slender. In 1763 Harris and Rowlands were reconciled, though Harris was not able to reconcile himself to the growing independence from the Church of England of Rowlands' supporters, no more than they took kindly to the monastic tendencies of Harris's "Family," nor of his friendliness with the Wesleys and the Moravians.

The reconciliation of Rowlands and Harris coincided with a new burst of revivalism after a dry decade, and Welsh Calvinistic Methodism continued to experience recurring waves of revival. Their great leader during the latter half of the eighteenth century was THOMAS CHARLES of Bala, again an Anglican clergyman who strove to keep the Methodists within the fold of the Church of England. In 1801, however, he drew up for them "The Rules and Purposes of the Special Societies among the People called Methodists in Wales," and a virtual separation took place in 1811 with his ordination of eight lay preachers, though like Wesley he continued to hope that declared separation might be avoided. In 1826 the pious fiction was dispelled by the enrolment in the High Court of Chancery of a "Constitutional Deed declaratory of the Objects and Regulations of the Welsh Calvinistic Methodist Connexion."

In 1842 the Welsh Calvinistic Methodists were invited to consider union with the Presbyterian Church in England, as their polity was in fact presbyterian. A fraternal relationship developed which led to their eventually adopting the title "Presbyterian Church of Wales," even though they retained their autonomy and continued to use the older name as a kind of sub-title. Because of this affiliation they did not become linked with the ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCE as it was nor its successor the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL.

In the closing decade of the eighteenth century Welsh emigrants brought the denomination to America, their first official church being "Penycraenau" in Oneida County, New York, organized in 1824. From this they spread to most areas in the nation, though their numbers remained comparatively small. Fraternal relations with Presbyterianism developed in America along similar lines to those in Wales, and in 1920 the Welsh Calvinistic Methodist Church was officially incorporated with the Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A.

From the beginning the Welsh Calvinistic Methodists supported the work of the London Missionary Society, and in 1840 sent their own missionaries to Assam and Brittany. Their Indian missions, which far surpassed the French in importance and permanence, though remaining small, are now incorporated in the United Church of North India.

The total community of the church in Wales is now approaching 200,000.

WEMBO-NYAMA, CHIEF (?-1940), a chief of the Atetela in the heart of the Congo in Central Africa, who proved to be a friend and supporter of Methodist missions. The Congo Free State was established in 1876 and the Atetela helped the Belgians drive out the Arabs in 1893. Chief Wembo-Nyama was commissioned to enforce the rubber tax and took wives and slaves. The Free State became the Belgian Congo in 1910, cannibalism was outlawed, and the slaves returned home in 1912.

Bishop WALTER LAMBUTH of the M.E. CHURCH, SOUTH selected as a mission site Wembo-Nyama's village, and with JOHN GILBERT, an American Negro, visited there in 1912. Chief Wembo-Nyama seemed pleased to have a mission established among his people, and Bishop Lambuth explained that it would take him at least a year and a half to go back to America and obtain the necessary supplies and personnel and to return. As Lambuth was leaving the Chief took the Bishop to a certain tree in his village and said that he would cut a notch in that tree at each full moon, and that when eighteen notches had been cut, he would expect the Bishop back. Lambuth agreed, and in spite of difficulties, made it back in time to establish what continues today as a strong mission station.

Chief Wembo-Nyama was also instrumental in encouraging the missionaries in the development of a written language, and the missionaries in time saw that a dictionary and the Sunday school lessons were printed. By 1935 the New Testament had been translated.

The Wembo-Nyama mission celebrated its Silver Jubilee Year in 1939, at which time there were thirty-four missionaries, 192 native preachers, 290 churches, 5,760 members, 3,178 probationers, ninety-eight women's societies, 186 schools, 7,561 students, 232 native teachers, 149 girls homes, three hospitals, 115,372 dispensary patients, 417 major operations, 548 lepers. Beside Wembo-Nyama there was Tunda, Minga and Lodja, comprising this part of the mission field. There were ninety-one Bible schools and twenty-one normal school graduates.

The bishops of the Southern Methodist Church greatly appreciated the help of Chief Wembo-Nyama, who lived to see the mission's Jubilee Year celebrated. Bishop JAMES CANNON gave the Chief a gold watch in 1922, Bishop ARTHUR MOORE a bicycle in 1936, and also an engraved bronze medal was presented him on behalf of the Board of Missions of the M.E. Church, South, in 1939. Wembo-Nyama died in 1940, leaving twelve wives and twenty-three children. One of the young men of this mission, JOHN SHUNGU, was elected the first bishop of African descent in The United Methodist Church and continues to serve.

WERREY, MARY ANN (c. 1801-1825), was a British BIBLE CHRISTIAN itinerant preacher. Nothing is known of her origins, but she was received into connection in 1820, and in the next three years she evangelized the Isles of Scilly, Guernsey, and Jersey, establishing societies and winning many converts. In Jersey she was called in a remarkable dream to preach in Scotland. Taking ship to Blyth, she preached for some months in Northumberland, suffering greatly from starvation and incipient tuberculosis, but never sparing herself. She was finally given hospitality by the Barwick family, who took her to Scotland. She preached in Edinburgh in May, 1825, but her last days, like her first, are mystery.

WESLEY, ANNE ("NANCY") (1702-1742), sister of JOHN and CHARLES WESLEY is less known than any other of the Epworth family, but she was somewhat unique among the sisters in enjoying a happy married life. John Lambert, whom she married in 1725, was a highly respected land surveyor, and her choice was approved both by her father and mother. Her brother Samuel was so pleased that he sent a poem, "To My Sister Lambert on Her Marriage." At least one son was born, and John Wesley stood sponsor at his baptism in 1726. The boy received a legacy of a hundred pounds under the will of Matthew Wesley, but it is probable that he died before reaching manhood, and that branch of the family became extinct.

John Wesley was on happy terms with Anne and her husband, and not only wrote from time to time but also looked upon her home "as a resting place" where he could look at "loving faces and be at ease." The familiarity of these visits is seen from the fact that he would call in the early morning or the afternoon or in the evening for dinner. On one occasion in January, 1742, John was ill and had numerous visitors, and the Foundry "bands" met around his bedside. He asked Anne, who was present, if she was not offended; "Offended," she said, "I wish I could always be with you. I thought I was in heaven." (Journal, Jan. 1, 1742) She had close connection with the work at the Foundry, and she was there when her mother died. The date of her death is unknown, but the absence of any reference to her by either John or Charles after 1742 suggests that she died shortly afterward.

There are indications that her husband drank too heavily. Charles Wesley wrote in his Journal on November, 1738.

This evening my brothers Lambert and Wright visited me. The latter has corrupted the former, after all the pains I had taken with him, and brought him back to drinking: I was full yet could not speak, prayed for meekness, and then set before Wright the things that he had done in the devil's name towards reconverting a soul to him. He left us abruptly, I encouraged poor Lambert to turn again to God.

Lambert was, however, a better character and far more intelligent than William Wright, and his drinking habits do not appear to have shadowed his married life.

WESLEY, ARTHUR FREDERICK (1855-), American bishop and missionary, was born at North Branch, Mich., on Oct. 26, 1855, the son of Frederick Newton and Elizabeth Louise (Melvin) Wesley. From ALBION COLLEGE he received the A.B. degree in 1913, the D.D. in 1933, and did post graduate work at GARRETT THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, 1914-15. From Northern Baptist Theological Seminary he received the S.T.B. degree in 1916, the Th.D. in 1921, and from the University of Michigan, the M.A., 1925.

On Aug. 20, 1908, he married Grace Margaret Shaw, and their children are Harriet Elizabeth (Mrs. Herbert C. Garland), Donald Charles, Louise Grace (Mrs. Ralph Belsa), and Robert N. His first wife died in 1944, and he married Luisa Teresa Bissio in 1945, and their children are Bernice Irene (Mrs. David Welch), Elizabeth Louise and Ruth Suzanna.

He was received on trial in the DETROIT CONFERENCE in 1908 and ordained DEACON and ELDER respectively in 1916 and 1920. He served in the Detroit Conference, 1908-10, then in the MICHIGAN CONFERENCE until 1913, then in Oak Park, Ill., Willard Memorial Church (Rock River) CONFERENCE, 1917-18. He went to ARGENTINA as a missionary in 1918 and served there for a year, going then to MONTEVIDEO, URUGUAY in 1919. There he began to show the talents which earned him the gratitude of other missionaries and of the Methodists of Argentina and Uruguay. He was the founder and the pastor of the Friendship House in Montevideo, and served various mission stations in these lands. For a time he came back to DETROIT serving the Fourteenth Avenue Church, 1957-58. He was professor of the Sweet Memorial Institute in SANTIAGO, 1927-28, and professor and treasurer of the Union Theological Seminary in Santiago, 1927-28, formerly known as Sweet Memorial Institute. He was the general treasurer of the Methodist Church in Argentina and Uruguay, 1929-44; superintendent of the Southern District of Argentina, 1940; and of the Central Chile District, 1928, 1952-53.

Wesley was elected bishop in 1944 by the LATIN AMERICA CENTRAL CONFERENCE and was assigned to the Atlantic Area which comprised Argentina, Uruguay, and BOLIVIA. There he served from 1944-49. He was the pastor for eight years, 1949-57, of the Union Church, Santiago (founded in 1885), and built three buildings there without salary—a labor of love. He retired in 1955.

Bishop Wesley's heart and most of his effort was put into Spanish work, but he was also pastor of English-speaking congregations for about ten years in the Latin American Countries. He edited and published thirty-five books of which five were his own, The Gospel of the Holy Spirit, 1922; Vintage of the Years (his autobiography, 1955; La Magia Blanca; Material para Programas Misioneros; and Motivas y Metodos para la Obscurencia Dominical. He translated and published quite a few other volumes. The total number of volumes of evangelical books published, 50,000; of magazines, 20,000. Over ninety percent of these were in Spanish. In Buenos Aires he fostered the work of the Boca Mission until it had a well rounded social program. This became Methodism's largest institutional church outside the United States. He built three buildings for the Boca Mission—including a lovely Gothic chapel.

After retirement and coming home, he took a charge in Detroit, and finally settled in Lakeland, Fla., where he continues to reside.

WESLEY, BARTHOLOMEW (n.d.), great-grandfather of JOHN and CHARLES WESLEY was rector of Catherston and Charmouth in Dorset in 1650, but the dates of his birth and death are unknown. He was the son of Sir Herbert Wesley, or Westley, in the county of Devon. On Saint Bartholomew's Day, 1662, the feast day of the apostle whose name he bore, he was ejected from his livings.

At the university he studied medicine as well as divinity, and there is some evidence that while rector of Charmouth in Dorset, he was from time to time consulted as a physician. After his ejection he continued to preach as occasion permitted but gained his livelihood as a physician. His son, John Wesley, became the father of SAMUEL, the rector of Epworth.

MALDWIN L. EDWARDS

WESLEY, CHARLES (1707-1788), famous hymn writer and partner with his brother JOHN in the Methodist revival, was born at Epworth on Dec. 18, 1707, and received his early education from his mother, SUSANNA. He entered Westminster School at London in 1716, at the insistence of his eldest brother, SAMUEL, who was a master, and who defrayed the cost of his education. He was made a king's scholar in 1721 and thenceforward his maintenance was provided by the school.

He became captain of the school, as much for his prowess as his studies. It seems that Garrett Wesley, an Irish relative, wanted to adopt Charles as heir and went in person to prevail upon Charles to succeed to his estates. Charles, according to tradition, declined because he preferred to remain in England, and so Garrett Wesley adopted Richard Colley on condition that he assume the arms and surname of Wesley. His heir became Lord Mornington in 1747, and the grandfather of the first Duke of Wellington.

In 1726 Charles entered Christ Church, Oxford, the largest and most distinguished of the colleges in that period, and one that John had only recently left. At first he was content to live the normal life of an undergraduate, enjoying the diversions of university life. However, his religious exercises occupied more and more of his time as the HOLY CLUB, which he had founded, began methodically to apportion time for devotion and reading and charitable works. In 1729, when John returned to the university as fellow of Lincoln, he took over the leadership of the club and still further enlarged its activities.

Chiefly because of John's insistence, Charles was ordained an Anglican priest in 1735; he left the university, where he had been a tutor, and in October, 1735, he sailed with his brother for the new colony of GEORGIA. John was a chaplain to the colonists and missionary to the Indians, but Charles was secretary to the management committee of the colony and private secretary to General JAMES OGLETHORPE. He had a miserable time in Georgia, partly because of ill health, partly because of the spitefulness of ill-natured women who caused misunderstanding between the general and himself, and partly because of his own inability to carry out secretarial duties.

He left Frederica, Georgia, in August, 1736, and arrived in Deal on December 3, ostensibly on leave with dispatches for the British committee for the colony. In 1737 Charles attended several meetings of the committee and expressed himself as ready to return as a missionary but not as a secretary. He also made several visits to Oxford and shared again the life of the Holy Club.

His return to Georgia was delayed by his mother's well-founded objections and by his own ill health. In February, 1738, an illness at Oxford brought him to death's door. Upon convalescence he began to teach English to PETER BÖHLER, a Moravian missionary on his way to America, and in return Böhler instructed him, as he was instructing John Wesley, in the meaning of salvation by faith. At the end of April the illness recurred, and he was tempted to believe that it was because of his want of faith. It was in the house of Mr. Bray, a brazier, "who knows nothing but Christ, yet, by knowing him, knows all things," that Charles Wesley came into an instantaneous experience of conversion on Whitsunday, May 21, 1738. On the following Wednesday night about ten o'clock John was brought to Mr. Bray's house by a troop of friends and declared to his brother, "I believe!" They sang what is now known as the "Conversion Hymn" and they parted after prayer. It was the true beginning of the revival.

During the remainder of the year Charles preached in the London churches that were open to him, gave himself to the visitation of prisoners at Newgate prison, and he often accompanied felons to their execution at Tyburn. In July 1738, he became a helper to his friend GEORGE STONEHOUSE, vicar of Islington; but his bold evangelical preaching infuriated the churchwardens, and they were supported by the Bishop of London. Stonehouse gave way, and Charles Wesley was barred from the pulpit in the spring of 1739.

However, his life's work was already beginning to take shape. On May 29 he was invited by Mr. Franklins, a farmer at Broadboks in Essex, to preach in his field. About five hundred listened to his discourse on the text, "Repent for the Kingdom of Heaven is at hand." This and a few other country engagements prepared him for a beginning in London. On June 24, 1739, he spoke to nearly ten thousand people in Moorfields, on "Come unto me all ye that labour and are heavy laden and I will give you rest." Thus encouraged, he preached to great multitudes on Kennington Common. On Sundays his practice seems to have been to preach at Moorfields and then later on Kennington Common.

For the next ten years he was engaged with his brother in a constant itinerary throughout England, preaching the Gospel in the open air. Like his brother John he was often in danger of life, but his fearlessness and his refusal to show his back to the rioters gradually turned odium into unwilling admiration. On one notable occasion in St. Ives, Cornwall, on July 18, 1743, the mob ran on him, fortified by the beating of the drums, and cried out that he should not preach. Charles recorded in his Journal, "My soul was calm and fearless. . . . I walked leisurely through the thickest of them who followed like ramping and roaring lions but their mouth was shut."

The decade ended with the terrible riots at Cork in May, 1750, and by this time the Methodists had received nationwide publicity and their numbers and influence were steadily increasing.

In 1749 Charles married Sarah Gwynne, the daughter of Squire MARMADUKE GWYNNE of Garth near Builth Wells. It proved to be a happy union, and when they settled in Bristol Charles gradually ceased from itinerating. This was a great trial to John, who in the expanding work of Methodism needed his brother in the visitation of the societies. One must not forget, however, that although Charles remained in Bristol until 1771, he contrived periodically to make preaching tours in the West Country and gave oversight to the work in Bristol itself. Since NEWCASTLE UPON TYNE, LONDON, and Bristol were the three main centers of Methodism, he was rendering invaluable service from his Bristol home. It was shortly after his own marriage that he rode in great haste to Newcastle to prevent John from marrying GRACE MURRAY. He has been attacked for this precipitate action, since John Wesley loved Grace, and she was a convinced and ardent Methodist. In his defense, however, it might be argued that in those early years of the revival, to have chosen one woman of ordinary standing from the societies might have caused jealousy, resentment and ill-natured gossip, which would have affected Methodism adversely.

In 1771 Charles moved to London, chiefly to help forward the career of his two musically gifted sons, and for the last seventeen years of his life superintended the societies during the long absences of John. In 1739 the Foundry had been the one center of London Methodism, but in 1743 another chapel was opened at West Street and preaching houses were later opened at Snowfields, Southwark, and Spitalfields. These were all served by Charles Wesley, but when in 1778 the "New Chapel," now known as Wesley's Chapel, was opened, Charles gave the greater part of his time to its ministrations. One must remember also that since only ordained ministers were allowed to administer the Sacraments, Charles with a little clerical assistance had to serve all the numerous London Methodists who came to the Lord's Table.

During his stay in Bristol and London, Charles attended the Annual Conferences frequently and in later years strove to restrain his brother from any irregular ecclesiastical action which would hasten the separation from the Church of England. He was bitterly hurt and dismayed when John Wesley ordained preachers in 1784 for the work of Scotland and America, and especially by the ordination of COKE and ASBURY to be "superintendents" of the Methodist societies in America; he was not deceived by the term and knew they would in fact be bishops.

Nevertheless nothing was allowed to destroy the close friendship which existed between them. John was always, in his own words, his "first and last unalienable friend, . . . a brother, still as thy own soul beloved."

Charles Wesley's greatest contribution to the universal Church was in his hymns. It was inevitable that in so prolific an output the standard should be uneven; even so it is amazing that so high a proportion should be so good. The 1780 collection of hymns remains unsurpassed, and the majority were written by Charles. Bernard Manning said of this hymnbook that "in its own way it is perfect, unapproachable, elemental in its perfection. You cannot alter it except to mar it; it is a work of supreme devotional art by a religious genius." The Hymns of Wesley and Watts, p. 74 (Epworth 1942). Some of the greatest hymns used by all the historic churches in their observance of the great Christian festivals were written by Charles, and none has given finer or fuller expression to the evangelical content of the Christian faith.

Using with utmost facility an astonishing variety of meters, and with a masterly employment of Anglo-Saxon and words of Latin derivation as occasion required, Charles wrote hymns for believers in all aspects of their Christian living. Nor was he concerned only with the solitary pilgrim on his way from earth to heaven. No hymn writer has written with more delight on the fellowship of all believers. He wrote deathless hymns on the Church, and like his brother John, he taught the Methodist people that religion, though personally enjoyed, must be socially expressed.

In himself he was always prone to moods of exultation and despair, and like his father he was subject to gusty bouts of anger which fell as quickly as they arose. He was devoted to his wife and family and beloved by all his friends. The Wesley charm was his in full measure. He had neither the gifts nor inclination for leadership, and none had less ambition. All he desired was to be of service to God and man. He has his own unique place in the Methodist story, and the partnership of his brother and himself is without parallel in the whole history of the Church.

Charles Wesley died in London on March 29, 1788. So great was his attachment to the Anglican Church that he refused to be buried in the unconsecrated ground on City Road where both his brother and mother are buried, the former in the rear of Wesley's Chapel, City Road, and the latter across the road in the Dissenters' cemetery of Bunhill Fields. He rests in the garden of the parish church of Marylebone.

This love of the Anglican Church meant that his restraining hand on John steadied him when subject to the pressure of preachers and people alike. There was no precipitate withdrawal, and in consequence when Methodism almost insensibly became a separate Church, there survived a sense of the value of the historicity, liturgy, and Sacraments of the Church that gave her a spacious background against which to develop her own ethos in the nineteenth century.

WESLEY, CHARLES, JUNIOR (1757-1834), eldest son of the poet and hymn writer, was born at Bristol on December 11, 1757, and from earliest years showed that talent for music which made him later well known throughout the country. His father recorded in his Journal that when young Charles was only two years and nine months old "he surprised me by playing a tune on the harpsichord readily and in just time. . . . When he played himself, she used to tie him up by his back string to the chair for fear of his falling. Whatever tune it was, he always put a true bass to it." Quoted by G. J. Stevenson, Memorials of Wesley Family (London, 1876), p. 447.

It was partly for his sons' sake that Charles, Senior, moved to London. There his son Charles was introduced to many leading musicians. Mr. Kelway, the famous organist at St. Martin-in-the-Fields, gave him lessons, while another fine musician, Mr. Morgan, gave him tuition in "thorough base and composition." A gift from his uncle, John Wesley, of Dr. Boyce's three volumes of cathedral music, seems to have confirmed him in a particular predilection for church music. He knew the score of many oratorios by heart, as well as much of the music of Handel, and Corelli, Scarlatti, and Geminiani. When he was twenty years old his father wrote, "Charles has now been for some years under Dr. Boyce's tuition learning composition. . . . With two such masters as Mr. Kelway and Dr. Boyce he believes he has the two greatest masters of music in Christendom."

He played at numerous private concerts given by Lord Mornington and others, and went to Windsor to play before the king at least once each year for many years. Until his mental illness George III regarded Charles Wesley, Junior, as his favorite musician, and the prince regent continued to show royal favor by appointing him as his musician-ordinary and teacher of his daughter, the Princess Charlotte.

Charles, Junior, never identified himself with Methodism, though he was always on friendly terms with the leading preachers and laymen. As a church organist and the organist of St. Marylebone Church, Paddington, he could not attend the Sunday services. He did, however, regularly attend a Methodist class meeting. He was devoted to his mother and his sister and read to them daily from the Bible and the service of the Church of England.

When Mrs. Wesley was too old to attend church he brought her an outline of the sermons he had heard and also delighted her with organ performances at home.

He wrote many musical works which were admired and well received in his day, but have not survived. Thomas Jackson, who knew him well, said, "In music he was an angel, in everything else a child." Stevenson, p. 467.

WESLEY, CHARLES (1793-1859), eldest son of SAMUEL WESLEY, the musician, and grandson of CHARLES WESLEY, SENIOR, brother of JOHN, was educated at home until the age of ten years when he was sent to a school near Maidstone and then to St. Paul's School, London. In 1818 he went to Christ's College, Cambridge, and partly from innate ability and partly because of his seniority he showed great skill in logic. In 1821 he was ordained priest at Salisbury Cathedral and was appointed to Pimlico and after one year to the staff of St. Mary's Chapel, Fulham. He served for a time at St. Paul's, Covent Garden. In 1833 he was made chaplain to the king's household at St. James, and later sub-dean of Her Majesty's Chapels Royal, and in 1847 chaplain in ordinary to Queen Victoria. He continued to be connected with St. James Palace for thirty years and was present at all national ceremonies, which included the confirmation, coronation, marriage, and first churching of the queen, and the baptism and marriage of the princess royal.

He was a staunch Anglican and deeply regretted the separation of Methodism from the Established Church and greatly longed for a reunion. In 1824 he married Eliza Skelton of Hammersmith, and there were four children of the marriage, two of whom survived infancy. He was a quiet, retiring man, and his daily duties at St. James Palace shut him off from the ordinary life of the Anglican Church, so that little is known of his labors save that he was the author of two books, one on logic and one on the church catechism.

WESLEY, EMILY (1691-1771), sister of JOHN and CHARLES WESLEY, was born at South Ormsby on Dec. 31, 1691. Following the birth of her brother, SAMUEL, there was a daughter, Susanna, who died when only two years of age. Emily, as the eldest surviving daughter, played a major part in family relationships. Her mother's tuition was supplemented by instruction from her father, and she gained a reputation in the family as a good classical scholar. John Kirk, an early biographer of Mrs. Wesley, described Emily as one "who worked hard all day long, read some pleasant book at night, and though she had few diversions was contented and happy." She had an especial gift in music and poetry, and her brother John said she was the best reader of Milton he had ever heard.

She had no difficulty in securing a post as teacher in the boarding school of Mrs. Taylor in Lincoln. But she was "overworked and underpaid," and with surprising initiative for a young woman in those days, she not only left on her own account, but set up her own school in Gainsborough. While staying in London with her uncle, Matthew Wesley, she had met and fallen in love with an Oxford student named Leybourne. For three years she maintained a correspondence with him, and when it was broken off she said that nearly half a year she never slept half a night. In a letter to John she wrote, "Let Emma's hapless case be told by the rash young, or the ill-natured old."

One reason for going to Lincoln was to rescue herself from the gloom into which she had now fallen. At Gainsborough, however, when it seemed all prospects of marriage were over, a Quaker physician paid her some attention. John was adverse to the match, but Emily broke it off for reasons of her own. She disliked his habit of obstinately holding to his opinions; "An unmarried woman could never be wrong in an argument with a bachelor. So farewell George Fox and all thy tribe, for Rockwood and Ringwood, and Towler, and Tray."

A little later however, when forty-four years of age, she married Robert Harper, an apothecary of Epworth, and John Wesley performed the ceremony just before his departure for America. It proved to be an unfortunate and unhappy marriage, and it was quickly terminated. Harper used up all her savings and thought himself "very kind" if once a month he gave her ten shillings. She left him and went to live at the Foundry in London. Once the Foundry had been used for the casting of cannon, but since 1716 it had been unused. John Wesley purchased it cheaply, and it became the first headquarters of his work. In addition to a chapel and a house for lay preachers, he built a coach house and stable as well as apartment for his own use. His mother went there in 1739, and Emily followed her a year later.

When West Street Chapel was taken, she was accommodated in the Chapel House, and once again she lacked nothing. She passed her time in the services and week-night meetings, and her chief concern was the welfare of the society and the care of the people. When she was too ill to join in public worship, she followed the service by throwing open a window which opened on to the gallery behind the pulpit. She had reached her eightieth year when she died in 1771 in London; in the very year in which John Wesley lost Emily, Charles Wesley moved to London from Bristol and supplied the place his sister had left.

All the sisters were devoted to John, but Emily deserves to be remembered as the one who was with him for the longest period. For twenty years of his unhappy married life, she gave him the affection and sympathy which he needed. Perhaps it is true to say that in so far as he ever had a home it was in her West Street rooms. John was throughout her life the one constant object of her devotion. As early as 1725 we find her begging John to be the repository of her secrets; and when in 1729 she begged John to keep friendly with Leybourne, she said the request ought to weigh more with him than anybody's except his mother, and that while life remained she would be his most affectionate sister. In a later letter she described John as the one selected from "our numerous family" to be from childhood "my counsellor in difficulties, the dear partner of my joys and griefs." She concluded by saying that her only fault in regard to him was that she loved him too well. Her love was in fact possessive and therefore too demanding. For example, when instead of visiting her in Gainsborough he chose in the summer of 1738 to visit the Moravians in Germany, she was acutely disappointed and told him so in vigorous language. Even after she had come to live with him in London she could not restrain her desire to have more of his company and to reproach him for want of affection. But John not only provided for Emily, but also for her maid to whom she was greatly attached. Hetty Wesley has given us a picture of her in verse, which, allowing for eighteenth-century rhetorical exaggeration, still means that Emily was a singularly attractive woman.

Thy virtues and thy graces all
How simple, free and natural;
Thy graceful form with pleasure to survey
It charms the eye, the heart away.

To all thy outward majesty and grace,
To all the blooming features of thy face,
To all the heavenly sweetness of thy mind,
A noble, generous, equal soul is joined,
By reason polished, and by arts refined.

WESLEY (WESTLEY), JOHN (c. 1636-1678), grandfather of JOHN WESLEY and CHARLES WESLEY, was first trained for the ministry by his father, the Rev. Bartholomew Wesley. He graduated from New Inn Hall at Oxford University and then took a master's degree. His special aptitude (later to show itself in his son) was for oriental languages, but he chose the life of a preacher rather than the more settled life of the scholar.

In 1658, during the protectorate of Oliver Cromwell, Wesley was approved by a committee of triers and inducted as vicar of Winterborn, Whitchurch, in Dorset, England. He stayed here through four happy and useful years but on Bartholomew's Day, 1662, with two thousand other clergymen, he chose to be evicted from his living rather than use the "new Book" of Common Prayer. On August 17, 1662, he spoke to his people for the last time on the text: "And now brethren I commend you to God and the word of His Grace."

After a few years in which he and his ever increasing family moved from Melcombe, Ilminster, Bridgewater, Taunton, to Preston near Weymouth, his health deteriorated. This was due not only to the constant anxiety of preaching and the constant risk of discovery, but to a period of six-months' confinement in Poole prison and smaller sentences elsewhere. The passing of the Five Miles Act (1665), forbidding a clergyman to teach or come within five miles of a city or town unless he had taken the nonresistance oath, made his work more hazardous. In 1678 he died when, as Dr. Calamy, his biographer, said, "He had not been much longer an inhabitant here below than his blessed Master was, whom he had served with his whole heart, according to the best light he had."

WESLEY, JOHN (1703-1791), founder of Methodism, was born on June 28, 1703, at EPWORTH in England, where his father was Anglican rector for nearly forty years. He was the fifteenth of the nineteen children of SAMUEL and SUSANNA WESLEY, both of whom have their own place in history.

Both the grandfathers of John Wesley were clergymen who were ejected from their pulpits in 1662, but his father broke that nonconformist tradition by becoming a Tory in politics and a High-Church Anglican.

The family life at Epworth was the first great influence in shaping the life of John Wesley. There was no "mother fixation," as some modern biographers have supposed, but certainly the early instruction in the Epworth Rectory, followed by his mother's later letters and her constant advice, gave her an influence on his upbringing which is difficult to exaggerate.

His father, the rector of Epworth, allowed him to become a communicant at eight years of age, and because of the sacrifice of both parents he became a foundation scholar at CHARTERHOUSE School, an ancient Carthusian monastery in LONDON, on Jan. 28, 1714. Despite the stern discipline of Dr. Walker, the headmaster, and the spartan conditions of living, no word of complaint has ever been recorded of the six years he studied there. He is remembered in a verse of the school song, since he was ever the loyal Carthusian and visited the school many times during the course of his long life.

On Jan. 24, 1720, he entered Christ Church at Oxford as an exhibitor; this was the college where SAMUEL, his elder brother, had preceded him, and CHARLES, his younger brother, was to follow. Through these years he was in constant correspondence with his parents, and when in 1725 he decided to assume holy orders, both parents expressed their joy; the rector urged him to study the language which would give him mastery of the original text of the Bible, and Susanna advised him to read "practical divinity."

Thus John Wesley began to read the Imitation of Christ of Thomas á Kempis and Jeremy Taylor's Holy Living and Dying. This was the second factor which determined his later apostolate, for in Taylor he found a spur to holiness of living. It led him to read the great mystical writers and to follow their counsel in the culture of the inner life. From Taylor he was led on to William Law's Serious Call to a Devout and Holy Life and Christian Perfection. His mother advised him to read also Henry Scougal's Life of God in the Soul of Man, a book which later became a favorite with both John and Charles Wesley.

In 1726, when Charles Wesley went from Westminster to Christ Church, John was elected a fellow of Lincoln College, and in the interchange of letters between him and his father occurred the rector's memorable phrase: "What will be my own fate before the summer is over, God knows; but wherever I am, my Jack is Fellow of Lincoln." His mother said in a softer tone, "I think myself obliged to return great thanks to Almighty God for giving you good success at Lincoln."

In the summer of this year John went to Epworth and nearby WROOT, where he preached and assisted his father in the two parishes. In September 1726 he was back at Oxford, and his rising reputation was such that he was chosen Greek lecturer and moderator of the classes. In the first capacity he lectured weekly on the Greek New Testament, more to instruct the undergraduates in divinity than in Greek. As moderator he presided over the daily "Disputations" at Lincoln College and fully developed his talent for logic. When he took his Master of Arts degree on Feb. 14, 1727, his three lectures were in the fields of natural philosophy, moral philosophy, and religion.

The life of scholar and tutor, so entirely congenial to him, was rudely broken by the need to assist his father, who was becoming increasingly infirm. Between August 1727 and November 1729, John spent more time in Epworth and Wroot than in Oxford, and the rector wanted him to stay in the parish and in due time succeed him. This was not in accord with John's wishes, and when Dr. Morley, the rector of Lincoln College, told him in a letter (Oct. 21, 1729) that "the interests of the College and the obligation of the statutes" required his return, he did not hesitate to resume once more his academic teaching and studies.

There was not only Charles to greet him, but also the famous HOLY CLUB which Charles had founded. The story can be told in Charles' words:

My first year at College I lost in diversions; the next I set myself to study. Diligence led me into serious thinking; I went to the weekly sacrament, persuaded two or three young students to accompany me and to observe the method of study prescribed by the Statutes of the University. This gained me the harmless name of Methodist. In half a year after this my brother left his curacy at Epworth and came to our assistance. We then proceeded regularly in our studies and in doing what good we could to the bodies and souls of men. (Charles Wesley as revealed in his Letters, p. 14, FRANK BAKER, Epworth, 1948.)

John, meanwhile, was continuing his reading of the mystics and coming to a clearer understanding of the supreme value of Holy Writ. In this very year of 1729 he said he had not only begun to read but to study the Bible: hence he said, "I saw the indispensable necessity of having the mind which was in Christ and of walking as He walked, not only in many or most respects, but in all things."

With these views he naturally became a member of the Holy Club and as naturally became its head. At first only William Morgan of Christ Church and Robert Kirkham met with the Wesley brothers for the reading of Greek and Latin classics and the study of the Greek New Testament. Others were added as the years went on, and the activities of the club increased. At first, at the suggestion of William Morgan, the brothers agreed to visit the prisoners at the "castle" or prison and the poor in those parishes where permission had been received.

Strangely premonitory of John Wesley's later interest in education was the school he started. He and his friends paid the mistress and, when necessary, clothed the children and supervised their work. Children in the workhouse were taught, and books were read to the old people. The ridicule and scorn excited in the university was principally directed against, not the devotional and ascetic practices, but these works of charity.

In time the difficulties of the Holy Club so multiplied that it began to disintegrate. The early death of William Morgan was unjustly supposed to be due to the fastings and austerities which he practiced and served to bring the rules into greater opprobrium. An article in Fog's Journal in December 1732 severely criticized John and the other members of the club, but later men who were to be so distinguished as Thomas Broughton, BENJAMIN INGHAM, GEORGE WHITEFIELD and JAMES HERVEY had joined. Wesley recorded in 1733 that the seven and twenty communicants at St. Mary's had shrunk to five, and his incessant travels of around a thousand miles had loosed his grasp on the discipline and practice of the club.

Perhaps the realization of this led to his compilation of forms of prayer for each day in the week. It was his first publication and was printed in 1733, to be followed in 1735 by The Christian's Pattern, an edition of the Imitation of Christ by Thomas á Kempis. Later in the club's history, six years after its inception, George Whitefield became a member and gladly adopted their ascetic mode of life.

The death of Samuel, the rector, on April 23, 1735, unsettled John, and the meeting between General JAMES OGLETHORPE and himself caused him to accept the offer of a chaplaincy in the colony of GEORGIA. His father had been one of the first supporters of this new colony, named after George II, who granted the charter on June 9, 1732. Only his advanced age had prevented the rector from offering his own services, and he suggested that JOHN WHITELAMER, his curate, should be invited. Samuel Wesley, Jr., the eldest son, had written two poems with James Oglethorpe as the hero and a third poem had been inscribed to him.

Yet stronger than any liking of Oglethorpe, or interest in his scheme, was the fresh opportunity of leaping the wall between himself and God. All of Wesley's reading of the mystics and good works could not secure him the communion with God which steadfastly he set before him as a goal. He frankly confessed that a chief reason for going to Georgia was to save his own soul. "I hope to learn the true sense of the gospel of Christ by preaching it to the heathen."

WESLEY MARKER AT SAVANNAH, GEORGIA

In Georgia, Georgia marks a third stage in his spiritual pilgrimage. Whatever his motives, none could deny his apostolic zeal in his daily religious services and in the frequent celebration of Holy Communion. A plaque outside the Protestant Episcopal Church in SAVANNAH makes John Wesley the founder of SUNDAY schools in America, and certainly he gave much time to the instruction of the young. He ministered to French and German colonists by conversing with them in their own language, and he even attempted to conduct a service in Italian at the request of several immigrants. There were also Spanish Jews who sought out Wesley, and of whom he spoke so happily, declaring that some of them "seem nearer the mind that was in Christ than many of those who call Him Lord."

This necessity to learn German, French, and Spanish helped him when he came to his great work of translating hymns. His first hymnbook, entitled a Collection of Psalms and Hymns, was published at CHARLESTON in 1737. In it he included hymns of ISAAC WATTS, three of his father's and others of his brother, Samuel, in praise of the Trinity. But the outstanding feature of the book is John Wesley's superb translations from the German of such hymns as Lange's "O God, Thou Bottomless Abyss," Freylinghausen's "O Jesus Source of Calm Repose," and Richter's "Thou Lamb of God, Thou Prince of Peace."

Finally, in Georgia was laid the foundation of the system of classes which later became a distinguishing mark of BRITISH METHODISM. Wesley said in his Journal that, since no doors had been opened for a mission to the Indians,

We agreed (1) to advise the more serious among them to form themselves into a little society and to meet once or twice a week in order to reprove, instruct and exhort one another; (2) to select out of these a smaller number for a more intimate union with each other which might be forwarded, partly by conversing singly with each other and partly by inviting them all together to one house, and this accordingly, we determined to do every Sunday in the afternoon.

It appears that the members were largely German, and while the society met once or twice in a week, the inner circle had its own Sunday afternoon gathering.

The Moravians. There were a number of Moravians on the ship "Simmonds" in which Wesley sailed to Georgia, and his contacts with these people constituted another important factor in his conversion and subsequent life. He was greatly impressed with the unperturbed behavior of the Moravians in a storm and learned that even their women and children were unafraid because of their faith. Later one of their leaders, AUGUST GOTTLIEB SPANGENBERG, asked him pointedly, "Do you know Jesus Christ?" Wesley replied, "I know that He is the Savior of the world." "But," persisted the Moravian, "do you know he has saved you?" Wesley replied in the affirmative, but he confessed in his Journal, "I fear they were vain words." (Journal, Vol. 1, P. 151.) This episode created a spiritual dissatisfaction in Wesley's heart which eventually, and under the tutelage of another Moravian, PETER BÖHLER, led to his evangelical awakening.

Wesley's mission in Georgia was not successful, and even he regarded it as a failure. George Whitefield, however, declared, "The good Mr. John Wesley has done in America is inexpressible. His name is very precious among the people and he has laid a foundation that I hope neither men nor devils will be able to shake. O that I may follow him as he has followed Christ."

Nevertheless, Wesley's usefulness in the colony was strictly limited, and his mission ended in a near fiasco. His rigid High Churchmanship divided the people and turned many against him. He had a mismanaged and unfortunate love affair with SOPHIA HORKEY, and when he foolishly repelled her from communion after she married another man, it led to his indictment. In the end he was obliged to leave the colony under something like a cloud.

Aldersgate. Wesley returned to England in deep spiritual dejection, which our fathers would probably have called "conviction for sin," though he was certainly no sinner if the term implies moral wrongdoing. But he reproached himself over and over again, declaring that he was "carnal, sold under sin," in a "vile abject state of bondage to sin," and "altogether corrupt and abominable."

When he reached England he met Peter Böhler, who told him that salvation was by faith alone and finally convinced him of the truth of the doctrine. Wesley's first impulse was to cease preaching, but the Moravian told him to "preach faith until you have it, then because you have it you will preach it." Wesley followed that advice, and at once great success attended his ministry. This led on May 24, 1738 (Journal, Vol. 1, p. 475-76), to the experience about which he wrote what are perhaps his most famous words:

In the evening I went very unwillingly to a society in ALDERSGATE STREET, where one was reading Luther's preface to the Epistle to the Romans. About a quarter before nine, while he was describing the change which God works in the heart through faith in Christ, I felt my heart strangely warmed. I felt that I did trust in Christ, Christ alone for salvation, and an assurance was given me, that he had taken away my sins, even mine, and saved me from the law of sin and death.

The Belgian priest, Father Maximin Piette, in his book John Wesley in the Evolution of Protestantism (Sheed and Ward, London, 1937), has minimized this Aldersgate experience, but actually it was the source of Methodist teaching on salvation, assurance, and holiness. It was the watershed of Wesley's whole career, and it gave him charter and compass for a course from which he never deviated. Even more, it gave him the spiritual energy for his pilgrim's progress, so that never again was he Christian with a burden on his back. Until his dying day Wesley dated his experience, his message, and his doctrine back to this date of 1738.

At Oxford and in Georgia he had sought salvation through devotional exercises and by good works through unremitting service of his fellows. But neither had brought him peace with God. In his own way he came to know that neither righteousness nor merit can earn God's favor nor fit man for heaven. After years of travail he saw in a flash that salvation cannot be worked for nor merited, but can only be received by simple faith.

His first action after conversion was to help in drawing up orders for the religious society which he had been attending in FETTER LANE. Then he preached before the university at St. Mary's, Oxford, on "By grace are ye saved through faith." This was, as the university authorities were quick to realize, a new emphasis by a new voice in a new and disturbing fashion. It was the manifesto of the new revival.

Meanwhile in his restlessness of spirit he determined to go to the fountainhead of the Moravian movement, Count ZINZENDORF and the members of the Herrnhut settlement in GERMANY. Wesley stayed many days there, and whilst in their services and schools he saw much to admire, there were some niggling doubts which later were to grow in his mind. The Moravian reliance upon God's grace could lead to a passivity in which even the means of grace, known and used by the Church in all centuries, could be neglected.

The breach with the Church of England, which Wesley never acknowledged, led almost at once to the closing of London churches against his brother and himself. In the course of 1739 only four were open to him, but, at Newgate jail among condemned prisoners, both John and Charles discovered that if conventional means of proclaiming the Gospel were forbidden, unconventional opportunities were ready to hand.

Beginning of Field Preaching. In the spring of 1739, another event of large importance for the revival occurred. This was the beginning of field preaching, or preaching in the open air, which was forced on the leaders by the closing of the churches against them. George Whitefield began preaching in the field to the miners at Kingswood, near BRISTOL, and he attracted great throngs of spiritually neglected people. Leaving for America, he asked John Wesley to take over this work. The idea was repugnant to the correct and proper presbyter of the Church of England, who declared that he had been "so tenacious of every point relating to decency and order, that I should have thought the saving of souls almost a sin if it had not been done in a church." (Journal, March 31, 1739, Vol. 2, P. 167.)

Nevertheless, on April 2, 1739, he began the work. In words to become immortal he said, "At four in the afternoon I submitted to be more vile, and proclaimed in the highways the glad tidings of salvation, speaking from a little eminence in a ground adjoining to the city to about three thousand people." His life's work had begun. (Journal, Vol. 2, P. 172.)

He preached in the open air all over England. At GWENNAF PIT in CORNWALL he preached to crowds estimated at many thousands. One of the most famous episodes of his career was his sermon from his father's tomb at Epworth when he had been refused the pulpit and denounced by the curate.

Wesley became "the soul that over England flamed." For fifty years he rode over most roads in England and preached in every conceivable place. Twenty times he toured SCOTLAND, twenty-four times he was in WALES, twenty-one times in IRELAND. Reading and writing as he rode along, he traveled a quarter of a million miles and preached more than forty thousand times. Only FRANCIS ASBURY in America surpassed him as an itinerant.

Persecution and Attack. Wesley and his preachers encountered persecution and physical violence of the most bitter kind. The attacks came mainly from those in the Church of England, chiefly squires and parsons, who strongly disapproved of the practice of preaching in the open air and thus disregarding parish boundaries. They were repelled and disgusted by some of the emotional excesses which characterized the revival in the opening years. The fact that only a few people became hysterical and that the Wesleys did not countenance such behavior could not allay the suspicions of the enemies.

The opposition was strengthened by the fact that when Charles Stuart tried to gain the throne of England, the Methodists by their classes and "nocturnal meetings" seemed possible Papists and Jacobites in disguise, and therefore traitors. On numerous occasions rabble-egged on by parson and squire set upon Methodists and maltreated them. Even John and Charles Wesley, as well as some of their assistant preachers, were in danger of their lives. The brothers rode the storm triumphantly because they showed no fear; they never turned their backs to the rioters, and they always went unhesitatingly to the leader of the mob. The decade of rioting ended with the frightful excesses in Cork where priest took the place of parson.

The fighting was done with pens as well as fists. William Warburton, Bishop of Gloucester, wrote his Office and Operations of the Holy Spirit, and Wesley replied in a devastating "letter" which effectively scotched his accusations. A more important literary opponent was GEORGE LAVINGTON, Bishop of Exeter, who published a work in three parts entitled Enthusiasm of Methodists and Papists Compared. He argued that John Wesley was a Papist in disguise. He reached this conclusion by comparing certain sayings from Roman Catholics with extracts from the Journals and writings of Wesley and Whitefield. Wesley not only refuted the charge, but convicted the bishop of woeful ignorance, and, in places, of downright dishonesty.

All these attacks gave the Wesleys wide publicity and sympathy from the general public, while stimulating the loyalty and devotion of their followers. The movement spread rapidly and societies were formed especially in the centers of population.

The First Chapels. In 1739 Wesley erected the first chapel for his societies. It was a small building at Bristol and was known as the New Room in the Florshair. It had a preaching place, living quarters, a conference room on the second floor, and a stable for the preachers' horses. It is still in existence, the oldest Methodist shrine in the world.

In the same year, 1739, Wesley acquired a ruined cannon factory in London which he repaired and re-modeled. This was the famous Foundery, the second Methodist meetinghouse in the world, and was London headquarters of the Methodist movement for forty years. It was a chapel, residence, book-room and center for a wide variety of social activities.

The third center was a Newcastle upon Tyne, where Wesley established his noted Orphan House in 1742. It also housed many activities and was the headquarters in the north of England, but the original intention of developing a home for orphans was never realized.

It has been said that Methodism built a school before it built a church. At the Foundery in London, sixty children were taught. But the first great educational venture of the Methodists, also in 1739, was a school for miners' children at Kingswood, the cornerstone of which was laid by George Whitefield. In 1748 Wesley established at Kingswood a "New School," alongside the "Old School"; this was mainly for the sons of the preachers. Originally they were known as the "Old House" and the "New House." For a short time there was also a school at the New Room, Bristol, with four masters and a mistress. It was officially adopted by the Conference in 1756. In 1851 it was removed to Bath and is today one of the finest public schools in England.

Beginning of Lay Preaching. Almost coincident with the building of the first chapels, lay preaching began. This was to become one of the most potent instruments for the spread of Methodism, not only in England, but also in America and other parts of the world.

The first lay preachers were Thomas Maxfield and John Cennick. Maxfield was a convert who was employed by Wesley at the Foundery "to pray and expound the Scriptures, but not to preach." However, in 1740 or 1741 he began to preach in earnest. This outraged Wesley, who rushed to London to bring an end to such irregularity. But his mother cautioned him to hear the young man before passing judgment; this Wesley did and immediately gave Maxfield permission to preach.

John Cennick was converted in 1737 and soon began preaching. There can be no doubt that he was one of Wesley's lay preachers before Maxfield was. He first preached at Kingswood June 14, 1739. Cennick became master of Kingswood School, but he embraced Calvinism and was disowned by Wesley and joined Whitefield and the Calvinistic Methodists, but left them for the Moravians.

Methodist Organization. By the 1740's the Methodist movement had become so strong that some kind of organization was needed. Thus emerged the class meeting, the first of which was at Bristol in 1742. In due course a threefold plan was adopted. The society consisted of all the members who met and worshipped together. The class was a dozen or more persons, under a leader, who made financial contributions and met weekly for testimony and discipline; later, tickets were required for admission, and these quarterly tickets were proof of good standing. The band was a smaller group of the same sex and marital status; the band soon disappeared, but the class meeting continued as a main source of strength.

Then the most important of all Methodist organizations, the Conference, appeared. The first was held at the Foundery in London on June 25-30, 1744. In addition to the two Wesley brothers there were four clergymen of the Church of England. There were also four of Wesley's lay preachers, including Thomas Maxfield, but these were not admitted to all the sessions; of these only one, John Downes, continued to the end as a Methodist preacher.

The subjects discussed were three: What to teach, how to teach, and what to do. The discussions were called "conversations," and to this day the procedure in British Methodism both in Conference and Synod is the asking and answering of questions. The Minutes of this first Conference are preserved. It was stated that all the Methodists regarded themselves as members of the Church of England, and that it was to be defended in preaching and life.

This conference published no statistics, which were slow in appearing. In 1746 the circuits were gathered into seven areas, with thirty sub areas. In 1748 there were nine divisions and sixty-seven circuits, and the numbers continued to increase year by year. In 1766 the first tabulation of membership was included; it showed ninety-seven preachers, not including the Wesleys themselves, appointed to forty circuits with 19,761 members, with some omissions. There was a complete report in 1767, when 25,911 members were listed.

The Calvinistic Controversy. In the 1770's the Calvinistic controversy reached its height. George Whitefield, the Countess of Huntingdon, Richard and Rowland Hill, and others were strongly biased toward the theology of Calvinism, the predestinarian aspect of which the Wesleys and their followers opposed. When the Conference met at Bristol in 1771 a rival conference was held of Calvinistic sympathizers, and Wesley was asked to receive a deputation representing them. They held a two-hour discussion and retired thoroughly discomfited, their leader acknowledging publicly that he had been mistaken.

Nevertheless it was a pyrrhic victory, because the offended Lady Huntingdon proceeded to regroup her forces. The attack came in two waves.

First was the written slanders of such bitter controversialists as Augustus Toplady and the Hills, mainly in the columns of the Gospel Magazine but also in pamphlets. Second, the Calvinistic preachers were sent to evangelize where Methodism was strong, in attempts to disrupt the societies. These were troubled days for Wesley, but his victory was complete, and in spite of the attacks, Methodism continued steadily to increase.

Lady Huntingdon built her own chapels in many places. She founded Trevecka College as a training school for preachers and the main field of Calvinistic Methodist operations then as now was in Wales. But doctrinal controversy is only a memory.

Methodism Becomes a Church. Another important development was the virtual emergence of Methodism as a separate Church, although it did not become definite until after the death of Wesley. On Feb. 28, 1784, Wesley signed the historically significant Deed of Declaration, making the Annual Conference through the Legal Hundred preachers the heir of Wesley and establishing the principle of itineracy. Wesley, by the hard logic of facts, was providing for a Church which would continue after his death, distinct in form and ethos from the Anglican Church which gave it birth.

Perhaps of still greater importance was Wesley's ORDINATION in 1784. The Deed of Declaration made possible a British Church, but the ordinations led to a world Church. The action was taken after his fruitless attempt to persuade bishops to ordain men for America following the close of the Revolutionary War. The Methodists in America were demanding the ordinances at the hands of their own preachers.

Wesley had become convinced by reading King's book on the Primitive Church that presbyters and BISHOPS were of the same order. Therefore, in September 1784 at Bristol, he ordained Dr. THOMAS COKE as "SUPERINTENDENT" for America and sent him to the New World. There was convened the famous CHRISTMAS CONFERENCE at BALTIMORE, at which Francis Asbury was elected and consecrated superintendent, and the M.E. CHURCH was organized. Wesley's ordinations continued, in spite of vigorous protests from his brother Charles; he ordained a total of twenty-seven persons.

It is a remarkable instance of Wesley's invincible youthfulness that at the end of a long life he was still looking upon the whole world as his parish. Already the work in the WEST INDIES was spreading, since its inception by NATHANIEL GILBERT in 1760, and when violent storms drove Dr. Thomas Coke and three young missionaries nearly two thousand miles off their course to ANTIGUA in 1786, the labor of the local preacher, JOHN BAXTER, there found powerful reinforcement. Other islands were visited and evangelized. Before he died Wesley could see a fulfillment of his brother's lines:

When he first the work begun,
Small and feeble was His day;
Now the world doth swiftly run,
Now it wins its widening way.

(Methodist hymnbook Great Britain, No. 263.)

The Spread of Methodism. When John Wesley died in 1791, Methodism had spread all over the United Kingdom and had nearly 75,000 "members in the Society" in 115 circuits. It did not greatly influence either the upper classes or the agricultural laborers. Success was chiefly in the northeast, the west country, and Cornwall. Wesley's greatest trophies were the miners of Kingswood, Cornwall, and Newcastle. The movement also found ready lodging with artisans, small tradesmen, and the workers flooding into the new industrial areas of Lancashire and Yorkshire.

There were reasons for the astonishing spread of the revival. In the early days the England that Wesley traveled on horseback was mainly pastoral and agricultural, and the woolen industry was in the Cotswolds rather than Yorkshire. There were faint indications of the coming industrialism, but the progress was not strongly marked until the later years of George II. Wesley dealt with a population considerably less than in modern London, and the absence of densely crowded towns, together with the open nature of the country, enabled him to address huge crowds in the open air in every part of England.

To evangelize industrial England would have been too great a task for any evangelist, but it was within the compass of a devoted and growing army of preachers and people, and by the end of the century the work could safely be entrusted to Wesley's spiritual children.

Methodist success was also due largely to the parochial and conservative habits, outlook, and machinery of the Church of England. Its strength lay in the south and it was unable to adapt itself to new conditions. In the eighteenth century the parochial system was still the same as at the Reformation. There was not a single bishop in Lancashire or the West Riding of Yorkshire until 1826, when the Bishop of Ripon was appointed. MANCHESTER did not have its bishop until 1847. LEEDS, which early became an important Methodist center, was one parish of 150,000 people until the middle of the century. Because Methodism was more mobile, adaptable, and freer from custom and prejudice, it was able to seize an opportunity which the Church of England lost.

Deeper than these immediate reasons for the growth of the revival was the man and his message. Wesley was a natural leader of men who excited their lively respect, obedience, and affection. The experience of JOHN NELSON, who on MOORFIELDS Commons heard Wesley for the first time must have been similar to that of many. "My heart beat like the pendulum of a clock and when he spoke I thought his whole discourse was aimed at me." When he talked with Wesley he declared that it had been a "blessed Conference . . . When we parted, he took hold of my hand, and looking me full in the face, bade me take care I did not quench the spirit." (Journal of John Nelson in Lives of the Early Methodist Preachers, Vol. 1, p. 36 (London, 1871).) All who met Wesley knew his effortless mastery of men and recognized that he was the undisputed father of his people.

With the man went the message. Wesley declared a Gospel which was an invitation to a more abundant life. He taught men they could accept it by faith; they could enjoy it; and they could possess it to the full. In an age when rationalism had cast a blight upon religion, when enthusiasm was frowned upon, and probability was the guide to life, it was small wonder that the sheep who had not been fed moved quickly to these lush pastures. The Christian faith was invested with color and gaiety because it acquired a new meaning.

In distinction from Charles, who had a quick and fiery temper, John Wesley retained remarkable composure and self-control even under the most serious provocation. His wife was a temerarious woman who could rise to ungovernable fury, but there is no instance of his losing his temper and retorting to her in kind. This evenness of disposition was allied to a magnanimity that prevented him from using the same weapons as his traducers. It was said of his generosity that it knew no bounds except an empty pocket. When his own simple wants were provided he gave away all that he had.

The final impression of the man is the completeness of his dedication to God and the work God gave him to do. He was as frugal and abstemious in habit as he was neat and simple in appearance. As JOHN WHITEHEAD said, "a narrow pleated stock, a coat with a small upright collar, no buckles at his knees, no silk or velvet in any part of his apparel, and a head as white as snow, gave an idea of something primitive and apostolic." (Life of Rev. John Wesley, Vol. 2, p. 485, John Whitehead (London 1796).) He rose early each morning and devoted many hours daily to praying and reading. In no life was the balance between the culture of the soul and the service of the people so exquisitely maintained.

"The Best of All is . . ." In the final decade of the century Wesley had little more than one full year to live, but to the end he made his ambitious itineraries, and he died striving to maintain his promise to serve the Methodist people in Leatherhead. It was fitting that the text of his last sermon should be, "Seek ye the Lord while He may be found, call ye upon Him while He is near."

The next day, feverish and ill, he stayed at Balham, and fought off his sickness sufficiently to write to WILLIAM WILBERFORCE one of the best known of his letters: "Go on in the name of God and in the power of His might, till even American SLAVERY (the vilest that ever saw the sun) shall vanish away before it." (Letters, Vol. 8, p. 265, Feb. 24, 1791.)

He returned to the CITY ROAD CHAPEL in London in growing bodily weakness. Like all the Wesleys he knew how to die well. At first he tried to sing Isaac Watts' hymn, "I'll praise my Maker while I've breath," and later, when singing had become impossible, he made a supreme effort and cried, "The best of all is God is with us."

MEMORIAL TABLET, WESTMINSTER ABBEY

Thus died John Wesley, on March 2, 1791. His life spanned practically the whole of the century.

The funeral took place a week later, and although it was at the very early hour of five o'clock in the morning, it was attended by thousands. When the officiating minister, JOHN RICHARDSON, in the prayer of committal, substituted for "brother" the word "father," the effect was immediate and overwhelming. A low wave of sobbing swept the crowd, because they realized that under God their father had been taken from them. It was a last spontaneous tribute.

Wesley rests in the graveyard of WESLEY'S CHAPEL on City Road in London, which he had formally opened in 1778. Across the street, in the Non-conformist cemetery of BUNHILL FIELDS, is the tomb of his mother, Susanna Wesley. Both of these sacred spots for nearly two centuries have been visited by Methodists from all parts of the world. The life of John Wesley is a story without an ending.

WESLEY, MRS. JOHN. (See Mrs. VAZIELLE.)

WESLEY, KEZIA (1709-1741), the nineteenth and last child of SAMUEL and SUSANNA WESLEY and sister of JOHN and CHARLES, was born at EPWORTH in March 1709. She was somewhat delicate in health, and it may have been for this reason that she developed mentally more slowly than the others. When she was eighteen she became a pupil-teacher at LINCOLN and gave and received instruction for her board only. In a letter to John on Jan. 26, 1729, she speaks of her "want of money and want of clothes." (Stevenson, p. 417) In a second letter six months later she speaks of "my own constant ill health these three years past."

She had a great love for her brothers and wrote in a letter to John on Jan. 20, 1731, of loving him with "more than a sister's love." She longed for him to come to Epworth but feared "the pain of parting if your stay be short will infinitely outweigh the pleasure of seeing you." This letter reveals the loneliness and frustration of a girl who had returned unwillingly to Epworth because she had not sufficient money in Lincoln for proper clothing, and so could not keep her place. Three years after returning home, her sister MARY was married to JOHN WHITE-LAMB; and "Kizzy," her pet name, was the only child remaining at the rectory.

At this juncture the unscrupulous WESTLEY HALL came to the rectory and made love to her. There is no doubt that he proposed marriage and she accepted him. On his return to LONDON, however, he courted and married her sister, MARTHA, who did not know of his attentions to her sister. In a later letter to John, Kezia professed resignation, but there are indications that she felt Hall's desertion keenly, and it may have further affected her health.

John Wesley made arrangements for her to lodge with HENRY PIERS, the friendly vicar of Bexley. She was happy in a household so well disposed to herself and on such excellent terms with her brothers. From here in March 1738, she went to London to care for Charles in his illness. He recovered but she became dangerously ill. It is said that she and Charles received the Holy Communion every day. As John and Martha were specially drawn to each other, so Charles and Kezia were the other's favorite sister and brother. In the last two years of her life they met as frequently as Charles' work permitted.

She died in London on March 9, 1741. There is no indication of the nature of her death, but Charles in his Journal suggests that she died "without pain or trouble" and that she was full of thankfulness, resignation, and love. She was scarcely thirty years of age when she died, and only in the last few years of her life had she known any real anchorage from want and trouble.

MALDWYN L. EDWARDS

WESLEY, MARTHA (c. 1707-1791), sister of JOHN and CHARLES WESLEY, was born at EPWORTH in 1706 or 1707, and was the favorite of her mother. "What my sisters call partiality," she said, "was what they might all have enjoyed had they wished it, which was permission to sit in my mother's chamber when disengaged, to listen to her conversation with others, and to her remarks on books and things out of school hours." (Stevenson, p. 356) At the age of fourteen she went to the home of her uncle, MATTHEW WESLEY, brother of the rector, who practiced medicine in LONDON. For three years she enjoyed the advantages of his home and attended the services at St. Dunston's and St. Paul's Cathedral.

After a stay at Epworth, darkened by an unhappy friendship with JOHN ROMLEY, her father's curate, she returned to London. She was now beautiful, intelligent, and highly attractive, and her earlier disappointment in love made her more ready to return the affection of WESTLEY HALL. At this stage Hall was a friend and fellow student with her brothers at Oxford, and she married him in 1735.

Martha did not know that Westley Hall had already made love to her sister, KEZIA, at Epworth, and that the family were so much puzzled by his change of front that they supposed Martha must have beguiled him. SAMUEL, her brother, actually addressed a poem to her, in which he declared she had "loaded her conscience with her sister's blood." (Family Circle, p. 151)

But the family came to realize that the weakness lay in the husband. After a few years of married happiness he became successively a MORAVIAN, a Quietist, and a Deist. Despite the fact that his wife bore him ten children, of whom nine died in infancy, he had many illicit love affairs.

Because of his temper and his infidelities the Wesley brothers took the one child and provided for his education. He was showing great promise when at school he was smitten with smallpox; his mother rushed to his bedside but he was already dead. By that time Westley Hall had preached and practiced polygamy. He would leave his wife for months at a time and finally departed with a woman to the WEST INDIES. He returned to England, and there is evidence that before he died he was repentant, but he never lived with his wife again.

After being deserted Martha became increasingly attached to Mrs. Charles Wesley and took an almost maternal interest in her nieces and nephews. When Sally Wesley grew up she became Mrs. Hall's most loved and intimate companion. Among Martha's London friends was the famous Dr. Samuel Johnson, and she has her place in Boswell's Life of Johnson.

She was nearest to John Wesley in age and was especially devoted to him. For the greater part of her married life she was dependent upon an allowance which he made to her, and when he died he left her a small legacy from the sale of his books.

ADAM CLARKE, who knew them intimately, was struck by their similarity in habits and in cast of mind, and by the likeness of her handwriting to John's. Even in disposition they were alike. Both had complete self-control, poise, and generosity, and Charles once remarked, "It is vain to give Patty anything to add to her comforts, for she always gives it away to some person poorer than herself." (Adam Clarke, Vol. 2, p. 350) She died on July 12, 1791, and was buried with her brother John in the vault at WESLEY'S CHAPEL in CITY ROAD, London.

WESLEY, MARY (1696-1734), sister of JOHN and CHARLES WESLEY, grew up a cripple, owing to a fall in childhood due to the carelessness of her nurse. This caused the villagers of Epworth to pass unkind comments which she bore without resentment, although in one letter to Charles, she wrote, "I have been the ridicule of mankind and the reproach of my family." (Letter Jan. 30, 1726, Stevenson, p. 289)

She was the family favorite because of her even temper and her desire to be of service. She not only assisted her mother in the management of the home, but was an unpaid secretary to her father. She remained in the rectory until her marriage. When most of the family condemned her sister HETTY for her elopement, it was "Molly," to use her pet name, who remained faithful to Hetty, and when Molly died, Hetty described her in verse as "my tenderest, dearest, firmest friend." (Family Circle, p. 144)

She was one of the few sisters who found true happiness in marriage. JOHN WHITELAMB was a boy from WROOT who had been educated at the school of the village. When he came to the rectory to act as an amanuensis to the rector and to draw wretched illustrations for the Dissertations, the rector tutored him and later secured financial help to enable him to go to Oxford. At Lincoln College he applied himself diligently to his studies. In a letter to his father, John Wesley said,

John Whitelamb reads one English, one Latin, and one Greek book alternately and never meddles with a new one till he has ended the old one. If he goes on as he has begun, I dare take upon me to say that by the time he has been here four or five years, there will not be such a one of his standing in Lincoln College, perhaps not in the University of Oxford. (June 11, 1731)

After his ordination Whitelamb returned as the curate of the parish to declare his love for Molly. The rector was delighted and gave him the living at Wroot. In one year Molly died in childbirth at Wroot in November 1734, and her child was buried with her. For another thirty years he was the rector of Wroot, known for his faithful preaching and pastoral care. He never shared in the Methodist revival but fulfilled conscientiously the labors of a parish priest.

WESLEY, MATTHEW (1661-1737), was the brother of SAMUEL WESLEY, SR., rector of EPWORTH, and the son of the Rev. JOHN WESLEY who died about 1678. From his father he received the rudiments of a classical education, and he may also have received a part of his education in one of the Dissenting academies. There is no record of his receiving a university education, though ADAM CLARKE, earliest biographer of the Wesley family, believed he studied abroad and received a degree at a foreign university. Mrs. Wesley, in a letter to John (1731) said that her brother-in-law, Matthew, "had tried all the spas in Europe, both in GERMANY and elsewhere." (Stevenson p. 37)

His qualifications were probably not high, because in his will he referred to himself as an apothecary. In verses to his memory in the Gentleman's Magazine he was not called a doctor or physician. Nevertheless he seems to have had an extensive practice in LONDON and to have been widely known and respected. He appears to have made a modest fortune, because when at the age of seventy years he determined to visit Epworth, he took a manservant with him, and on arrival was scandalized, in SUSANNA's words, "at the poverty of our furniture and much more at the meanness of the children's habit." (ibid., p. 38)

There is no evidence of any close friendship between the rector and Matthew, and this was due in part to the fact that Matthew remained a Dissenter, and had little sympathy with his brother's rigid Anglicanism. There may have been also differences of temperament. Matthew was a rich man and a "careful economist" who was much scandalized by what appeared to be the improvidence of his brother. When he returned to London he wrote accusing his brother of bad management and begetting offspring for which he could not provide. The rector answered the charges in full, and ending, "I can struggle with the world but not with Providence, nor can I resist sickness, fires and inundations." (Stevenson p. 44)

When the Epworth rectory burned in 1709 Matthew took HETTY and Susanna Wesley, and they stayed with him a considerable time. Hetty repaid his kindness later, not only by nursing him in sickness, but in a poem contributed to the Gentleman's Magazine after his death:

Alas, the sovereign healing art,
Which rescued thousands from the grave,
Unaided left the gentlest heart,
Nor could its skillful master save.

MARTHA WESLEY later lived with him for some years and was treated with great kindness. When she married WESTLEY HALL her uncle gave her four hundred pounds as a marriage portion. In his will nine hundred pounds was divided among some of the children of the Epworth household. Therefore, any coolness between his brother and himself did not disturb his care for those members of the Epworth family who came to stay with him. His London home was open to the three boys as well as the sisters, and he showed compassion to the brilliant but unhappy Hetty Wesley when she married WILLIAM WRIGHT and came to live in London.

MALDWIN L. EDWARDS

WESLEY, MEHETABEL ("HETTY") (1697-1750), sister of JOHN and CHARLES WESLEY, was born at Epworth in 1697. She has been immortalized in the novel by Arthur Quiller-Couch, and she was the most talented and loveliest of the Wesley sisters. As a child she was "gay and sprightly, full of mirth and good-humour and keen wit." It was she who, more than any other member of the family, was plagued by the poltergeist whom the family dubbed "old Jeffrey." During the ghostly disturbances in January, 1716, she trembled and turned uneasily in her sleep, and she found the noises followed her as though under her feet.

As she grew, Hetty was pursued by a number of young men, but they were judged unsuitable either by her parents or herself, though possibly John Romley, the curate, made a certain impression on her. There was found among John Wesley's papers a poetic letter from Hetty to her mother which ended with the words:

Pray speak a word in time of need,
And with my sour-looking parent plead
For your distressed daughter.

This doubtless refers to the rector's disapproval of Romley. The rector's instinct was right, for Romley was a vain, unstable man who came to an early death through alcoholic poisoning.

By the time she was twenty-seven Hetty began to make clandestine appointments with a man whom her father called "an unprincipled lawyer" and eloped with him. He declared his readiness to marry her, but did not do so, and she returned in shame to Epworth rather than continue as his mistress. The rector, who had consistently denounced adultery and punished offenders in his own parish, was horrified at his daughter's conduct. He secured her consent to marry the first to come who sought her hand in marriage.

This proved to be William Wright, a traveling plumber and glazier, who was in every respect unsuited to be her husband, since he had no breeding, education, or good manners. Her sorrow was increased by the successive deaths of the babies born to her. One of her poems, "Mother's Address to a Dying Infant," had the despairing line: "And with the blossom blast the tree!"

These years were made worse by the stiff and uncompromising attitude of the rector and the family at Epworth. Hetty begged, in a long letter to her father on July 3, 1739, for his forgiveness and reconciliation, but the rector never really softened in the harshness of his attitude. Her lot became easier when her mother went to live at the Foundry in 1739, and she was present at her mother's bedside when she died in 1742. During these years Hetty became a Methodist and regularly attended services at the Foundry. Occasionally she received visits from both John and Charles Wesley, and with their help she was able to visit Bristol to seek relief from the curative springs at the Hot Wells. She was virtually an invalid, and in a letter to Charles on October 4, 1745, she spoke of "continuing exceeding weak, keeping my bed except when I rise to have it made, it is almost incredible what a skeleton I am grown, so that my bones are ready to come through my skin." She died on March 21, 1750, at London, and Charles Wesley recorded in his Journal, "I followed her to her quiet grave and wept with them that weep."

Hetty Wesley was a minor poet, and while some poems were printed in the Gentleman's Magazine and a contemporary anthology, others were printed at a later date in the Poetical Register, the Christian Magazine, and the Arminian Magazine. It is not in her poetry, however, but in the drama of her life, unforgettably told by Arthur Quiller-Couch, that Hetty remains as the most highly gifted and yet the most tragic figure in the Epworth family circle.

WESLEY, SAMUEL, Rector of Epworth (1666-1735), father of John and Charles Wesley, was born at Winter-

born Whitchurch, 1666 and after private education till the age of twelve was sent by his widowed mother to a Dissenting academy in London in 1678. From this academy of Mr. Veal's at Stepney he went to that of Charles Morton at Newington Green, and in both centers laid the foundations of an excellent classical education.

At a date and for a cause not known he decided to become an Anglican, and went to Oxford in 1683 with the intention of entering the Church as priest. He became a servitor at Exeter College, which meant that his maintenance was secured by waiting on other students. After five-years' residence in which he secured his degree and published a small book of poems, he was ordained priest on February 24, 1689, by the Bishop of London.

For a year he was chaplain of a man-of-war, but upon his marriage he resigned his position for a curacy in London. In this period he doubled his slender income of thirty pounds by his writings, and especially his share in the Athenian Gazette. In 1691 through the influence of the Marquis of Normanby he received the living at South Ormsby in Lincolnshire. In this village Wesley had the care of three hundred people. He continued his literary work, and in 1693 published The Life of Our Blessed Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ: an Heroic Poem in Ten Books.

When Samuel left South Ormsby to become rector of Epworth early in 1697, he remained for a time chaplain to the Marquis of Normanby, and in 1701 dedicated his History of the Old and New Testament to the nobleman. He stayed at Epworth until his death thirty-nine years later.

In the first period, until 1710, he had to contend with natural disasters such as the three fires of the rectory: in 1702 when two thirds of the building was destroyed; in 1704 when all his flax was lost; and the total destruction of the old rectory in 1709. The floods often destroyed his crops, and he had also to face the surly hostility of the villagers. With the building of the new rectory, however, the attitude of his parishioners changed, and although he was never free from poverty, nor from natural calamities, he was able to work more happily in the parish and with visible signs of success.

In addition to his poems and a printed discourse on the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, with the shortened title of The Pious Communicant Rightly Prepared, Samuel Wesley wrote a commentary on the Book of Job in Latin (Dissertationes in Librum Jobi); in this the Hebrew text was collated with the Chaldee paraphrase and the Septuagint, and with other versions in Syriac, Arabic, Latin, and the English translations of Tyndale and the Authorized Version of 1611. It was extremely erudite, and orientalists such as ADAM CLARKE thought highly of it, but John Wesley's laconic comment was that it "contained immense learning but of a kind which I do not admire." Nothing will remain of all his literary work except his one great hymn on the death of Christ:

Behold the Saviour of mankind
Nailed to the shameful tree!
How vast the love that him inclined
To bleed and die for thee!

Wesley has been justly criticized for the severity of his conduct toward Hetty Wesley when she returned in disgrace after eloping with a faithless suitor. He bears responsibility for her ill-fated marriage, though it is fair to remember that, apart from the three brothers and Mary, all the rest of the family shared his judgment. While he made what provision he could for his daughters, he never fully understood them, and none, apart from Mary, who acted as his secretary for long years, spoke of him with affection, but only with respect. It would be difficult, however, to estimate his influence over his sons.

His married life was happy, but the large family of nineteen children and the constant struggle against poverty, added to his own choleric disposition, often produced squalls. In one instance there was a famous and protracted quarrel over "the rightful sovereign" in which Susanna refused to waver in her loyalty to the exiled Stuarts, and Samuel left home, until the accession of Queen Anne. Despite surface disagreements, each spoke in devoted terms of the other, and in one of his letters to Samuel, Junior, in September, 1706, the rector described his wife as "one of the best of mothers" and urged him to love and reverence her "as much as you can." She in turn replied to her brother Samuel Annesley's criticism of the rector's business inefficiency by saying, "Where he lives, I will live, and where he dies, will I die and there will I be buried. God do so unto me and more also if ought but death part him and me."

Samuel Wesley died at Epworth on April 25, 1735. From his tomb by the side of the church, John Wesley preached on June 6, 1742, when the curate refused to allow him to participate in the service in the church and preached against him.

WESLEY, SAMUEL, JUNIOR (1690-1739), the oldest son of SAMUEL, and the brother of JOHN and CHARLES WESLEY, was born in London on February 10, 1690. He was the only one of the Epworth brood to have private teaching as a child apart from his mother's instruction. For a year he was under the tuition of John Holland, a good but eccentric scholar who kept a private school in Epworth. In 1704 he went to Westminster School, and three years later became a king's scholar and ceased thenceforth to be a financial liability to his parents. The school had a reputation for classical learning, and Samuel quickly became an eager and outstanding student. In his last year he was singled out by Dr. Spratt, Bishop of Rochester, to read to him the classical authors and books of science. It was a striking tribute to Samuel's ability, but he did not appreciate the honor, and in a letter to his father in Latin in August, 1710, he said the bishop had taken him away from his studies and from school "not only without benefit but without pleasure."

However, his merits became known to Francis Atterbury, who succeeded Bishop Spratt the following year as Bishop of Rochester. Chiefly through his influence Samuel secured entrance to Christ Church, Oxford, in 1711. At once he became known among the university wits and scholars. Upon the completion of his degree and the taking of his ordination vows he returned as usher (a master) at Westminster School. He was now able to support the Epworth family, and the rector, his father, said in a letter written February 28, 1733,

You have been a father to your brothers and sisters, especially to the former, who have cost you great sums in your education, both before and since they went to the University. Neither have you stopped here, but have showed your pity to your mother and me in a very liberal manner, wherein you wife joined with you, when you did not overmuch abound yourselves, and have done even noble charities to my children's children. (Family Circle, p. 101.)

Apart from financial help the elder son maintained a regular correspondence with his father and his mother; the letters to the father made inquiries about study, since by this time the relations between them were not tutor and pupil but fellow students. Indeed Samuel, the son, gave his father considerable help in the preparation of the Dissertations. The rector would have liked Samuel to have succeeded him at Epworth, and only when he declined did he turn to John. Even then he enlisted his eldest son's aid in his appeal to John. Samuel took up the plea of his father, but after the interchange of letters, he had to confess himself worsted. As John was not slow to point out, he himself was in a similar position as a clerk in holy orders who was teaching, and yet unwilling to accept the Epworth living, even though his father wished it.

Samuel did not want his brothers to go to Georgia in 1735 and realized that Charles Wesley was totally unfitted to be secretary to General Oglethorpe, but he was unable to convince Charles, who learned from bitter experience that his elder brother had been right. Once back in England Charles and John lodged in turn with Mrs. Hutton, a well-meaning but temperamental family friend. She was puzzled and disturbed by their behavior before their evangelical conversion, and far more so in the days that followed. She communicated her fears to Samuel who did not wait to hear from John, but identified himself wholly with her point of view. She had wondered what might be the effect upon her own sons, but Samuel expressed an equal anxiety for his two brothers, whom he felt in some sense he could call his own sons. Mrs. Hutton then declared that in the new movement converts were expected to have an assurance of forgiveness and to know precisely the day and hour of their conversion. Samuel was alarmed because, as a child of his age, he abhorred "enthusiasm" and as a High Churchman he feared where these irregular practices, and manifestations of feeling, might lead.

John replied in a moderate and reasoned letter on October 30, 1738, but Samuel was not moved from a conviction that the new doctrines were potentially dangerous. John defended himself again, but without success, and the correspondence ceased with Samuel's sudden death in November, 1739. It must be made clear that Samuel praised when praise was possible, and in particular he was very pleased to hear that John had built a charity school, and he wanted a church to be built for the Kingswood colliers. Before he died John heard that Samuel had received "a calm and full assurance of his interest in Christ," and he was inclined to suppose that had he lived, the attitude of Samuel to the revival might have undergone a change.

But Samuel's wholehearted acceptance of High Church views, his detachment from any form of proselytizing, begotten of his chosen way of life, and his own disposition made him unfitted to judge the revival impartially. The disapproval of those first excesses expressed so eloquently by Robert Southey in his famous Life of Wesley would certainly reflect the views of Samuel. The later stages of the revival, involving further departures from established Anglican order, would have pained him even more.

There are four aspects of Samuel's life that are worthy of special mention. He was not only a fine classical scholar but an effective teacher. It was partly because of his tuition that Charles Wesley on coming to Westminster in 1716 became a king's scholar and later captain of the school. There seems little doubt that if he had not avowed Jacobite sympathies, and heroically stood by the banished Francis Atterbury, Samuel might legitimately have hoped for a higher preferment at Westminster instead of continuing as usher. When he lost the undermastership at his school he secured the headmastership of Tiverton Grammar School in 1732. He quickly showed himself a great headmaster, and in the last seven years of his life he added considerably to the numbers of the school.

When he died the whole town and countryside mourned his loss and in the long record of that school no name shines more brightly.

Secondly, tribute must be paid to him as a minor wit and poet of the Augustan age in English poetry. In his Poems on Several Occasions he revealed himself as master of the epigram and witty satire. Samuel Wesley, Junior, also revealed the family gift of hymn writing. None of his hymns survive in modern hymnbooks, but some enjoyed a long popularity. These included the moving hymn on the death of Christ:

See streaming from the accursed tree
His all-atoning blood.

Note his hymn on the worth of Sunday:

The Lord of Sabbath let us praise
In concord with the blest.

Perhaps his best known hymn is a commentary on Isaiah 40:6-8 beginning with the words:

The morning flowers display their sweets,
And gay, their silken leaves unfold;
As careless of the noonday heats,
And fearless of the evening cold.

This ends with the lines,

Perish the grass, and fade the flower,
If firm the word of God remains.

Thirdly, one must remark upon his happy married life. Of the nine children who married, it was only his brother Charles, and possibly Anne, who had similar unbroken happiness. Samuel's wife, Ursula Berry, was the granddaughter of one of the ministers ejected by the Act of Uniformity in 1662; and the daughter of John Berry, who in later life became vicar of Whaddon. Samuel drew a sympathetic portrait of him in his poem, "Parish Priest." Many children were born to them, but apart from a son and daughter, they all died in infancy. The son grew to maturity and then died in June, 1731, to the almost inconsolable grief of his parents. The daughter married a Mr. Earle of Barnstaple, and Stevenson in his Memorials of the Wesley Family quotes a story to the effect that one of her many daughters crossed over to France and married the celebrated Marshal Ney. This hearsay story, however, has never been substantiated and must be dismissed as legend. Many of Samuel's poems were written in praise of his wife; on each of his birthdays, he wrote a poem to her. When he wrote a poem for his sister, Anne, on her marriage to John Lambert he asked only that the union would be as happy as his own.

Be he a husband blest as I,
And thou a wife as good as mine.

Lastly, Samuel inherited Jacobite views from his mother, and sustained his loyalty to the exiled Stuarts until his death. His sympathies were deepened by his friendship with Francis Atterbury, who became Bishop of Rochester in 1713. In 1722 Atterbury was sent to the Tower of London as one of those implicated in a plot to bring the Pretender, Charles Stuart, to the throne of England. Despite his spirited defense before the House of Lords, Atterbury was sentenced to perpetual banishment, and gradually his former friends fell away. But Samuel, who firmly believed in his innocence, not only maintained a correspondence with him, but defended him publicly on every occasion. This may easily have cost him preferment in his own profession, but he never wavered in his loyalty, and Atterbury said in a letter in 1730, "He has shown an invariable regard for me all along in all circumstances, and much more than some of his acquaintances who had ten times greater obligations." His Jacobitism was one more mark of that steadfastness of character which kept him faithful to his family and to his friends whatever the sacrifice involved. Perhaps in the epitaph he suggested for himself there is implicit the recognition of what his loyalties had cost:

Here Wesley lies in quiet rest.
Hated in earnest for his jest,
Here his worldly bustle ends,
Safe from his foes and from his friends.

WESLEY, SAMUEL (1766-1837), son of CHARLES WESLEY, was born at BRISTOL on Feb. 24, 1766. Like his brother CHARLES, Samuel had the instincts of a musician. His father said that "his first attempts were picked up from street-organs . . . ; (Stevenson, p. 491) whilst his brother was playing he used to stand by with his childish fiddle scraping and beating time." By the time he was five years old it was said that Samuel knew all the airs, recitatives, and choruses of "Samson" and the "Messiah" by words and music. Although skilled as a violinist, the organ was his favorite instrument. In LONDON he excited the interest of Lords Barrington, Aylesford, and Dudley, and Sir Watkin Williams Wynne, who were all lovers of Handel's music. A contemporary described Samuel's skill in improvising upon a theme and said he had heard him "give more than fifty variations on a pleasing melody all of which were not only different from each other, but showed excellent taste and judgment." (ibid., p. 496) He was a good classical scholar, and in both Latin and Greek obtained proficiency, but his first and last love was music. In 1779, when he was only thirteen years of age, he gave private concerts and continued for nine years. Samuel played the violin and Charles played the organ.

Toward the end of his father's life Samuel became a convert to the Roman Catholic Church because he said "the Gregorian music had seduced him." Charles Wesley, Sr., however, would not hear of such an explanation. "The loaves and fishes, madam, the loaves and fishes," was his rejoinder to the Duchess of Norfolk, who told him of his son's defection from Protestantism.

There is little doubt that the news saddened the father and cast a shadow over his two remaining years. Samuel's uncle, JOHN WESLEY, wrote him a loving but frank letter in which he begged him as a first step to believe Jesus Christ to be his Savior, "and then I will talk to you of transubstantiation and purgatory." (Letter, Aug. 19, 1784) Shortly after the death of his father and then his uncle, Samuel wrote a pamphlet, Vindex to Verax, attacking doctrinal errors in the Roman Church, and then before he was thirty he renounced Romanism altogether.

In 1793 he married Charlotte Martin in an Anglican Church but later entered into a liaison with Sarah Suter, by whom he had several children, including SAMUEL SEBASTIAN WESLEY. His home in Barnet was frequently visited by Mrs. Charles Wesley, his mother, and by his sister. When he moved to London he continued to occupy an apartment in his mother's house. By this time he was known and admired for scholarship and wit as well as for his music. He gave concerts in many towns and cities, but in 1817 he became gravely ill and for two years was compelled to retire from public life. Upon recovery he became organist at Camden Town and in Ely Place. In 1826 he discovered in the library of the Fitzwilliam Museum three hymn tunes of Handel and set them to three of his father's hymns: "Sinners Obey the Gospel Word," "O, Love Divine how Sweet Thou Art," "Rejoice the Lord is King."

Despite contemporary praise for his musical compositions, he left no enduring music, but at his funeral on Oct. 11, 1837, his son, Samuel Sebastian Wesley, was present, and it was through him that his father gave his greatest gift to the world of music.

WESLEY, SAMUEL SEBASTIAN (1810-1876), son of the musician SAMUEL by his mistress, Sarah Suter, and grandson of CHARLES WESLEY, was born in London on Aug. 14, 1810. He received instruction from his father, and in 1819 was chosen as one of the choristers at St. James' Chapel Royal, where he remained eight years. His musical education in singing and piano was enlarged by the duty of choristers to assist in special concerts.

In 1827 he was appointed organist at St. James, Hampstead Road, London, and in 1829 at St. Giles, Camberwell. Other preferments followed, until in 1832 he became organist at Hereford Cathedral. Here he married the sister of the dean and became the father of five sons and one daughter. In 1842 he accepted the post of organist in Leeds Parish Church during the incumbency of the celebrated Dr. Hook.

After seven years he went to Winchester Cathedral, and for fifteen years was organist there. More than any other musician he was called upon to give organ recitals at the opening of organs throughout the country. During his stay at Winchester two of his sons were ordained priests and two became doctors.

Finally in 1865 he became organist at Gloucester Cathedral, where he remained till his death. In 1872 he published some of his psalm tunes under the title The European Psalmist. Perhaps his best remembered published work is Twelve Anthems, which contains anthems in general use by cathedrals and parish churches. He died at Gloucester on April 19, 1876, and was buried at Exeter by the side of his only daughter. He ranks among the very greatest of English composers of church music.

WESLEY, SARAH (1759-1828), daughter of Charles Wesley, was born at Bristol on April 1, 1759. It seems that like her mother she was very beautiful until an attack of smallpox marred her appearance. She had a great love for reading, and her brother Charles, Junior, said, "She devoured books from the age of six and taught herself to write an original print hand." Like her two brothers she had a good ear and a fine taste for music, but unlike them she was unwilling to give to musical practice what she could give to reading books. Indeed she shunned company "except for the good Methodist or Quakers," and when she went out a book was in her hand.

She was a great favorite of John Wesley, and he once refused to let his wife's ill conduct prevent him from taking Sally on an outing they had planned together. Charles wanted John to return to Bristol to prevent his wife from publishing injurious statements against him, but John replied, "Brother, when I devoted to God my ease, my time, my life, did I except my reputation? No. Tell Sally I will take her to Canterbury to-morrow." (Journal, Vol. 6, p. 89.) When John wrote to her following the death of Charles, whom she had watched over so long with such tender care, he signed himself, "Dear Sally, Yours invariably, J. Wesley."

Sally was also much loved by her aunt, MARTHA WESLEY, and in the last ten years of Martha's life, she and Sally were often in each other's company; and through her aunt, Sally was introduced to the great Dr. Samuel Johnson. She was encouraged to show him her poetry, and he said to her aunt, "Madam, she will do."

She was always attached to Bristol, and she and her brother Charles returned there in 1828 to refresh their memories and, on Sally's part, to recover her health. Unhappily, the malady developed, and it was in Bristol that she died on September 19, 1828. She was buried in St. James' Churchyard.

WESLEY, SARAH GWYNNE (1726-1822), wife of CHARLES WESLEY, was born of wealthy parents in Garth, Breconshire. Her father was a magistrate and squire, and nine children and twenty servants comprised his household. In addition there were generally guests, and night and morning the domestic chaplain read prayers with family and friends. She had known JOHN and CHARLES WESLEY since August 1747, when they stayed five days with the family while Charles was on the way to IRELAND. He returned seven months later, and Sarah Gwynne helped to nurse him from his illness. She went with her father in June 1748 to see the Methodist work in BRISTOL, after visiting Oxford.

On Saturday, April 8, 1749, Charles and she were married, and after much separation due to his preaching tours, they settled down in Bristol in September 1749. In 1753 she was attacked by smallpox which destroyed her beauty.

Eight children were born in Bristol, but five died in infancy and were buried in St. James' Churchyard in the Horsefair; the three who survived went with their parents to LONDON in 1771, and the two sons soon became known in musical circles. The house at No. 1 Chesterfield Street, Marylebone, was the home of Mrs. Wesley for thirty years, and here she entertained the distinguished people who attended the musical concerts given by her two sons.

Generally on Sundays she worshiped at West Street Chapel, but when WESLEY CHAPEL on City Road was opened, she often attended there, despite the distance. In 1788 her husband died after a happy marriage of thirty-nine years. From that time until his own death, John Wesley not only wrote to her constantly but saw that she was well cared for. After John's death, WILLIAM WILBERFORCE, who felt himself under obligation to both Charles and John, made over to Mrs. Charles Wesley an annuity of sixty pounds annually for thirty years until her death at the advanced age of ninety-six years. Her son Charles and her daughter Sarah never married, and remained with her until the close of her life. She died in 1822 and was buried in the same vault as Charles Wesley in the old churchyard of St. Marylebone in London. Later her two sons were also buried there.

SUSANNA WESLEY

WESLEY, SUSANNA (1669-1742), mother of JOHN and CHARLES WESLEY, was born in London on January 20, 1669, was the "Mother of Methodism" and one of the greatest women in the religious history of the British people. She was the twenty-fifth child of the learned and celebrated SAMUEL ANNESLEY, the leader of Dissenting ministers in London during the reign of Charles II. He was in charge of St. Helen's, Bishopsgate, when SAMUEL WESLEY married Susanna, his lively and beautiful daughter, in 1688, and there he continued in great peace and industry until his death in 1696.

Susanna's married life lasted about forty-six years, thirty-nine of which were spent at Epworth. Of her nineteen children, ten survived infancy, and all the seven girls and three sons were uncommonly gifted. This was due in part to her remarkable method of education. As soon as they could speak they were taught the Lord's Prayer and later some collects, a catechism, and portions of Scripture. Each day they had six hours of school, and in "a quarter of a year could read better than most women could do as long as they live." The fire of 1709 broke this strict regime, and when the children were dispersed into several families Susanna lamented that "they got knowledge of several songs and bad things," and also "a clownish accent and many rash ways." Not without difficulty she brought them back into the old paths and even added the singing of Psalms at the beginning and ending of school. After the general retirement at 5 P.M. the eldest took the youngest, and the second the next, for a reading of the Psalm and lesson for the day.

Not only did she teach her children collectively, but she set apart a period each week to instruct them individually. Later in life John referred to the Thursday she set apart for him and said in a letter, "If you can only spare me that little part of Thursday evening which you formerly bestowed upon me in another manner, I doubt not it would be as useful now for correcting my heart, as it was then for forming my judgment."

As they grew older she instructed them not only in letters to absent members of the family but in manuals designed for them all. The first essay, rewritten in 1712, was an argument for the existence of God and his essential nature and attributes. More important was her commentary on the Apostles' Creed; article by article, she made distinctive and penetrating remarks. This applies especially to her teaching on the Holy Spirit who "leads us into all the truth, helps our infirmities, assures us of our adoption, and will be with the Holy Catholic Church to the end of the world."

The last treatise she wrote was an exposition of the Ten Commandments, because she believed that the creed and the commandments contained "a summary of the moral law."

When her husband died she went to stay for a short time with her daughter, MARTHA, and her son-in-law, Westley Hall. It was while receiving the Sacrament at his hands that she received a full assurance that she was the child of God. "While my son Hall was pronouncing these words in delivering the cup to me, 'The blood of our Lord Jesus Christ' which was given for thee,' the words struck through my heart and I knew God for Christ's sake had forgiven me all my sins."

This experience predisposed her to accept the strange and irregular ecclesiastical behavior of her sons in the first days of the revival, and after the death of Samuel, Junior, to live at the Foundry, which John Wesley in 1739 had purchased for his Methodist people in London. Here she was close to her daughter, Martha, and also to Hetty in Soho. Another daughter, Anne, was not far away at Hatfield, and Kezzy was in the family of the friendly vicar of Bexley. But chiefly she was now at the heart of the new Methodist movement and took her full part in the Foundry services. The woman who had once taken Sunday evening services in the rectory kitchen during the absence of her husband in convocation in London was the very person to stand as champion of THOMAS MAXFIELD, the first lay preacher. John Wesley took his mother's advice and listened to Maxfield and then threw away his prejudices. "It is the Lord; let Him do what seemeth Him good. What am I that I should withstand God?"

Susanna had argued better than she realized, for the revival could not have spread without its lay preachers. It was her greatest contribution to the Methodists. When she died on July 30, 1742, all her family in London was gathered around her. Just before she died she said, "Children, as soon as I am released sing a Psalm of praise to God." Until she actually lapsed into unconsciousness her last hours were in happy communion with God. The "innumerable company of people" who gathered for the burial service was an indication of the respect and affection in which she was held, and John Wesley recorded in his Journal that it was one of the most solemn assemblies he ever saw or expected to see. She was laid to rest fittingly in Bunhills Fields, City Road, close to the graves of John Bunyan and Isaac Watts, and only a stone's throw from the site where Wesley's Chapel was later to be built and John Wesley was buried.

Quite apart from the fact that she was the mother of John and Charles, she has her own imperishable place in the Methodist story because of her saintliness of character. The uninspired lines of Charles Wesley engraved on her tombstone must not be taken as the final reflection of the son upon his mother's life. It is in a funeral hymn written shortly after her death, and beginning

What are these arrayed in white,
Brighter than the noonday sun, that he did justice to her memory, and two lines catch the essence of her timeless appeal:

God resides among his own,
God doth in His saints delight.

WESLEY, SUSANNA "SUKEY" (1695-1764), sister of JOHN and CHARLES WESLEY, was born at South Ormsby in 1695. In her early days ADAM CLARKE found her to be "good natured, very facetious, and a little romantic." (Adam Clarke, Vol. 2, p. 271.) After the rectory fire at Epworth in 1709 the family was dispersed, and Sukey went to stay with her uncle MATTHEW WESLEY in London. Then she stayed with a maternal uncle, Samuel Annesley, before she sailed for India.

She made an unfortunate marriage with Richard Ellison. Mrs. Wesley declared that her son-in-law was "a gentleman of good family but a coarse, vulgar, immoral man." The father was even more scathing in condemnation; he said that Dick Ellison was the "ven" of his family, and his company was no more pleasant than all his physic. This seemed to be the general opinion of the Wesley family. Martha said, "He wanted all but riches," while Samuel, Junior, thought that he prided himself on the fact that he had neither religion, manners, nor good nature.

Ellison's wealth vanished, due partly to his own profligacy, and also due to the destruction of his house by fire and the flooding of his lands for two years because of the neglect of the commissioner of sewers. Sukey left him when his "harsh, despotic and coarse nature" made him quite intolerable, and because "under his unkindness she well nigh sank into the grave."

When he had been reduced to poverty, he came to London to seek help from John Wesley. John, who never refused any appeal for help, secured assistance from the charitable Mr. Butterfield and showed him such kindness that he underwent a change of heart and attended the services at the Foundery. Charles Wesley, writing to his wife on April 11, 1760, said, "Yesterday evening I buried my brother Ellison. Sister Macdonald, whom he was always fond of, prayed with him in his last moments. He told her he was not afraid to die, and believed God, for Christ's sake, had forgiven him. I felt a most solemn awe overwhelming me whilst I committed his body to the earth." Sukey survived him four years, and it is probable that although they were never reunited as man and wife, they knew each other in a restored relationship as fellow Methodists. She divided her last years among her children, four of whom survived infancy. She died on Dec. 7, 1764, in London.

WESLEY BANNER AND REVIVAL RECORD was a monthly British Methodist periodical of revival news for local preachers, leaders, and members, edited by a Wesleyan Methodist minister, SAMUEL DUNN (1797-1882). It commenced in the unpromising year of 1849. The Papers on Wesleyan Matters, a publication which supported the conservative element in Wesleyan Methodism, and the Wesleyan Times, a journal which supported the Wesleyan reforming party, had already appeared, and mutual recrimination over these publications and the Conference "test" declaration condemning the FLY SHEETS was growing. Dunn was critical of the Conference administration and could not refrain from comment in the Wesley Banner. The Banner at once incurred suspicion; revivalism as well as reform was held to be a disruptive influence in the 1840's. Dunn himself realized this when he himself wrote that he was accused of enmity to Methodism in polity. This was in the Wesley Banner, April 13, 1849. The fact that WILLIAM GRIFFITH was associated with Dunn in the Wesley Banner in no way allayed official suspicion. Dunn was charged at the 1849 Derby and Nottingham District Meeting with contravening Methodist law and disturbing the peace of the societies through the Banner. The District Meeting called for its discontinuance; Dunn refused and appealed to the Annual Conference. At the 1849 Conference, along with Griffith and JAMES EVERETT, Dunn was questioned by the president concerning the authorship of the Fly Sheets; and when he refused to give a simple, categorical answer, a special committee was set up to go into his whole case. The judgment of the District Meeting on the Wesley Banner was confirmed, the publication being described as "the organ of a small minority avowedly designed, by appeals to the public, to correct the administration of Methodism, thus attempting to supersede the authority of the District Meeting and of the Conference" (Minutes of the Wesleyan Conference, 1849). The end of the Banner was demanded as a condition of Dunn's continuance in the ministry; when he refused the Conference expelled him. It was not surprising that the Banner became more outspoken after Dunn's expulsion. It then described the 1835 declaratory laws as "steeped in apostasy and unbelief," and as "false in its statements and wicked in its principles." For a while, it became a typical publication of the Wesleyan reforming party, but after a few years petered out altogether. It has been correctly stated that it is a remarkably dull book to read in its volume form.

WESLEY COLLEGE, Bristol. (See DIDSBUY COLLEGE, Manchester.)

WESLEY COLLEGE, Dover, Delaware, was established by the Wilmington Conference in 1873 as Wilmington Conference Academy. In 1918, it was rechartered as Wesley Collegiate Institute, with junior college instruction beginning in 1922. The college was closed from 1939 to 1942, when it reopened as Wesley Junior College. The present name was assumed in 1958. The governing board has thirty-six members, nominated by the board and elected by the PENINSULA ANNUAL CONFERENCE.

WESLEY COLLEGE, Dublin, Ireland. This school was originally founded in 1845 as the Wesleyan Methodist Connexional School at St. Stephen's Green, DUBLIN. Among its early pupils were Sir Robert Hart and George Bernard Shaw. In 1872 a new site was purchased; it was to the side and rear of the Methodist Centenary Church, St. Stephen's Green, Dublin, and there Wesley College was established in 1879. For many years the school was only for boys, but in 1911 girls were admitted, and it became one of the few coeducational secondary schools in the country, for even today the majority of such schools in the Republic of IRELAND are single-sex.

The main College building was designed for some 250 pupils, and the boys' boarding department was there. With the success of the school numbers grew. Two boarding houses for girls and another for junior boys were opened in more residential areas of the city, but easy of access to St. Stephen's Green.

In 1964 a new site of over fifty acres was obtained at Ludford Park, on the south side of the city, and about five miles from the center. A complete transfer of all departments came about in 1969. The school has become the largest Protestant secondary school in the Republic, with 533 pupils (272 boys and 261 girls); 352 of these are day pupils and 181 are boarders (1966-67).

The Connexional School was under the cumbersome dual control of a Governor (always a minister) and a Headmaster (usually, though not always, a layman). The first Governor was Robinson Scott. Perhaps the most important name from the early period is that of Robert Crook, who for a period (1856-62) held both offices. When the school was established as Wesley College, Thomas McKee was Governor and Maxwell McIntosh was Headmaster. As they both left in the same year, 1891, the opportunity was then taken to combine the two offices into one principal, viz.: Samuel Hollingsworth 1891-99; William Crawford 1899-1910; Thomas J. Irwin 1910-45; Mortimer Temple 1945-47; and Gerald G. Myles 1947-.

WESLEY COLLEGE of Grand Forks, North Dakota, is the outgrowth of the Red River Valley University, a Methodist liberal arts college launched in Wahpeton, N. D., in 1892. From the beginning the Wahpeton venture was beset with financial difficulties.

In 1899, E. P. ROBERTSON became president of the institution, a post he was to fill until his retirement in 1931. In 1906 the school adopted the name of Wesley College and was relocated at Grand Forks. There it became affiliated with the University of North Dakota, and a campus was acquired directly adjacent to the university. The college discontinued all of its work except speech, music, and religion. Other courses necessary for a B.A. degree were taken at the university. For many years it continued to grant the B.A. degree.

The Wesley College program included dormitories for both men and women, a chapel and a WESLEY FOUNDATION for Methodist students, a dining hall, and other activities. In January, 1965, the trustees decided to sell their existing buildings to the university and to concentrate future efforts on offering religion courses within the university's department of religion and ministering to Methodist students at the university. Plans have been projected for a new Wesley Center of Religion to serve as the future Wesley College work.

WESLEY COLLEGE, Greenville, Texas, originally opened in 1902 as an independent school in Terrell, Texas called Terrell University. It became a Methodist school in 1905 under the presidency of J. J. Morgan, with the name of North Texas University School. In 1909 it became a junior college and was renamed Wesley College; and in 1912 was relocated in Greenville, Texas on a twenty-acre campus. It carried on excellent work for some years, but competition by state schools and later the Great Depression of the 1930's caused its closing in 1934.

WESLEY COLLEGE, Headingley, LEEDS, one of the THEOLOGICAL COLLEGES of the Wesleyan Methodist Church, dates from September, 1868, and was the first of the Methodist theological institutions to be built entirely as a college. It served especially the special interests of Methodism in the northeast of England, but in the interests of economy and efficiency it was closed in 1968 and amalgamated with DIDSURY COLLEGE, Bristol, and thereupon was renamed Wesley College.

NORMAN P. GOLDHAWK

WESLEY COLLEGE (Manitoba), the first liberal arts college of the Methodist Church in western CANADA, received its charter from the Manitoba legislature in 1877, the same year in which the University of Manitoba was incorporated and but seven years after the province itself was formed. Manitoba College had already been established in 1871 in the Red River Settlement by the Presbyterian Church. In June 1938, thirteen years after the formation of THE UNITED CHURCH OF CANADA, these two institutions were joined by legislative enactment to form the present United College, Winnipeg.

The "special" conference in Manitoba, held in 1872, "drew the attention of the church to the desirableness of an early effort to establish a college at WINNIPEG." Following an appeal for aid at the Methodist Conference in London, Ontario, the next June, George Young was authorized to collect money in the East for such a college. With the $6,000 subscribed he was able to open on Nov. 3, 1873, the Manitoba Wesleyan Institute in a building adjacent to the first Grace Church at the corner of Main Street and Water Avenue.

Starting with an enrollment of forty-seven students in its three departments, primary, elementary, and secondary, the institute carried on for four years. Although in 1877 the enrollment was seventy-one, the shortage of students and funds brought the closing of the school in the spring of that year. The subsequent influx of new settlers, the growth of business, and the growing demand for better provisions for college training, led to the utilization of the 1877 charter. In 1886 the board of Wesley College met with a special committee of the Manitoba and Northwest Conference of the Methodist Church to consider "the establishment of a theological Institute." It was decided unanimously to proceed with the foundation of Wesley College, and in October 1888 affiliation with the University of Manitoba was approved by the University Council.

Meanwhile the board undertook to raise funds, obtain administrative and teaching staff, acquire facilities, and provide courses. J. W. SPARLING, of Kingston, ONTARIO, agreed to become principal; R. R. COCHRANE was appointed professor of mathematics and classics, and G. J. LAIRD of science and modern languages. In October 1888 these two professors and seven students opened the first classes of Wesley College in Grace Church. A year later, in rented quarters at 12 Albert Street, Andrew Stewart introduced classes in theology, English, and history. From 1890 to 1895 the college was located in a brick building on Broadway at Edmonton Street. In 1892 J. H. RIDDELL was added to the staff in classics, and a year later W. F. OSBORNE in English and French. These six men formed the administrative and teaching staff during the college's formative years.

With an enrollment of eighty-three in the session of 1894-95, and with increasing demands on staff, it became obvious that a new and permanent home must be obtained. Foreseeing this need, the Conference of 1891 had recommended the purchase of a new site. In January 1896 the new four-story, residential college, built of Calgary sandstone on a five-acre site bounded by Portage and Ellice Avenues, was opened. This building, constructed for $75,000, still stands as a distinctive unit in the extensive complex of United College and is now called Wesley Hall. It was followed by Sparling Hall (women's residence), 1912, George Bryce Hall (library and theology department), 1951; Manitoba Hall (arts and science) and Ashdown Hall (reading room and offices), 1959; Graham Hall (men's residence) and Riddell Hall (gymnasium-auditorium and dining room), 1963. The names of these seven buildings, which accommodate about sixteen hundred students, commemorate the vision, idealism, and dedication of those pioneer Christians who helped found Wesley College, and symbolize the historic steps which led to the amalgamation of Wesley and Manitoba Colleges into a single institution, United College.

The first graduating class in 1890 consisted of two persons, Miss Berta Earle and John D. Hunt. This seems to have established Wesley College as a coeducational institution. Thus when a permanent women's residence was provided, the board named it Sparling Hall in tribute to J. W. Sparling, the competent and popular first principal who held office from 1888 to 1912.

Riddell Hall commemorates the work of two distinguished Canadians: John H. Riddell, professor of classics (1893-1903) at Wesley College, founder and first principal of ALBERTA COLLEGE in Edmonton, who was recalled to Wesley College as principal in 1917, at a time of great peril to both college and nation, and who would lead it through difficult times to the amalgamation with Manitoba College in 1938, and his son, R. G. Riddell, before his untimely death in 1951, a prominent diplomat.

Graham Hall, in recognition of W. C. GRAHAM, first principal (1938-55) of United College, was adopted as the name of the men's residence in Wesley Hall before being transferred to the new building erected during the regime of his successor, W. C. Lockhart.

Ashdown Hall bears a name to which the community during Wesley College's half-century and succeeding generations are greatly indebted. Probably no other family has contributed more generously than the three generations of Ashdowns. James H. Ashdown, Sr., prominent hardware merchant and former mayor of Winnipeg, served Wesley College from 1888 to 1924 successively as bursar, vice-chairman, and chairman of the board.

The bronze memorial plaque placed on the chapel of United College by the Historic Sites and Monuments Board of Canada honors the life and work of George Bryce teacher, administrator, and historian, who established Manitoba College and became its first professor. Manitoba Hall retains the honored name of Manitoba College itself.

From the outset, Wesley College included three areas of instruction: a preparatory or collegiate division, a faculty of theology, and a faculty of arts and science. Initially there was much individual tutoring and mutual interchange between these departments, but eventually they were separated into three distinct yet complementary units. The basic courses in the collegiate department have been those authorized by the Provincial Department of Education, chiefly for grades eleven and twelve. The faculty of theology provides courses leading to a diploma in theology, and the bachelor of divinity degree. While the college was affiliated with the University of Manitoba, the curriculum, examinations, and degrees in arts and science were those of the University.

From its inception Wesley College worked in fairly close collaboration with the university and with other affiliated colleges, particularly with its neighbor, Manitoba College. This involved, not only representation on the university council and on various special committees, but also an increasing interchange of instructors and classroom accommodation. Indeed for one year, 1913-14, Manitoba and Wesley Colleges submerged their identities in a working arrangement under which both faculties and student bodies operated as "United College." This experiment in cooperation coincided with the start of a period of crises and controversy in Manitoba's educational evolution precipitated by war, financial stringency, and conflicting ideas about university development in Manitoba. A measure of stability was achieved, however, by the amalgamation of Wesley and Manitoba Colleges in 1938.

United College, which by 1967 had an enrollment approaching two thousand and a staff of about ninety, continues to represent a cross-section of the community. Initially most Wesley College students were Anglo-Saxons whose parents came from Eastern Canada or the British Isles. The staff had similar backgrounds, with most members coming from such Eastern institutions as Victoria College, the University of Toronto, and Queen's University. Later, as new immigrants arrived, the pattern changed; both groups were enriched by the addition of Icelandic, Mennonite, Ukrainian, Oriental, and other new Canadian elements. There are over thirty ethnic groups and about as many religious faiths represented in the student enrollment.

When Wesley College emerged from its half-century of establishing roots, of planning the nature and direction of a growth commensurate with the demands of the new West, it brought into United College a rich tradition, a record of achievement, a liberal philosophy, and an ecumenical approach. These should be assets in this complex world in which to the usual areas of social concern at the local, national, and international level have been added new and often frustrating complications.

A listing of Wesley graduates who have distinguished themselves in various fields of interest would be impressive, but they would present no common mold or pattern. Within the church and its college in the West were undoubtedly represented from the outset as wide a variety of beliefs, attitudes, ideals, prejudices, hopes, fears, and frustrations as in any other community. In most classrooms, as in congregations and on busy streets, the types ranged from the quiet, conservative, conformist, and demonstrative idealists to the most skeptical, analytical, and socially minded realists. Indeed, SALEM C. BLAND, a member of the staff from 1904 to 1917 and a widely-known exponent of the social gospel, used to maintain that the Christian church should be big enough and discerning enough to cater to the essential needs of all such groups. That Wesley College encouraged this comprehensive perspective is symbolized most clearly in the career of J. S. WOODSWORTH, one of its most distinguished sons—a man who sought in his long career as preacher and reformer to explain the ultimate social implications of Christian love.

In 1967 United College became the University of Winnipeg.

WESLEY DAY. John Wesley recorded in his Journal that at 8:45 P.M. on Wednesday, May 24, 1738, in a society room in ALDERSGATE STREET, London, his "heart was strangely warmed." He went on: "I felt I did trust in Christ, Christ alone, for salvation; and an assurance was given me that He had taken away my sins, even mine, and saved me from the law of sin and death."

Although the interpretation of this experience (often known as Wesley's "evangelical conversion"), and even its importance to him, is still being debated by scholars, most Methodists have recognized it as an epochal event in his life, from which sprang successful evangelism if not the initial desire to evangelize. In order both to commemorate the event and to seek a renewal of the spirit of evangelism British Methodists during this century have held special services on this day, whether it fell on a Sunday or during the week. This observance was begun by the London Mission Committee in 1924 with a procession of witness and an open air evangelistic campaign in Hyde Park attended by many thousands. In following years observances on a smaller scale were encouraged by the British branch of the INTERNATIONAL METHODIST HISTORICAL SOCIETY, and were especially memorable in 1938, the bicentenary of the event.

At the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL meeting in Oxford in 1951 the function of Wesley Day was extended to ALDERSGATE SUNDAY, "the Sunday falling upon or immediately preceding Wesley Day," which was endorsed by the Council as "an occasion for remembering the faith of our founders and for rededicating ourselves in universal fellowship to the spreading of scriptural holiness throughout the world."

WESLEY DEACONESS ORDER owes its origin to the work of deaconesses in New Testament times, to the revival of that work within the Protestant Church in 1833 by Pastor Theodor Fliedner at Kaiserswerth on the Rhine, and to the need for the work of women in the big city missions begun in British Methodism in the 1880's.

In 1890 Thomas B. Stephenson founded the Wesley Deaconess Order within the WESLEYAN METHODIST CHURCH, with headquarters at Mewburn House, Bonner Road, LONDON. In the following year, THOMAS J. COPE founded a similar order with the UNITED METHODIST FREE CHURCHES with headquarters at Bowron House, Wandsworth Common. In 1895 J. Flanagan established a Sisters' Settlement linked with St. George's Hall in the Old Kent Road, London, to serve the PRIMITIVE METHODIST CHURCH. The course of the first two orders ran parallel; both met with initial suspicion and opposition, and both were eventually recognized by their respective Conferences in 1907.

In those days of widespread poverty, with no national health scheme, no old-age pensions, and no unemployment benefits, much of the work of the deaconesses was social, and they used to good effect their nursing and first-aid training. But from the first, their tasks were predominantly spiritual. From 1894 missionary service played an increasing part in their work, and by 1907 they were serving in SOUTH AFRICA, CEYLON, NEW ZEALAND, West Africa, CHINA, and INDIA.

In 1902 the Wesleyan order transferred its training center and administrative headquarters to Ilkley, Yorkshire, where students received a one-year course of training, extended to two years in 1928. After Methodist Union, twenty-five deaconesses from Primitive Methodism, fifty-seven from United Methodism, and 298 from Wesleyan Methodism joined to form one order with 380 members in 1935, and the college at Ilkley became its headquarters. In 1936 Conference accepted a Service for the Ordination of Deaconesses, and later conferences stressed the need to give deaconesses full opportunity for collegiality with ministers and for initiative and leadership in the Church.

The provisions of the welfare state lessened the need for much of the social work previously undertaken by deaconesses, and they were given new and varied opportunities for service, in addition to the continuing work in City Missions and circuit chapels. Caravan Campaigns began in 1934; chaplaincies in the army and air force began in 1940; and many deaconesses have full pastoral charge of churches in rural areas and on new housing estates. Every active member of the order is a local preacher.

Candidates, who must intend life service, are accepted by the General Committee of the Order, which is appointed by and answerable to Conference, for the order is a department of the church. Training includes Old and New Testament study, theology, church history, psychology, homiletics, and deaconess work in theory and practice. In their third year after leaving college, probationers are ordained into the full membership of the order by the president of the Conference at the annual convocation of the order.

WESLEY FAMILY. The family into which JOHN and CHARLES WESLEY were born was certainly both ancient and honorable, although the family tree furnished by GEORGE J. STEVENSON in his Memorials of the Wesley Family must be treated with great caution as highly speculative, especially in the earlier centuries. We are only on safe ground in the seventeenth century, with the Wesleys' Puritan ancestors, and even here many problems remain. John Wesley himself was nothing like as interested in his ancestry as we are, though he did wax enthusiastic about the thought of four generations of his family "preaching the gospel, nay, and the genuine gospel, in a line." (Wesley, Letters, V, 76.) He was referring to Charles and himself, their father, and their paternal grandfather and great-grandfather, both of whom were among the ejected ministers of 1662.

About the great-grandfather, Bartholomew Westley, very little is known for certain, except that he was the minister of the combined parishes of Charnmouth and Catherston in Dorset at the time of King Charles II's narrow escape after the battle of Worcester, that in 1662 he was ejected from Allington, and that thereafter he made his living as a physician until his burial in Lyme Regis on Feb. 15, 1670/71. Much more is known about his son JOHN WESTLEY (c. 1636-1678?), especially from a lengthy account published by Edmund Calamy in his Continuation of the Account of Ministers . . . ejected (1727). He was arrested after "preaching at a meeting," and contracted a fatal illness "by lying on the cold earth" in prison. Conflicting evidence exists about the date of his death, which took place either in 1670 or 1678. John Westley had a large family, of whom MATTHEW (1661-1737) became a London physician, and SAMUEL (1662-1735) the rector of Epworth.

In 1683 Samuel Wesley deserted the Dissenters to become a priest in the CHURCH OF ENGLAND, instilling in his own children a love of his adopted church. In 1688 he married SUSANNA (1669-1742), apparently the twenty-fifth child of Dr. SAMUEL ANNESLEY (c. 1620-96), one of the leading London Dissenters, though she herself (like her husband) was a convert from Dissent to the Church of England. Dr. Annesley's second wife was a daughter of the Puritan and Parliamentary John White (1590-1645). John Wesley appears to have believed that another of his great-grandfathers (this time on the paternal side) shared the same name, being John White (1574-1648), the "Patriarch of Dorchester" and founder of Massachusetts, but this has been strongly contested by White's biographer, Frances Rose-Troup.

Samuel Wesley continued to spell his name with a "t" long after his marriage, and this spelling was also used for a time by at least some of his children, including the most famous, John. Samuel and Susanna Wesley appear to have had nineteen children, though biographical data have not been traced for all of these. Nine died in infancy. Ten survived—three boys and seven girls. The oldest was SAMUEL Wesley, Jr. (1690-1739), like his brothers an Anglican clergyman and a poet, who was somewhat distressed at the furore created by John and Charles during the months immediately preceding his death. The following child, baptized Susanna after her mother on March 31, 1692, died just over a year later, shortly after the birth of Emilia Wesley, who was baptized Jan. 13, 1692/3. In her middle years EMILY married an Epworth tradesman, Robert Harper, but he did not treat her well, and she moved to London, making one of her brother's Foundry circle, and dying about 1771. After Emily came twin brothers, baptized Annesley and Jediah on Dec. 3, 1694, one of them dying a month later, the other a year and a month later. Then came SUSANNA, apparently born in 1695, whose marriage to Richard Ellison also turned out badly. She died in LONDON in 1764. The next child was MARY, apparently born in 1696, who on Dec. 21, 1733 married her father's protégé, JOHN WHITELAMB, died in childbirth, and on Nov. 1, 1734 was buried in her husband's church at WROOT. After Mary came MEHETABEL ("Hetty"), who was involved in a liaison with an anonymous lawyer, and gained a name for her unborn child by marrying William Wright, a plumber of Louth, on Oct. 13, 1725. Her tragic years ended with her burial in London on March 21, 1749/50.

After Hetty there is a serious gap in our knowledge of the Wesley children, due largely to the destruction both of the Epworth parish registers and of the contemporary transcripts made from them. There seems to have been at least one child born during each of the years 1698, 1699, and 1700, and according to family tradition two of them were boys named John and Benjamin. If the parents' belief that they had had nineteen children is correct, the first of these births was probably of twins who died in infancy. The one certain fact is that on May 16, 1701, Susanna Wesley bore twins once more, and the following day Samuel wrote to the Archbishop of York: "Last night my wife brought me a few children. There are but two yet, a boy and a girl, and I think they are all at present. We have had four in two years and a day, three of which are living." From this time we have the documentary evidence of the transcripts from his registers which Samuel Wesley prepared for the Bishop of Lincoln. These show that on May 31 the twins were baptized, the one John Benjamin (according to family tradition in perpetuation of the names of the two dead boys), the other ANNE. The boy died seven months later. Anne Wesley survived, to marry John Lambert, a local land surveyor. Like her sisters, Anne did not enjoy a happy marriage. Her son John had a daughter Anne who married John Jarvis, the sea captain son of James Jarvis, one of the first trustees of JOHN STREET Methodist Church in New York. Through them an enduring branch of the Wesley family was thus early planted in America, and one of John Wesley's letters addressed to Nancy Jarvis in PHILADELPHIA still survives. (Wesley Historical Society, Proceedings, XIX, 89-93.)

After the birth of these twins Susanna Wesley seems to have enjoyed her longest period of freedom from child-bearing, no less than twenty-five months, mainly owing to an estrangement from her husband over their differing political views. (See W.H.S. Proceedings, XXIX, 50-57.)

The fruit of their reconciliation was John Wesley, born June 17, 1703 and baptized July 3. No child was born to them in 1704, and the baby boy born the following May was accidentally smothered by his nurse when a few weeks old. The next child was MARTHA, who was born in 1706, although no details are available, and married one of the less worthy members of the HOLY CLUB, WESTLEY HALL. He was unstable, became a polygamist, and deserted his legal wife. After Martha came Charles Wesley, born Dec. 18, 1707, and baptized on the 29th. Mrs. Wesley was pregnant with her last child when young Jackie was providentially rescued from the blazing Epworth rectory in February 1709. A few days later the father wrote: "I hope my wife will recover, and not miscarry, but God will give me my nineteenth child." (Thomas Jackson, Life of Charles Wesley, London, Mason, 1841, II, 497.) This "fire child" was baptized KEZIA, who died unmarried in 1741, having been jilted by Westley Hall in favor of her elder sister Martha.

Samuel Wesley, Jr. had several children, but all of them except one girl seem to have died young; four are buried in the cloisters of Westminster Abbey. John Wesley had no children of his own, though he proved a good stepfather to MARY VAZEILLE's children. Charles Wesley was the only one through whom the Epworth branch of the family name was continued. In 1749 he married Sarah (1726-1822), daughter of MARMADUKE GWYNNE, the squire of Carth near Builth Wells in Wales. Charles and Sarah Wesley had eight children, four boys and four girls, of whom three survived—CHARLES (1757-1834), SARAH (1759-1828), and SAMUEL (1766-1837). Neither Charles nor Sarah married, but Samuel redressed the balance by fathering two families, one by a legal marriage, and another (after separation from his wife) by his former housekeeper. Three children were born of the marriage, including the Rev. Charles Wesley, D.D., Dean of the Chapel Royal (1793-1866); and at least seven of the liaison with Sarah Suter, of whom the most famous was the well known composer of church music, SAMUEL SEBASTIAN WESLEY (1810-76). Many lines of the family appear to have survived into the present century through Samuel Wesley the musician, though those with the surname Wesley all stem from the illegitimate branch.

The classical work on this subject is by ADAM CLARKE, his Memoirs of the Wesley Family, first published in one volume in 1823, and in a greatly improved and enlarged edition in two volumes, which first appeared in 1836. Much broader in coverage, and fuller in some of its documentation, is George J. Stevenson's Memorials of the Wesley Family (London, Partridge, 1876), but some of his documents and conclusions must be treated with caution. A useful modern study is Family Circle (London, Epworth Press, 1949), by MALDWIN L. EDWARDS. Briefer monographs making use of unfamiliar documents and research into public records are the present writer's "John Wesley's Puritan Ancestry" (London Quarterly Review, CLXXXVII, 180-86, 1962), H. A. Beecham's "Samuel Wesley Senior: New Biographical Evidence" (Renaissance and Modern Studies, VII, 78-109, 1963), and "Wesley Family," by Malcolm Pinhorn (Blackmansbury, I, 36-51, 1964-65).

WESLEY FOUNDATION, THE, is the educational ministry of The United Methodist Church in the United States on the campus of a state or independent college or university.

The first Wesley Foundation was established at the University of Illinois on Oct. 13, 1913, under the leadership of JAMES CHAMBERLAIN BAKER (later Bishop) and his then student assistant, ELMER A. LESLIE. From this beginning, growth was rapid and in 1966 there were 198 accredited Wesley Foundations throughout the United States. These formed part of the Methodist Student Movement, which included 646 other Methodist student groups called Wesley Clubs and Methodist Student Fellowships. Wesley Foundations in The Methodist Church were accredited by the Department of College and University Religious Life of the Board of Education.

Wesley Foundations also exist outside the United States. The first of these was founded in Tokyo in 1931.

Most Wesley Foundations have as director an ordained Methodist minister under the appointment of the bishop. The student activities are carried out by student leadership, usually in an elected council, and the whole program of each Wesley Foundation is under the supervision of a board of directors consisting of ministers, faculty, laymen, and students. Financial support comes from local churches, annual conferences, the Board of Education, and the WOMAN'S SOCIETY OF CHRISTIAN SERVICE.

Important areas of concern in the Wesley Foundations through the years have included the ministry to foreign and international students, work camps, social action in fields such as human rights, peace, and race relations, and the Faculty Christian Movement. The METHODIST STUDENT MOVEMENT has taken a primary role in ecumenical studies and conversations, and belongs to the University Christian Movement and the WORLD STUDENT CHRISTIAN FEDERATION. Many Wesley Foundations offer courses in religion, and some of these have been approved for credit by the colleges and universities.

No great change was made in the Wesley Foundation organization and work when The United Methodist Church came into being in 1968. Many Methodist ministers have been called to their life tasks through participation in the Wesley Foundation, as have missionaries and leaders in every phase of the church. The Wesley Foundations stand as an aid to the church in holding students for Christ and his church during their college years.

WESLEY GUILD, the official youth movement of British Methodism from 1869 to 1943, was inspired by W. B. FITZGERALD. It was based on the principles of comradeship, culture, consecration, and Christian service. In 1901 a department was set up to promote the movement through the connection; and the secretaries were successively W. B. Fitzgerald, George Allen, and Alfred Robinson. Parallel movements were encouraged for children, and the guild accepted responsibility for hospital work at Ilesha, West Africa. In 1932 Methodist CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOURS came under the wing of the department, which was renamed the Methodist Guild Department. The Wesley Guild Holidays, Limited, controls twelve centers for family holidays and leadership training. In 1943 the department was incorporated into the Methodist Youth Department.

WESLEY HISTORICAL SOCIETY, British, is a society whose objects are to promote the exact study of Methodist history and literature and to provide a medium of intercourse for all those interested in such subjects. The original idea of the society was suggested by George Stampe of Grimsby, who enlisted the help of RICHARD GREEN, who was then a tutor at Didsbury Wesleyan Methodist Theological College in Manchester. On June 20, 1893, Richard Green sent a letter to about twenty people whom he thought might be interested in the formation of a Methodist historical society. As a result of this, the first actual meeting was held in 1894, at the time of the Wesleyan Methodist Conference in Birmingham: the first resolution passed was that the society should be called the Wesley Historical Society. At first only working membership was contemplated, but in September, 1895, the society was reconstituted with an open membership. Richard Green was president from 1894 until his death in 1907; he was followed by JOHN S. SIMON from 1907 until his death in 1933. JOHN TELFORD was appointed in 1933, but he was then advanced in years and died in 1936; EDMUND LAMPLOUGH, who had been vice-president of the Methodist Conference in 1935, followed him, only to die in 1940. Francis Fletcher Bretherton was then president until his death in 1956. W. Lamplough Doughty succeeded him until 1963, when he broke with tradition and decided to retire in order that a younger man might take his place: the new president was MALDWYN EDWARDS, who has written many books on the history of Methodism.

The written work of the society began in the form of a manuscript journal which was circulated among the members; from 1897 the best of the material gathered in this way was published in the form of the Proceedings of the Wesley Historical Society, which appears as a quarterly, and has been of great value to the student of British Methodist history. There is in print a General Index to the first thirty volumes, 1897-1956; the present editor of the Proceedings is J. C. BOWMER of the Methodist Archives and Research Centre in London.

In 1934, when HENRY BETT lectured on "The Early Methodist Preachers," the experiment was first tried of holding a public lecture under the auspices of the society at the time of the annual Methodist Conference. In 1935 no formal lecture was given, but from 1936 the lecture has been given every year, and all have been published, apart from the lecture of 1943. (A list of the lectures down to 1959 will be found in the Proceedings, xxii, part iv.) Another scheme for the encouragement of Methodist historical study was the setting up of a Wesley Historical Society Library in the crypt of Wesley's Chapel, London, in April, 1959; the nucleus of the library was the collection of Wesleyana bequeathed to the society by one of its former presidents, F. F. Bretherton. The society began to develop local branches as far back as 1926, when the Irish branch was formed; there are also branches in Yorkshire, the Northeast, East Anglia, South Wales, Plymouth and Exeter, Lincolnshire, Cornwall, Lancashire and Cheshire, London, and West Midlands. These local branches publish bulletins of their own, and are forming local collections of Methodist historical material.

WESLEY HISTORICAL SOCIETY (Irish Branch). The headquarters are in the Historical Room, Aldersgate

House, University Road, BELFAST 7, Northern IRELAND. Here are kept for consultation the records and Wesleyana of Irish Methodism.

WESLEY HISTORICAL SOCIETY of New Zealand was founded as a branch of the British Wesley Historical Society in 1931 by direction of Conference, with C. H. Laws, as president. Members received Proceedings of the parent body, with accompanying pamphlets of local historical interest.

A change of policy in 1943 led to the issuing of occasional Proceedings in the form of historical brochures dealing with topics of NEW ZEALAND Methodist interest. An order of "sustaining members" continue to receive the British Proceedings. It is the society's aim to preserve the early records of New Zealand Methodism and to publish material of historical and inspirational value.

WESLEY HOUSE, Cambridge, one of the Theological Colleges of the Wesleyan Methodist Church, after opening in rented premises in October, 1926, moved into its own buildings in Jesus Lane. Made possible largely through the generous gifts of two laymen, Wesley House is designed for postgraduate students in training for the ministry. It has accommodation for twenty men and two tutors. Its students become members of the university, and normally take the Theological Tripos.

NORMAN P. GOLDHAWK

WESLEY POETICAL WORKS. The major contribution of JOHN and CHARLES WESLEY in the realm of verse was their hymnody (see HYMNODY, British Methodist). It was not their only contribution, however. Speaking in general, Charles was the lavish creative artist, John the critic and compiler. It is widely recognized that John Wesley inherited a large share of the poetic genius of his family. At Oxford he dabbled in occasional verse, sometimes of a very light variety, such as the poem on Cloc's favourite flea, translated from the Latin on 16 June 1724 (Letters I.8-9). In Georgia he embarked on those admirable translations into English verse of some of the greatest devotional poems in the German language, and by these he is best known. They include Paul Gerhardt's "Jesu, thy boundless love to me," Tersteegen's "Thou hidden love of God," and Zinzendorf's "Jesu, thy blood and righteousness My beauty are, my glorious dress." John Wesley's heartbreak over the loss of GRACE MURRAY was poured out in a moving poem of thirty-one stanzas which proves that he had the makings of a true poet.

John Wesley was eager to help the Methodists in general to appreciate the inspiration of great verse, especially devotional verse, and to this end he prepared and published several anthologies, of which the best known is the three volume Collection of Moral and Sacred Poems (1744). He was one of the few who at that period appreciated the poetry of George Herbert, and therefore included his writings in many anthologies from the first Collection of Psalms and Hymns (1737) onwards. Wesley was also audacious enough to rewrite some of them (such as "Teach me, my God and King") so that they could more readily be used for public worship as well as private devotion. Some people may judge that he went far beyond audacity in his popularising of Milton's Paradise Lost, which he greatly admired. Not only did he cut out much of the less interesting and more difficult sections, at the same time adding asterisks to denote the purple passages and notes to illuminate the obscurities that he felt compelled to retain; he himself bound the poem together by supplying connecting links in good Miltonic blank verse.

At the outset of their joint publishing career, the Hymns and Sacred Poems of 1739, John and Charles Wesley agreed not to identify their individual compositions, and this modesty has proved a source of frustration and speculation for scholars ever since. After careful study of the few poems known to be written by John one scholar, HENRY BETT, later followed by J. ERNEST RATTENBURY, devised canons by which he believed he could identify John's work from among their joint publications, but without being completely convincing. Many clues, however, including John Wesley's own evidence in the preface to his 1780 Collection, make it abundantly clear that by far the largest bulk of Wesley poetry is from the pen of Charles. Altogether Charles Wesley wrote some nine thousand hymns and poems, well over a million words of verse.

It is natural to wonder about the quality of this enormous output. Charles Wesley was often repetitive, sometimes feeble, but his verse maintains a much higher average of quality than all but the greatest poets have achieved at their best. Some of his hymns are gems, loved all over the world. Hundreds more are equally good, and as poetry far superior to most hymns by other writers which have nevertheless come into common use. But nobody wants to sing hymns by one man all the time, and even John Wesley met resistance from the loyal Methodists when he tried to encompass something like this. Thus it has happened that a few of Charles Wesley's hymns have become great favourites, while others have been almost forgotten, or from time to time "discovered" by curious and enthusiastic students.

There is no doubt that Charles Wesley was a poetic genius. In an age of somewhat stodgy couplets he experimented with lilting lyrics, and wrote with technical mastery in a hundred different metres, including some that no one had used before. Most of his best work displays a classic compactness, a skilful interweaving of carefully chosen words, and a dramatic or liturgical unfolding of his theme which proved him a master of the art of rhetoric. The results of this are usually more felt than clearly understood without painstaking analysis of the poems stanza by stanza, line by line, occasionally word by word. He was so steeped in the classics of both Rome and Jerusalem that his allusive quality (part of the charm of poetry) also proves elusive to most of us less well educated admirers from a distance. He brought to his writings personal warmth, a deep religious experience akin to passionate love, an eager spirit of evangelism and occasionally the imagination and impatience which is characteristic of the artistic temperament (this is seen especially in his unpublished satirical verse). He was a pioneer of the Romantic Revival in literature as well as of the Evangelical Revival in religion. His hymns reflect many moods, as we may see by naming a few of them, from the adoring wonder of "Love divine, all loves excelling" (based on Dryden's "Fairest Isle") to the martial vigour of "Soldiers of Christ, arise," and the wistfulness of "Jesu, lover of my soul." Above all, however, it is the note of joy that predominates, the joy that God has come down into human history and into the human heart;

the joy of the Easter triumph over sin and over death in "Christ the Lord is risen today!" and even more the joy of knowing that God has done all this for people like Charles Wesley, like you and me, the joy of the hymn written on the first anniversary of his conversion on Whitsunday 1738—"O for a thousand tongues to sing my great Redeemer's praise!"

Much of Charles Wesley's work remains unpublished, including almost all his satirical and political verse. In 1868 Dr. GEORGE OSBORN began the task of publishing the whole of the poetical works of the two brothers, but in fact he omitted not only much unpublished work of which he knew and (of course) that which had not then been discovered, but also a few items which had in fact been published. His thirteen volumes of The Poetical Works of John and Charles Wesley (London, Wesleyan-Methodist Conference Office, 1868-72) contain some 4600 items published by the brothers and a further 3000 left in manuscript by Charles. For Representative Verse of Charles Wesley (London and Nashville, 1962) the present writer read a further 1350 unpublished poems, some of which are presented in that volume, as is also a summary of the bibliography of the subject.

WESLEY PORTRAITS, JOHN AND CHARLES. The first known but one of the least worthy of the many portraits of John Wesley is an engraving on copper made in 1741, probably by George Vertue. Later in life, John Wesley sat for many artists and many important portraits. The Williams, by John Michael Williams, painted in 1742, is generally regarded as the best likeness of Wesley in early life. The original is at Didsbury College, Bristol; there is a copy in the Board Room of the Methodist Publishing House in London. An engraving of this portrait, made by JOHN DOWNES, formed the frontispiece to the first edition of John Wesley's Notes on the New Testament (see his Journal, November 4, 1774, and Proceedings of Wesley Historical Society, iii, 186; iv, 121).

The Hunter portrait, painted by Robert Hunter, was engraved in dark mezzotint by James Watson. The original, for which Wesley sat on July 31, 1765, is in the World Methodist Building, Lake Junaluska, N. C., U.S.A. The Hone portrait, painted by Nathaniel Hone, was painted in 1765, and the original hangs in the National Portrait Gallery, London. The Russell portrait, by John Russell, was painted in 1773, but although the original is said to be the picture hanging in the dining room of Kingswood School, Bath, this is doubtful; there is a second copy at Wesley's Chapel, City Road, London (see Proceedings, viii, 1; x, 67).

The Romney portrait was painted by George Romney and is generally considered to be the best likeness of John Wesley in later life. Wesley says that he sat for Romney on January 5, 1789, and that he thought highly of the artist. The original is now in the United States (see Proceedings, xiii, 182). The most familiar portrait of Wesley, however, is the Jackson, done by John Jackson in 1827 "at the desire of an influential group of Wesleyans who wished to have a standard typical portrait of Wesley." This picture appeared as the frontispiece to Wesley's Hymns. The original hangs in the Board Room of the Methodist Publishing House in London, but it is not rated highly as a likeness. The Horsley, painted by Thomas Horsley of Sunderland in 1790, is now at Richmond Theological College, London, and a replica is in the Sunderland Art Gallery. The Hamilton, painted by William Hamilton, presents John Wesley in his eighty-sixth year (see his Journal, December 22, 1787). The original is in the National Portrait Gallery in London. John Wesley is also known to have sat for Joshua Reynolds in 1755, but the original picture was probably lost in a fire at Dangan Castle, in Ireland, the home of the Duke of Mornington (see Proceedings, iii, 191; xxvii, 174).

There are many more portraits of varying degrees of merit; the most recent are the versions painted by FRANK SALISBURY, and which are now in the United States. JOHN TELFORD wrote a short book on the subject of the portraits of John Wesley, Sayings and Portraits of John Wesley (London, 1924). In addition to the references to the Proceedings given above, see ii, 49; iii, 185; and iv, 1.

As for Charles Wesley, eight portraits in all are known, of which the best are: the Russell portrait, done by John Russell, who was a personal friend of Charles Wesley and his family; the original, which shows Charles at the age of sixty-four, is in the Methodist Mission House, Marylebone, London. The Gush, painted by William Gush, is of uncertain date, but was probably done in the mid-nineteenth century; the original is at Kingswood School, Bath. The Hudson, painted by Thomas Hudson, shows Charles in early manhood; the original is in the Board Room of the Methodist Publishing House in London. The Spilsbury engraving was done by Jonathan Spilsbury, and is said to be "the finest portrait of the poet and the only one published during his lifetime" (see Proceedings, ix, 4). There are other portraits, one by F. J. JOHNSON, which is now at the Methodist Publishing House in London, and one by J. W. L. Forster, which is now at Victoria University, Toronto. There is a portrait known as "Charles Wesley in Old Age," of which the whereabouts of the original is unknown as well as the name of the artist. The picture called "Charles Wesley preaching to the Indians" was painted by Robert Ronald McIan (1803-56). On the general subject see Proceedings, xxxi, 86.

JOHN C. BOWMER

WESLEY POTTERY AND BUSTS. Few men have had as many carved and moulded effigies made of them as John Wesley. These range from the mid-eighteenth century caricature carved from the vertebra of a horse, to the superbly modeled late eighteenth century bust by Enoch Wood which is considered the best likeness of Wesley in later life. Wesley busts, plaques and figures were made of wax, wood, ivory, metals and other materials, but it is the ceramic items that are most numerous.

Though busts and creamware with Wesley transfers were produced at Leeds and other Yorkshire potteries as early as the late eighteenth century, and Wesley pottery was produced in Wales and Scotland as well as from Devon to Sunderland, England, in the nineteenth century, the earliest and the majority of them were produced in Burslem and other towns of the Staffordshire Pottery District.

On his first visit to Burslem in March of 1760 Wesley held services in the open air. His discourse was not disturbed by the continuous loud talking and laughing, or even by a lump of potters clay which was thrown at him striking him on the face. He recorded: "I met a young man, JOSIAH WEDGWOOD, who had planted a flower garden adjacent to his pottery. He has his men wash their hands and faces and change their clothes after working in the clay. He is small and lame, but his soul is near God." An old advertisement for reproductions of the blue and white teapot in the museum at Wesley's House in London states that Wedgwood designed such a teapot for Wesley in creamware, and presented it to him in 1761. Mr. Joseph G. Wright pointed out certain features which cast doubt on this story. (Proceedings of the Wesley Historical Society, vii, 97-99.) He believed that the only kind of teapot made by Josiah Wedgwood with a Wesley connection was one made about 1772 or later on which Guy Green printed the portrait of Wesley after Nathaniel Hone. The Hone Portrait was painted about 1765. Green produced transfer wares with his name incorporated from 1770 to 1799; and the earliest teapot with this transfer was of the mould style popular between 1765 and 1775.

Though exact dating is impossible, undoubtedly transfer portraits on teapots, mugs and jugs were the earliest ceramic representations of Wesley. Possibly the earliest item was a mug with a transfer of Wesley similar to the "First Known Portrait" (Sayings and Portraits of John Wesley—JOHN TELFORD, p. 63). That Wesley pottery was being produced before 1774 is pointed out by Tyerman (The Life and Times of John Wesley, Vol. iii, p. 174). After mentioning the waxwork effigy taken by Mrs. Wright of New York in 1774 he states: "From the manuscript letters of Samuel Bardsley, we learn that already the potters of Staffordshire had printed his likeness on their crockery; and Mr. Voyes of Cobridge had had it engraved on the seals he sold." An engraving drawn and published by T. Holloway in 1776, and the portrait of Wesley published in the first issue of the Arminian Magazine are other likenesses printed on eighteenth century jugs and teapots.

These items continued to be produced throughout the latter eighteenth and into the nineteenth centuries. At the time of the 1839 Centenary a large quantity of Wesley Pottery was manufactured which included busts, plaques, plates, mugs, jugs and general tea ware. Other transfers used were from the portraits painted by Romney in 1789, the Arnold and Barry miniatures, both painted about 1790, the Edridge Portrait painted in 1791 and that painted by Jackson in 1827.

Bas-relief plaques were produced in the eighteenth century by at least three potters. ENOCH WOOD produced a small one in 1780. Several examples are known including one given by him to Miss Anne Bourne which is illustrated in the book, The Wood Family of Burslem. A larger one produced by Enoch Wood is undated, but the bas-relief bust was used on small "Pratt-ware" flasks of a pottery style popular about 1790. The two known examples are in the Botteley Collection housed at the Methodist Archives and Research Center in London, and in the Crowder collection. Two lovely jasperware medallions were first produced about 1780 to 1790. They were by Turner, Lane End, Longton, and John Flaxman while he was modeling for Josiah Wedgwood between about 1775 and 1787. The Flaxman moulds are still used by the Wedgwood Factory, and through the years many plaques have been produced. As late as 1966 a small jasper plate with this bas-relief was sold at the World Methodist Conference in London.

Except for the finely modeled and detailed early nineteenth century Derby biscuit figure, the statuettes of Wesley are not of the quality of the bas-relief plaques. An almost exact but not quite as finely detailed copy of this figure was produced at the Minton Factory, and one marked and dated example was made in 1857. George Coker, who worked at the Derby Factory from 1825 to 1840 and was employed by the Minton Factory in 1853, probably produced the latter figure. A few figures were made in the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries but are more or less caricatures. Possibly a unique figure of this period is a 1½ inch tall figure of Wesley in a red pulpit in the Crowder collection. The majority of figures were produced at the time of the 1839 Centenary and later. Though not good Wesley portraits, these include the interesting sham clocks from the Sampson Smith Factory. The Kent Factory produced at least two figures as well as the 11½ inch tall copy of the Enoch Wood Bust. This unfortunately has been pictured in and attributed to Enoch Wood in at least one book on Staffordshire Pottery, and one highly regarded museum collection of Staffordshire busts and figures.

In 1781 Enoch Wood modeled from life a portrait bust of Wesley with such detailed accuracy of features, even to the facial veins and wrinkles, that it became the recognized prototype of most subsequent portraits and busts. FRANK O. SALISBURY, who painted the large portraits in the World Methodist Building at Lake Junaluska, North Carolina, was the latest prominent artist to use Wood's bust as the model for a Wesley Portrait. Prior to the rediscovery of the correspondence between Dr. ADAM CLARKE and Enoch Wood in which 1781 was definitely given by Wood as the date, there was a controversy among authorities as to when the modeling of this bust was done. Some accepted 1784 as the date of modeling as that would have been the 81st year of Wesley's life, and the earliest marked busts gave his age as 81. The library of the Garrett Biblical Institute owns Enoch Wood's original letter written to Dr. Adam Clarke in 1830. The following important excerpts from this letter document the date of modeling.

Burslem, October 6, 1830.

My Dear Sir: I am favored with your letter of the 2d instant, from which I am happy to learn that a whole length marble statue of Mr. Wesley is now in progress. The bust which I had the pleasure to present to you a few years since was taken out of the original mold cast upon the clay model, for which Mr. Wesley favored me with five separate sittings, at the last of which he did me the credit to say that there had been many attempts at his likeness by different artists, but he thought this was much the best. He, however, asked me if I thought it had not a more melancholy expression than himself, and I perceived I had fallen into that error, I think owing to his generally being engaged in writing while sitting to me, and from which I withdrew his attention with some difficulty. He therefore sat down again and in a few minutes after I had made the alteration he came behind me to look at it and immediately desired me not to touch it again, "lest" (as he said), I should "mar it," and again expressed himself quite satisfied with it.

I then told him he might consider the likeness finished, but that I should place it upon a pedestal, on the back of which I should place a medallion, with his name and age inscribed, as well as any remarkable occurrence of his life. He, without the smallest hesitation, related to me the circumstance of his father's house being on fire when he was a child, and that his life was then saved from the flames by his being taken out of an upper story through a window. This I fully then intended to model on a medallion on the pedestal. He seemed pleased with this idea and said: "You may write underneath or around it, 'Is not this a brand plucked out of the Fire?'" This I deferred doing because I was anxious to procure an exact drawing of his father's house, but to this day it has not fallen into my hands; and therefore it has not been carried into effect.

Mr. Wesley's companion, Joseph Brudford, was present at two or three of the last sittings and was so much pleased with the growing likeness of Mr. Wesley that I observed he threw all the impediments which he could with propriety do in the way of Mr. Wesley rising from the sittings, in order to give me a full opportunity of perfecting the resemblance. Your bust of Mr. Wesley was taken by me in the year 1781, with the greatest care and attention I was then capable of, in the twenty-second year of my age, having practiced the art from a very early age.

Mr. Manning may with confidence rely upon every line, wrinkle or vein marked upon your bust being a true and correct copy of nature.

My dear Sir, your obedient and obliged servant,

ENOCH WOOD.

Rev. Dr. Adam Clarke, Pinner, Middlesex.

No example of the 1781 edition is known to exist. Possibly there were only a few of these early busts all of which have perished, or possibly the early ones were without identifying plaques as Enoch Wood was not in business for himself until about 1784. It is apparently in this year that the first marked examples were produced, and there is in the Botteley Collection one of these busts marked "aged 81" known to have been made by Enoch Wood and given by him to his son. Most of these busts with hollow backs and gowns with flattened drapery were made during Wesley's lifetime, whereas most of those made by the Wood Factory after Wesley's death have a fuller gown and a solid back with a round, oval, square or rectangular plaque giving the date of Wesley's death and other information.

Following the issuance of Woods Bust a large number of copies appeared, probably from most of the potteries. These varied from good to inferior workmanship, and most were unmarked. Some of the marked or documented examples include busts produced by J. Dale, J. Meir, Leeds, Newbottle, Thomas Hawley, Wedgwood, Copeland, Charles Salt, Kent, Messrs. Massey, Robinson and Leadbeater, W. R. Goss, Hewitt and Leadbeater and others.

Two large busts are considered to be good likenesses of Wesley. The life-size marble bust in the National Portrait Gallery, London, is attributed to the little known sculptor, Silvester. His bust of Wesley was listed in the 1788 catalogue of the Royal Academy of Art, and his address was given as Lyceum, Strand. Mr. Henry Graves, from whom the bust was purchased in 1868, proposed that the bust was sculptured by the famous French sculptor, Roubiliac, and this attribution was accepted by early authorities on Wesleyana but not by the National Portrait Gallery. Silvester was listed as the sculptor after the findings reported in a London newspaper (The Times, March 5, 1928).

Several pottery reproductions have been made of this bust. The first was made by Messrs. John Adams and Co. of Hanley and was available at the first North Staffordshire Conference in 1870. (The Methodist Magazine, July 1870, p. 650.) The Rev. Richard Green loaned his copy of the Adams bust to Harper and Co. of Burslem who produced a few smaller copies. Later the bust was reproduced by Messrs. Robinson and Leadbeater who incorporated the Roubiliac attribution into an inscription on the back of the bust.

The other large bust of which copies are to be seen at the library of the Wesley Historical Society in London and the New Room in Bristol is of a black material, and the facial features have a striking resemblance to the plaster cast of the reputed "death mask" pictured in The Story of Methodism by A. B. Hyde, 1888 edition. There is however another plaster cast of a "death mask" with less fullness to the lips and face which was formerly owned by the Rev. RICHARD GREEN and is now at Drew University. Comparison of photographs of the two plaster casts makes one wonder if the one in Hyde's book was actually from a life mask and if it could have been the model for this bust. Mr. Aldridge who gave the bust to the Wesley Historical Society furnished with it three typed pages of information. In these he stated that the bust had been in his family, that it was executed by Coade in 1793 at his Artificial Stone Manufactory and that it was probably taken from a cast of a life mask made while John Wesley was staying with one of Mr. Aldridge's ancestors, a Mr. Whitchurch of Salisbury, England. He further stated that Mr. and Mrs. Whitchurch were mentioned in John Wesley's Diary for August 8th, 1787, and October 5th, 1789. Possibly this bust represents Wesley at the age of 84 or 86 years. Except for more fullness of the lips and face the features of this bust closely resemble those of the sketch made by William Ridley as Wesley lay in State at City Road Chapel. Dr. Osborn considered this sketch to be the most accurate outline of Wesley's features.

Many varieties of Wesley pottery can be seen and studied in the Methodist Archives and Research Center in London, where the Botteley, Lamplough and other collections are housed, and at the World Methodist Building at Lake Junaluska, North Carolina, where the late Dr. Elmer T. Clark deposited his collection. There are smaller but interesting collections at Drew, Garrett and the New Room. Alderman Horace Hurd of Bradford, England, and Dr. T. H. Crowder of South Boston, Virginia, have large and representative private collections.

WESLEY SEMINARY is a training school for Methodist ministers at Montero, BOLIVIA. The seminary was founded in 1960. From a beginning class of six, it has grown to a student body of about forty men and women (1966). The seminary is responsible for producing the main body of the Spanish-speaking ministry of The United Methodist Church in Bolivia. It emphasizes theological subjects, social sciences and technical vocational subjects. The teaching staff numbers sixteen.

The goal of the seminary is to produce a nonprofessional ordained pastor for the frontier ministry—both geographical and social frontiers. This frontier pastor must be also a community leader to shepherd the people of God in the ministry of the total church.

The seminary year is divided into two semesters of four months each, with four days spent in class and two in practical work in rural areas, which includes preaching and helping with churches or new congregations. Some students bicycle on rough roads from thirty-four to seventy-eight miles each weekend and cover several preaching points in a circuit around Montero. Besides preaching, Sunday school, and youth work, students also help in Methodist cooperatives. One of the four years of preparation is spent as a practice year. James Pace was founder and directed the seminary up to July 1966. He was succeeded by Jose Carlos Diaz.

WESLEY SOCIETY, THE, is the name of an organization of Methodists in the United States which grew out of an informal meeting in New York City on Jan. 11, 1955. In its membership were represented Methodist ministers, professors, and students who shared a common concern for the present-day relevance of the thought of JOHN and CHARLES WESLEY. Its aim was the recovery of the Wesleyan tradition in contemporary Methodism. It was distinct from various historical societies in Methodism, and considered itself a movement rather than a party within the church. Its main purposes were to unite in conferences and retreats those who shared in its concerns, and to encourage research and publication in this area of interest. It had no official connection with The Methodist Church.

The founder and president of the Wesley Society was Dr. Franz Hildebrandt, then Professor of Theology at Drew University. During World War II Dr. Hildebrandt, a Lutheran pastor in GERMANY, went into voluntary exile in England, and served a German-speaking congregation in CAMBRIDGE. In England he came under the influence of the Wesleyan tradition, and in time joined the British Methodist Church as one of its ministers. It was in this capacity that he came to the United States to serve on the faculty of DREW.

Within the first seven or eight years of its existence under the leadership of Dr. Hildebrandt various national meetings and retreats of the Wesley Society were held, chiefly on the eastern seaboard. During these same years various state and regional societies were formed throughout the country. These societies carried on independent programs, and some of them were quite active, meeting regularly and publishing their own newsletters. At the same time on a rather irregular basis the national society published a newsletter which was distributed to the membership of the Wesley Society countrywide. The membership was always quite modest in size. The direction of the national Wesley Society was carried on under the continuous presidency of Dr. Hildebrandt and a small group predominantly composed of seminary professors known as the COUNCIL.

After the early 1960's it became increasingly difficult to maintain a national organization, although local and regional societies may still be in existence. Since the departure of Dr. Hildebrandt in 1968 from the United States to SCOTLAND, the national Wesley Society has not functioned.

Communications regarding the Wesley Society are still received by the secretary, Professor Robert S. Eccles, DEPAUW UNIVERSITY, Greencastle, Ind. Funds of the society and the roster of members are in the hands of Professor E. Dale Dunlap, ST. PAUL SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY.

WESLEY THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, Washington, D.C., is a continuation of WESTMINSTER THEOLOGICAL SCHOOL founded by the MARYLAND CONFERENCE of the METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCH in 1881 at Westminster, Md. In 1953, plans were adopted to move the seminary to Washington, to property given by the AMERICAN UNIVERSITY at the northwest corner of its campus. The name was changed to Wesley Theological Seminary in 1957, and first classes were held in 1958.

A complete educational plant has been constructed at a cost of $4,607,000, of which $1,500,000 was given by the S. S. Kresge Foundation and the balance by the seminary's constituency. Through the generosity of JOSEPH RANK of England, a second casting of the equestrian statue of John Wesley at the Horse Fair, BRISTOL, was made possible for the seminary's campus. The seminary chapel is named for Bishop C. BROMLEY OXNAM, chairman of the board of governors during the transition period. The Kresge academic quadrangle honors the donors of the gift that assured the success of the relocation plans.

Degrees offered are the S.T.B., Th.M., S.T.M., and M.R.E. Additional educational opportunities for advanced degrees are open to the students at The American University.

The governing board is made up of fifty-one members elected by the GENERAL CONFERENCE of The United Methodist Church.

WESLEY'S NOTES ON THE OLD AND NEW TESTAMENTS. John Wesley's Explanatory Notes upon the New Testament with his forty-four STANDARD SERMONS form part of the doctrinal standards of BRITISH METHODISM. The Notes were begun in January 1754 (Journal, iv, 91); published toward the end of 1755; revised, 1759 (Journal, iv, 361), and 1787 (Journal, viii, 345). In this work he was greatly helped by his brother CHARLES and also by J. A. Bengel's Gnomon Novi Testamenti. For the Greek text which Wesley used and his translation, see the Proceedings of Wesley Historical Society (ix, 105; xxvii; v; xxiv, 6). Wesley's Notes on the Old Testament were published in three volumes in 1765, but the work is "meagre and unsatisfactory," says Adam Clarke. (Cf. L. Tyerman, Life and Times of Wesley, ed. 1890, ii, 552.) Wesley used Matthew Henry's Exposition and Poole's Annotations.

JOHN C. BOWMER

WESLEY'S SHORTHAND. During his Oxford days John Wesley taught some of his pupils to use James Weston's system of shorthand, but there is no evidence that he used it himself. He seems to have preferred a combination of "his own scheme of abbreviation" and "a shorthand unknown to modern experts" (CURNOCK, Introduction to Journal, I, 4). In GEORGIA, however, under pressure from his brother CHARLES, who insisted on this form of privacy in their personal correspondence, Wesley learned to use the shorthand system of their friend, Dr.

John Byrom. Charles was already an expert in Byrom's shorthand, which was expounded in The Universal English Shorthand (Manchester, 1767). John began to use the system for his Diary on Dec. 20, 1736, and all his later diaries are written in it. His interest in the subject was no doubt further stimulated when, in 1748, he was given a copy of a recently published treatise on the teaching of shorthand, by the author, Mr. Macaulay, a tea-merchant of Manchester. (W.H.S. Proceedings, VI, 148.)

JOHN NEWTON

WESLEY'S WORKS. The publications of JOHN and CHARLES WESLEY were so voluminous that in their own lifetime there were two attempts to collect them. The first was in 1746, when they gathered together in fifteen volumes the current editions of some seventy items, both prose and verse, both original and edited. The second better known attempt was launched in 1771, and was limited to the prose publications of John Wesley, with a few exceptions, such as his Notes on the Bible, his Natural Philosophy, his Christian Library (comprising fifty volumes) and many of the texts prepared for KINGSWOOD SCHOOL. This first separately printed edition of his Works was issued in weekly numbers and gathered together in thirty-two volumes during the years 1771-74. For this edition Wesley did undertake a revision of his writings, but unfortunately they were very carelessly printed by William Pine of Bristol, and the incomplete errata which were issued were seldom bound up with the volumes concerned.

In any case this first edition was incomplete, inasmuch as Wesley lived and continued to write until 1791. Not for almost twenty years after his death, however, did the Methodist Conference of 1808 sponsor a new edition of Wesley's Works. This second edition was prepared by the CONNEXIONAL EDITOR, JOSEPH BENSON, and appeared in seventeen volumes 1809-13 (Vol. 17 is an index, frequently bound with Vol. 16). Like most of its successors, this edition omitted most of Wesley's publications which were not thought to be completely original, as well as all the musical and poetical works, and some others. At least a few volumes of this edition were reprinted under the description of the "third edition," and another reprint was undertaken in the U.S.A. This "first American edition" was published in Philadelphia and New York in 1826-27, occupying ten volumes.

THOMAS JACKSON became connexional editor in 1824. He furnished a far more complete and scholarly edition of Wesley's Works in fourteen volumes (1829-31), in most instances using the latest text supplied by some of Wesley's personally annotated copies—though it can be shown that these annotations were frequently hurried emendations forced upon Wesley in his old age by printing errors which had arisen in previous editions, while the earliest editions (which he did not consult) frequently preserved a demonstrably purer text. Jackson's edition has remained the standard ever since, though it has undergone many minor changes from time to time, including the addition of a few newly discovered letters or pamphlets. The numbering of the many editions of Jackson's collection is quite chaotic, and because some were reset with a different size of type and paper, discrepancies sometimes arise in citations from it by different scholars, so that it is necessary to specify which of many editions is used. Occasionally Jackson's edition was issued in fifteen volumes, the last volume comprising Wesley's Explanatory Notes upon the New Testament. The "First American Complete and Standard Edition" edited by JOHN EMORY (first published in New York, 1831, in seven volumes) was in effect a reprint of Jackson, with some rearrangement of the material. The edition of Wesley's Works published in recent years by the Zondervan Publishing House was a lithographic reproduction of the 1872 English edition.

Students of the Wesleys have long desired a critical annotated edition of John Wesley's Works, and the demand has increased during this last twenty years or so with the intensified attention being given to Wesley's theology. This century has welcomed standard editions of his Journal (by NEHEMIAH CURNOCK, 8 volumes, 1909-16), his Standard Sermons (by E. H. SUGDEN, 2 vols., 1921), and of his Letters (by JOHN TELFORD, 8 vols., 1931). This still leaves some hundreds of his writings large and small, however, without any truly definitive edition, so that we remain dependent upon that prepared by Thomas Jackson in 1829-31. The need for such a definitive edition was pointed out by the present writer in the Jubilee Issue of the Proceedings of the WESLEY HISTORICAL SOCIETY in June 1943, although at the time it seemed a dream hardly likely of fulfilment.

Almost twenty years later, in 1960, a group of concerned scholars at four American universities took practical steps to fill this need, with what was at first known as the "Wesley's Works Editorial Project." They realized at the outset that it would be a long, complex, and costly enterprise, though they could not possibly imagine all the problems involved, many of them stemming from the peculiarities of Wesley's own literary methods. Already a decade has been spent in extensive researches and in debating the findings of preliminary studies. Happily most of the major problems thus revealed have now been resolved. The first few volumes are under way, and it is hoped that they will begin to appear at the rate of two or three a year by 1974.

Directing this enterprise are the deans of the theological faculties of Drew, Duke, Emory, and Southern Methodist Universities, to whom have been added more recently the Dean of Boston University School of Theology, together with the Director of the Department of the Ministry and the Executive Secretary of the Commission on Archives and History of the United Methodist Church. Supervising the editorial processes are three General Editors (WILLIAM R. CANNON, ROBERT E. CUSHMAN, and ERIC W. BAKER) and the Editor-in-Chief, FRANK BAKER, who together with other members form a consultative Editorial Committee. A large international and interdenominational team of scholars has been enlisted to edit the series of about thirty volumes of John Wesley's original prose works, which will be published by The Clarendon Press of Oxford, England.

The Oxford Edition of John Wesley's Works is intended to offer an accurate, annotated text of his writings for the use of scholars and general readers. Its editorial canons are those of modern historical scholarship as generally understood and practiced. The various texts will be based on critical examinations of all extant prototypes which may have received Wesley's personal attention in any way, and will provide a minimal textual apparatus enabling the reader to verify the copy text and to note significant variants. Each of the major categories of Wesley's writings will form a unit consisting of one or more volumes, and will be complete in itself. Each unit will have a concise introduction, each individual item a preface. To these will be added brief annotations on names, citations, sources, cross-references, etc. The aim throughout will be a maximum exhibition of Wesley himself and a minimum intrusion on the reader by the editors. An index will be supplied for each unit, and a general index for the whole edition. The first unit will provide a definitive bibliography of the Wesleys' publications, both prose and verse, both original and edited, which will serve for cross-reference throughout the new edition.

WESLEYAN, THE. For some years prior to 1832 the Methodist leaders in the area known as Eastern British America (now the Atlantic Provinces of CANADA) had felt the pressing need of a regional periodical for the instruction and unification of their people. In March of that year the first number of The Nova Scotia and New Brunswick Wesleyan Methodist Magazine, a little quarterly, made its appearance. Only four issues were printed, because the Missionary Committee in London feared an injurious effect on the circulation of English Methodist publications and ordered its discontinuance, thus forcing its promoters to fall back on the use of such space as was afforded them in secular publications.

A second attempt was made in February 1838, when the first issue of The Wesleyan appeared, sponsored by the Nova Scotia district and published in Halifax. Continued pressure from London forced its discontinuance after a few issues. Then for a few months came The Christian Herald; and in 1840, The British North American Wesleyan Methodist Magazine began publication. This gained a measure of approval in London because it was sponsored by two districts, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. Printed in Saint John, N.B., its somewhat intermittent course came to an end in 1847.

In April, 1849, appeared the first issue of the revived Wesleyan, which soon became a weekly paper and continued without interruption until 1925. In 1852 the name was changed to The Provincial Wesleyan, and in 1875, back to The Wesleyan. For most of the period it was published in Halifax, then Truro, N.S., then Sackville, N.B. It began with four large pages, then expanded to eight, and finally sixteen of magazine size.

Through its history, the journal maintained a remarkably broad and forward-looking approach to the varied problems with which it dealt. News of Christian groups and movements far removed from Methodism was featured. Moral reforms were fearlessly advocated, the temperance issue being given prominence. An attitude of friendliness toward other Maritime denominations, and a recognition of the universal brotherhood of man were stressed. An editorial of 1900 said: "To be a Christian means to let no artificial distinctions of society or wealth or colour or nationality limit your love."

The contribution of The Wesleyan to Methodism in the Maritime Provinces and beyond was great. Especially in the early days it provided a mouthpiece for the educational institutions known as Mount Allison, at Sackville, N.B. It did much to bring together the Methodists and to prepare them for the all-Canadian union consummated in 1884; and when this was accomplished, it worked toward the union with other denominations, bearing fruit when the whole church entered the union of 1925 without dissent.

From the time of continuous publications, the editors of The Wesleyan were: 1849-54, Alexander W. MacLeod; 1854-60, Matthew H. Richey (later lieutenant-governor of Nova Scotia); 1860-62, Charles Churchill; 1862-69, John McMurray; 1869-73, HUMPHREY PICKARD; 1873-79, Alexander W. Nicholson; 1879-80, Duncan D. Currie (the first not to hold the position of Book Steward, for the six earlier men held both offices); 1880-86, T. WATSON SMITH; 1886-95, JOHN LATHERN; 1895-1902, GEORGE J. BOND; 1902-07, JOHN MACLEAN (who was brought in from Western Canada); 1907-24, David W. Johnson; 1924-25, Herbert E. Thomas.

When The United Church of Canada came into being, its Maritime Conference decided unanimously to continue the publication of what had long become a Maritime paper, under the name The United Churchman. Through the years it has preserved the best features of The Wesleyan, to which much was added, and has exerted a powerful influence on the church life of these provinces. The editors have been: 1925-29, H. E. Thomas (as the Wesleyan editor); 1929-48, William F. Partridge; 1948-58, W. Fraser Munro; 1958- , Evan D. Murray.

WESLEYAN CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE is the official conference paper for the GEORGIA CONFERENCES of The United Methodist Church, begun in June 1837, as the Southern Christian Advocate, the official organ of the Georgia and SOUTH CAROLINA CONFERENCES. The Southern Christian Advocate was published in CHARLESTON, S. C., by a committee of the South Carolina Conference under the name of the Wesleyan Journal. The first number was issued on Oct. 1, 1825, edited by STEPHEN OLIN and WILLIAM CAPERS. The last issue appeared March 3, 1827, when it was united with the Christian Advocate, published by the M.E. CHURCH in NEW YORK.

During the nine years succeeding—from 1827 to 1836—the increasing agitation of the SLAVERY question seriously threatened the harmony and unity of the Church, as well as the success of the missions among the Negroes in the southern states. The delegates from these states to the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1836 felt the necessity for the establishment of a religious newspaper in the South to defend their interests and institutions. Accordingly, at the General Conference of 1836 resolutions were passed authorizing the publication of a weekly religious paper on the same footing with the Christian Advocate and Journal (New York), and the Western Christian Advocate (Cincinnati), and the Christian Advocate at RICHMOND, NASHVILLE, and CHARLESTON.

The Southern Christian Advocate was first published in Charleston on Saturday, June 24, 1837, and was particularly intended to represent the South Carolina and Georgia Conferences, the publishing committee being composed of ministers of those two conferences. It was under the editorship of William Capers, later elected bishop. Burgess and Jones of Charleston were the first publishers. This firm printed the paper from its beginning date to March of 1847, except for a short period—March 1843 to June 1843—during which time it was printed and published by B. B. Hussey of Charleston. After 1847, the Advocate purchased its own printing press and equipment necessary for independent publication.

William Capers served as editor from 1837 to 1840. Whiteford Smith served from May of 1840 to November of 1840 as editor pro tem. In November of 1840 WILLIAM M. WIGHTMAN accepted the editorship and served until 1854. E. H. Myers became editor in 1854 and continued in that post until 1872.

As the Civil War advanced and certain sections of the South became less secure because of the southward moving Federal armies, Charleston itself was in great danger of bombardment. And, because of the imminent danger confronting Charleston, the Georgia Conference started agitation late in the year of 1861 to move the office of the Advocate to AUGUSTA, GA., on April 10, 1862.

In 1865 it became evident that Augusta also would soon be taken by the Federal forces and that a move of the Advocate was again necessary. Hence, Myers began to make preparations for removal to a still safer position. After the issue of April 13, 1865, the Southern Christian Advocate was suspended and removed to MACON, where it resumed publication on June 19, 1865. This suspension and removal cut the Advocate off from its subscribers and correspondents for over two months. It also lost heavily because of the utter failure of the Confederate currency at this time. The move to Macon was made in order to give the paper greater security of publication, but a tragic and ironic fate attended this removal. Macon itself was in possession of United States forces, and the publishing house there was in ashes, but it was too late to change plans. Myers set out upon the tremendous task of putting the Advocate back on its original basis, a thing that could hardly be expected in the dying days of reconstruction.

The Georgia and South Carolina Conferences had been expanding during these years and it became evident that the Georgia Conference needed its own paper. So on June 4, 1878, the Wesleyan Christian Advocate, under the editorship of ATTICUS G. HAYGOOD, made its first appearance. Haygood had been an official contributor to the Southern Christian Advocate. John W. Burke, head of the Macon company doing the printing of the Advocate, was the assistant editor. Haygood and Burke continued in office until June 3, 1882. At that time Weyman H. Potter became editor and continued through Nov. 5, 1890. W. C. Lovett assumed the editorship Nov. 12, 1890, and continued thus until Dec. 24, 1890, when the paper moved to ATLANTA. Burke held the assistant editorship during all these years. He resigned Dec. 24, 1890 after twenty-five years of service.

W. F. Glenn and T. T. Christian were editor and business manager of the Advocate after its move to Atlanta. They continued in office from Jan. 7, 1891, through 1899. In 1900 W. C. Lovett succeeded T. T. Christian as business manager, and BASCOM ANTHONY became a member of the staff. In 1901 Lovett was made editor and he continued as editor through Dec. 20, 1920. He had as assistant editors and business managers during these years J. W. HEIDT (1901-02), M. J. Cofer (1902-12), and R. F. Eakes (1912-20). WILLIAM P. KING became editor in 1920 and L. J. Ballard was the assistant editor and business manager. In 1923 A. M. Pierce became editor with Ballard continuing as assistant editor and business manager.

Elam F. Dempsey became editor and business manager on Dec. 5, 1930, and continued to Nov. 25, 1933, when

Financially, the outlook was so gloomy in 1932 that the NORTH GEORGIA CONFERENCE, early in its session, voted to discontinue the paper. But when it was learned that Watkins was willing to serve as editor without remuneration for one year, the Conference reconsidered its previous vote and the Wesleyan gained a new lease on life under his editorship. The length of his service without remuneration stretched to four years. Even so, in 1936, it became necessary to adopt a new plan of administration. Instead of one editor, a staff of editorial writers, on which both conferences were equally represented, was chosen and a general manager was elected to have overall direction of the paper. Under this arrangement subscriptions quickly increased and continued through the years. The Advocate was moved back to Macon from Atlanta on Dec. 1, 1936. The first issue of the publication to come from a Macon press in forty-six years appeared Dec. 18, 1936. The remarkable growth of the Wesleyan since 1936 has been led by the following general managers: Charles A. Britton, Jr., Frank Q. Echols, Florence M. Gaines, C. Hoke Sewell, and Dan H. Williams.

The format of the Advocate in time was changed, new printing and photographic equipment purchased, until at the present time the Wesleyan Christian Advocate is considered to be fulfilling its mission ably. It has always enjoyed a wide circulation and continues to give strong leadership in the field of church journalism.

WESLEYAN CHURCH, THE, U.S.A., was formed by the merger of the WESLEYAN METHODIST CHURCH and the PILGRIM HOLINESS CHURCH on June 26, 1968, at Anderson, Ind.

The Wesleyan Methodist Church of the United States of America was founded in 1843. From the very beginning of the M.E. CHURCH in America, SLAVERY was an issue. Strong statements against slavery appeared in early editions of the Methodist Discipline. Before Methodism penetrated deeply and largely into the South, there had been little disagreement over such strong statements. By the middle 1830's, however, the slavery issue had become acute and there was great agitation.

It is fair to say that opposition to slavery was the common bond that drew together a great many Methodist ministers who on other issues also wanted to reform the church. A strong leader of these was ORANGE SCOTT. Such men, including the eminent LUTHER LEE, were zealous soul winners, great preachers, and effective writers. As reformers, however, they met with opposition from leaders of the M.E. Church. Some local quarterly conferences refused to grant LOCAL PREACHERS licenses to those who favored abolition of slavery. Some PRESIDING ELDERS and DISTRICT CONFERENCES refused credentials and appointments to the reformers. To climax it all, at the 1840 GENERAL CONFERENCE of the M. E. Church, J. O. ANDREW, a slave holder (by virtue of inheritance and by marriage) was elected to the bishopric. Presiding BISHOPS restrained debate on slavery in the General Conference sessions.

What appeared to be arbitrary restraint on the part of the bishops only added fuel to the fire of the reformers, and they turned out to be not only anti-slavery, but anti-episcopacy. Their opposition to episcopal government grew out of what they felt to be the arbitrary exercise of authority of certain leaders in the Church.

Some Methodists began to sever connections with the M.E. Church in 1841, and the first Wesleyan Methodist conference was established in the state of MICHIGAN that year. Later in 1842, Orange Scott, J. Horton, and L. R. Sunderland withdrew from the M.E. Church, and published in the first number of a weekly paper called The True Wesleyan, their reasons for withdrawal. These men, along with Luther Lee and L. C. MATLACK, met in February 1843, to formulate plans for a new denomination. This meeting resulted in the call for a general convention which was held at Utica, N. Y. commencing May 31, 1843. At this convention an overall organization was effected, a DISCIPLINE adopted, and a name chosen, The Wesleyan Methodist Church.

In 1843 it was believed that the ministers and lay delegates present at the organizing conference represented almost 15,000 people. These first Wesleyan Methodists forsook parsonages and churches—for they took no property with them—and then banded together to form their new connection.

The Church continued to grow and prosper. In 1948 the group of people known as the HEPHIZBAH FAITH MISSIONARY ASSOCIATION affiliated with the Wesleys. In 1958 the MISSIONARY BANDS OF THE WORLD entered the fold. In 1966 a merger was worked out with the Reformed Baptist Church of CANADA.

A more important union and slight change of name came about in 1968 by union with The Pilgrim Holiness Church. This Church dates back to 1897 when the International Holiness Union and Prayer League was organized by Martin Wells Knapp and Seth C. Rees. Going through several name changes, this group emerged as the International Apostolic Holiness Church in 1913. A merger was effected in 1919 with the Holiness Christian Church which dated from 1882. The new body was called the International Holiness Church. In 1922 two bodies, the Pentecostal Rescue Mission and the Pilgrim Church, merged with the International Holiness Church to form The Pilgrim Holiness Church. In 1924 the Pentecostal Brethren in Christ united with the Pilgrim Holiness Church. The People's Mission Church joined in 1925. Over the ensuing years, the church grew, augmented in 1946 by the acceptance of the Holiness Church. Union with the Wesleyan Methodist Church came June 26, 1968, and the new church was called simply The Wesleyan Church.

The doctrinal position of The Wesleyan Church is, as its name implies, Wesleyan. They regard the ARTICLES OF RELIGION adopted by early American Methodism as their standard. They are, however, representative of that branch of Methodism termed "holiness." They place a great deal of emphasis on "entire SANCTIFICATION" and the holy life. They also hold to the literal second coming of Christ.

Church Government. The Wesleyan Church is committed to principles of representative government patterned after the national government. The entire church is governed by direct vote or by elected representatives. Each local church may call its own pastor and enjoys considerable autonomy. The annual conference, composed of an equal number of ministers and laymen, elects its own officers, orders the work of the churches in its district, and ratifies the appointments of the pastors. The General Conference, generally meeting each four years, includes equal representation of lay and ministerial delegates elected by the annual conferences, and exercises final authority on all legislative matters of the denomination (except that constitutional changes must also be submitted for approval to the several annual conferences). General superintendents, elected for a quadrennial term, supervise the work of all the departments, institutions, and organizations of the Church; preside over sessions of the General Conference; and act as a board to render decisions on points of law between the sessions of the General Conference.

Education. Education was an early concern of both the Pilgrims and Wesleys. Attempts were made to establish colleges as early as 1860 by the Wesleyan Methodists. They finally succeeded after several attempts with the establishment of Houghton College in 1883. Others founded over the years include Central College (South Carolina, 1916), Millonvale College (Kansas, 1908), Marion College (Indiana, 1923), Houghton Academy (New York, 1945) and the Wesleyan Methodist College of Melbourne (Australia, 1961). From the Pilgrim-Holiness tradition comes Owasso College (Michigan).

Missions. The Missionary Program of the Wesleyan Church dates back to 1889 when J. Augustus Cole landed in SIERRA LEONE. From this beginning the foreign mission program has grown until at present there is work on all the continents and in the islands of the Pacific, as well as an extensive home mission program.

Publishing. The comparatively new Wesleyan Church possesses two publishing houses as a result of the recent merger. The church school literature was merged before the denominations were. The three major periodicals of the former Wesleyan Methodist Church, The Wesleyan Methodist, The Wesleyan Youth and The Wesleyan Missionary, were merged with the major Pilgrim Holiness publications, the Pilgrim Holiness Advocate and World Missions Bulletin.

The membership of the Wesleyan Church is slightly over 100,000 located in about 2,500 local churches.

WESLEYAN COLLEGE, Macon, Georgia, was chartered as Georgia Female College in 1836, and the name was changed to Wesleyan Female College in 1843, when it became the property of the GEORGIA CONFERENCE. The present name was adopted in 1924, and the institution continues as a liberal and fine arts college for women. It was the first institution in the world to be chartered as a college for women. GEORGE F. PIERCE, later a bishop of the M.E. Church, South, was the first president of the college. In 1840 degrees were conferred upon eleven members of the first graduating class. When the Civil War began in 1861, Wesleyan was the largest college in GEORGIA with 173 students, followed by EMORY with 126.

Wesleyan College lists among its alumnae and former students the three Soong sisters who have had important roles in the life of CHINA, one as the wife of Sun Yat-Sen, and the youngest as the wife of CHIANG KAI-SHEK.

Degrees offered are the B.A., B.S., B.M. (Music), B.F.A. (Fine Arts). The governing board has thirty-six trustees, six elected from the NORTH GEORGIA CONFERENCE, six from the SOUTH GEORGIA CONFERENCE, six from the FLORIDA CONFERENCE, six to eighteen at large, two bishops ex officio.

WESLEYAN DELEGATE MEETINGS were meetings organized by the GRAND CENTRAL ASSOCIATION in 1835 in the course of the controversy over the plan to set up the first Wesleyan Methodist theological college in England. The first meeting was held in Manchester, April 20-23, 1835, and the second—with about one hundred delegates—was held at Sheffield, at the time of the Wesleyan Methodist Conference there, July 30–August 7, 1835. The association of reformers hoped to extract from the Conference greater powers for the laity in the Wesleyan Methodist constitution. The Conference refused to negotiate with the delegates, however, or to grant any of their demands. The delegates came chiefly from the north and midlands. Later in 1835 the beaten reformers seceded, to the number of about fifteen thousand, from Wesleyan Methodism, and set up the WESLEYAN METHODIST ASSOCIATION.

WESLEYAN FEMALE COLLEGE, Murfreesboro, N. C., originated in 1852 and was a college affiliated with the VIRGINIA CONFERENCE of the M.E. Church, South, until about 1881. Then eastern North Carolina became a part of the NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE, at which time the college passed into the control of the latter conference.

Wesleyan Female College exerted a significant influence in education in northeastern North Carolina and southeastern Virginia during the forty years of its existence. The College was used for barracks by the Confederate Army for a while during the War Between the States and later as a hospital. Due to the exigencies of the war the College was forced temporarily to send the students to their homes and to disband the faculty.

In 1877, during the administration of President William G. Starr, the College was destroyed by fire but it was rebuilt in 1881.

A wide course offering was available for the Wesleyan students including classes in French, German, Spanish, Italian, as well as Latin and Greek. The cost for a session in 1858 was $15 for the Academic Department and $18 for the Collegiate Department, plus additional fees for specific courses. Room and board cost $60 per session in 1857-58. There were two sessions per academic term. It is estimated that between the opening of the College and 1877, about 1,500 students had matriculated. In 1889 students at the College received board plus instruction in English, French, Latin, German and piano for a nine months term for $200.

Wesleyan Female College was not rebuilt following another and final destructive fire of 1893.

RALPH HARDEE RIVES

WESLEYAN METHODISM, British, was the main channel of descent of Methodism from John Wesley's day. After Wesley's death in 1791 control of the Wesleyan Societies was taken over by the CONFERENCE of itinerants which he had set up. In 1795 the Conference for the first time authorized the itinerants to administer the Sacraments in societies which had no objection to their doing so, and this act is usually taken to mark the actual moment of separation of Wesleyanism from the Church of England. No attempt was made from the Anglican side to preserve the link between the two bodies; on the Wesleyan side an important tradition of friendliness toward the Establishment survived the separation, and for generations many Wesleyans did not regard themselves as Dissenters.

In 1796-97 there was an internal struggle over the Wesleyan constitution; in 1797 about one tenth of the membership withdrew to form the more democratic METHODIST NEW CONNEXION. No concessions were made, however; the Wesleyan itinerants continued to monopolize legislative authority; they alone attended the annual Conference; they alone could admit or expel from the local societies, which, it is important to remember, were never thought of as being independent local churches, in the style of the British Nonconformists. Membership continued to increase after 1800, but the connection had to survive the strains of the Napoleonic Wars, when the British government became suspicious of any kind of lower-class organization: hence the attack of Lord Sidmouth in 1811.

The dominant figure of post-Wesleyan Methodism was JABEZ BUNTING, the outstanding minister between 1815 and 1849. Bunting helped to start the WESLEYAN METHODIST MISSIONARY SOCIETY (1814); he did much to make the Wesleyan itinerants more conscious of their role as ministers of Christ's Church; he established the Theological Institution (1834) to help to train them for their work; he did his best to persuade the laity to accept a church order in which all final decisions remained in the hands of the ministry, and he firmly believed that in doing so he was maintaining Wesleyanism as John Wesley had conceived it. He was mentally arrogant; he had too little sympathy with opposition to know how to cope with it, but he, if anyone, molded the Wesleyan societies into a regular denomination.

Between about 1820 and 1857 Wesleyan history largely revolved around the constitutional issues and the personality of Bunting. The demand for a more democratic church order, especially for lay representation in the Conference, was repulsed again and again, in the Leeds organ controversy (see LEEDS PROTESTANT METHODISTS) of 1827-28; in the SAMUEL WARREN or theological college controversy of 1834-37; and in the FLY SHEETS controversy of 1849-57. In each case the result was a secession from Wesleyan Methodism, of the Leeds Protestant Methodists in 1828, the WESLEYAN METHODIST ASSOCIATION in 1837, and the UNITED METHODIST FREE CHURCHES in 1857. Many issues exacerbated the conflict, including the personal hatred of JAMES EVERETT for Jabez Bunting; the publication of the anonymous Fly Sheets, which were pamphlets attacking Jabez Bunting and his supporters; and the education question, in which it seemed to many Wesleyans that their leaders ought not to support the policy of government involvement in education. These quarrels overshadowed the highly successful CENTENARY FUND Celebrations of 1839. Matters came to a head at the Conference of 1849, when James Everett, WILLIAM GRIFITH, and SAMUEL DUNN were accused of having written the Fly Sheets; they refused to answer either yes or no to the direct question about authorship and were expelled for contumacy. The agitation in favor of the expelled ministers, which lasted from 1849-57, shook Wesleyan Methodism to its foundations; a third of the membership disappeared, and although these losses were made up in the 1860's and 1870's, a certain note of confidence and optimism vanished, never to return.

The lay representation which the seceders demanded in 1849 was granted in 1877-78, owing to the efforts of a new generation of Wesleyan Methodist ministers, among them WILLIAM BUNTING and MORLEY PUNSHON, who saw this as the minimum condition of permanent recovery. Other pressures also now began to act on the connection, which showed great resilience in the last quarter of the nineteenth century. The pressure of industrialization on the English churches first became apparent about 1860. The WESLEYAN HOME MISSION DEPARTMENT was created to try and organize the recovery of ground lost in the new urban areas. One result was the FORWARD MOVEMENT, which set up central missions in many of the larger towns between 1875 and 1900. The principle of itinerancy survived, but ministers tended to stay longer in the same circuit, and some central-mission appointments became virtually permanent, as in the cases of HUGH PRICE HUGHES at St. James Hall, London; J. S. LIDGETT at the Bermondsey Mission, London; and SAMUEL COLLIER, at the Central Mission in Manchester. The first results of the Forward Movement were good, but it seems that success here did not check the decline which had started in the circuits about 1880, though the full results of this decline did not show themselves until after the First World War.

Another important episode was the missionary controversy (1890), in which H. P. Hughes sharply criticized the policy of Wesleyan missions in INDIA; later history was to bear out the suspicion that there was more to be said for his point of view than was admitted by the official committee of inquiry which rejected it in toto. Hughes was more successful on the political level; he led the late nineteenth-century movement to identify Wesleyan Methodism politically with the Liberal Party. The alliance was symbolized in the career of the statesman, H. H. FOWLER, who became the first Wesleyan Methodist to hold cabinet rank when he became president of the Local Government Board in the Liberal government of 1892.

During the nineteenth century Wesleyan Methodism also moved steadily away from the Church of England. The rise of the Anglo-Catholic movement after 1833 made Wesleyans much more hesitant about the virtues of Establishment, and Anglo-Catholic attacks on the validity of Wesleyan ministerial orders made matters worse. Wesleyan Methodism, however, did not officially support the Free Church campaigns for Disestablishment, and this restraint played an important part in the survival of the Church of England. From about 1870 closer links were established with the other Free Churches, and this process reached its climax in the formation of the National Council of Evangelical Free Churches, whose first annual assembly met in 1896. The social and political influence of Wesleyan Methodism reached its peak about 1900, in the era of the Nonconformist conscience. The self-confidence of the period was symbolized in the TWENTIETH CENTURY FUND, a scheme started at the Conference of 1898 to raise a million guineas from a million Methodists. It was largely the idea of ROBERT PERKS, who drove the plan forward to success by 1902. Westminster Central Hall, London, the central office and church of the present Methodist Church, was one result of the raising of the fund.

In retrospect, the religious influence of the Wesleyan connection on Victorian England is seen as conservative; biblical criticism and scientific thought affected the Wesleyans more slowly than it did the Congregationalist and Presbyterian Churches; as late as 1904, J. A. BEET had to resign his post as the theological tutor at Richmond College, London, because he was determined to publish a book which rejected the doctrine of the eternal punishment of the wicked and substituted a version of the annihilation theory. The connection produced preachers rather than theologians, though RICHARD WATSON, W. B. POPE, and J. S. LIDGETT all made contributions of a limited kind to standard evangelical theology. The emphasis on experience rather than dogma led to warm support for forms of Christian action: between 1840 and 1870 the connection steadily became more teetotal, a movement which changed the nature of the English Free Churches in general. It was significant of the Wesleyan tendency not to commit the connection entirely to the Dissenting tradition, however, that the appropriate connectional department was styled the TEMPERANCE (not the Teetotal) Department. The terrible schism of 1849-57 perhaps made the Wesleyans unduly nervous of open controversy. On the other hand, the connection took a large share in the early nineteenth century efforts to educate the poorer children of the country; hundreds of connectional day schools were built between 1840 and 1870; these schools were slowly abandoned after the state took over elementary education in 1870, and today less than fifty of them survive.

The twentieth century was in some ways not a happy time for Wesleyan Methodism. The social and political influence of the connection began to diminish even under the sympathetic Liberal government of 1906-14. After the First World War, moreover, the Liberal Party declined rapidly with the decay of the social system which had given it and the Wesleyan connection prominence. The most important development in the twentieth century was the achievement of union with the two other important Methodist churches in 1932. This process may be traced back to the admission of laymen into the Wesleyan Conference in 1878, a change which greatly reduced the constitutional gap between Wesleyanism and the other Methodist denominations.

The Wesleyan connection took the initiative in seeking union, setting up an exploratory committee in 1913. The First World War then hindered progress, but in 1918 a joint committee of the three churches was empowered to draw up a draft scheme of union. In the negotiations which followed, the Wesleyan negotiators, led by ALDOM FRENCH, consented to the abolition of the LEGAL HUNDRED, and accepted the innovation of a lay vice-president, but persuaded the other Methodists to accept the idea of a two-session Conference, in which the ministry still sat by itself in the so-called pastoral session. There was more opposition to union in the Wesleyan connection than elsewhere, especially among the ministers; their leader was J. E. RATTENBURY. This opposition took a high view of the Church, the ministry, and the Sacraments, and was anxious to safeguard the long-term possibilities of union with the Church of England. As late as 1926 the vote in the Wesleyan Synods in favor of the scheme of union was only sixty-six percent in the representative sessions, and only fifty-seven percent in the pastoral sessions. In the Conference of 1926, however, the opposition vote was reduced to twenty-five percent, the lowest of the whole struggle. This made eventual union inevitable, and a compromise between the two sides in 1927 made the final consummation possible in 1932. But the degree of opposition in Wesleyan Methodism helps to explain the slow development of the united Methodist Church. At the time of METHODIST UNION the Wesleyan Methodist connection had about 500,000 members, and was larger than the two other Methodist bodies put together. Quite apart from this contribution to the ecumenical movement—no other large-scale union has taken place in England in the present century—Wesleyan Methodism also contributed to the theological reconstruction of Christianity. W. F. MOULTON played a large part in the preparation of the Revised Version; his elder son, J. H. MOULTON, became an authority on the Egyptian papyri and wrote a standard Grammar of New Testament Greek; with G. Milligan he also compiled a standard Vocabulary of the New Testament. Moulton was killed in the First World War. W. F. LOFTHOUSE, W. F. HOWARD, and VINCENT TAYLOR all wrote important works on the New Testament. One of the ablest British leaders of the ecumenical movement was R. NEWTON FLEW, who entered the Wesleyan ministry in 1910. Wesleyan Methodism preserved throughout its existence a memory of its origins within the Church of England; it never completely identified itself with Dissent or with Free Churchmanship. If Wesleyans slowly abandoned the attitude to the Bible which came naturally to the Wesleys, they continued to sing Charles Wesley's hymns, and so to be moved by the theology which enlivens them. If the eighteenth-century class meeting had largely ceased to exist by the end of the nineteenth century, it is also true that Wesleyanism had not forgotten Wesley's insistence on religion as a communal pursuit—this bore new fruit in the group movement among Methodists in British universities in the twentieth century. Nor did anything quite destroy in the Wesleyan mind the conviction implanted there by the Wesleys, that the Church exists to evangelize. This mood was the deepest contribution of Wesleyan Methodism to the modern ecumenical movement.

nual Assembly," dropped for the time being the title "Reverend," and asserted the constitutional interdependency of each local Methodist society—a radical departure from Wesleyan principle. The leader was ROBERT ECKETT. In 1848 the membership of the association was 20,775. There were 3 circuits with more than 1,000 members: Camelford (Devon), 1,534; Rochdale (Lancashire), 1,298; Leeds (Yorkshire), 1,266. There were 330 Sunday schools and 42,032 scholars. There were 96 pastors. After 1849 the association became involved in the agitation about the FLY SHEETS; in 1857 it merged its identity in the UNITED METHODIST FREE CHURCHES.

WESLEYAN METHODIST MISSIONARY SOCIETY. (See METHODIST MISSIONARY SOCIETY.)

WESLEYAN REFORM UNION is a British Methodist body which emerged at the time of the FLY SHEETS controversy, when the Wesleyan Methodist societies were divided by questions of church order. The four hundred Reformers who met in London in 1850 were a mixed body led by the alleged writers of the Fly Sheets, JAMES EVERETT, SAMUEL DUNN, and WILLIAM GRIFFITH. This group did not stay together, and William Griffith remained with the section which became the Wesleyan Reform Union, with a membership of about 17,000 and 250 preaching places. The principal centers were Yorkshire, Derbyshire, Lincolnshire, Northamptonshire, and Cornwall. Griffith was three times president of the Wesleyan Reform Union Conference. Although the union respects the memory of John Wesley and adheres substantially to the doctrines of Methodism, it did not become part of the Methodist Church in the Union of 1932. The essential differences between the Wesleyan Reform Union and the Methodist Church are:

- 1) Wesleyan Reform Union local churches are all separate entities, self-governing, not admitting outside interference.
- 2) The property of the Wesleyan Reform Churches is their own.
- 3) The Wesleyan Reform Union Conference, which meets annually, is a body of delegates from churches and circuits, from which a General Committee, including officials and secretaries of departments, is elected by vote of Conference, and this is the executive body.
- 4) The authority of the Wesleyan Reform Union ministry is more restricted than that of Methodist ministers. Local preachers may, when required, perform the same offices as the separated ministry. The Wesleyan Reform Union remained small, and in 1965 had about 5,600 members and 158 preaching places.

WESLEYAN METHODIST ASSOCIATION was a body of British Wesleyan Methodists who seceded from the old connection in 1835 and finally accepted a new constitution, as the Wesleyan Methodist Association, in 1837. The LEEDS PROTESTANT METHODISTS also formed part of the association, which represented an extreme reaction against the authoritarian traditions of the Wesleyan Methodist ministerial Conference. The association repudiated legislative authority in the Conference, which it renamed "An-

WESLEYAN REFORMERS (British). This term is often found in books and articles describing the agitation in WESLEYAN METHODISM during the middle of the nineteenth century. Unease at the lack of democracy in Methodist polity had already caused several controversies and divisions, notably the Leeds Protestant Methodists and the WESLEYAN METHODIST ASSOCIATION, but discontent remained, especially with the autocracy of JABEZ BUNTING. This found a focal point in the anonymous FLY SHEETS circulated to Wesleyan ministers in 1844, 1846, 1847, and 1848. A spate of pamphlets and articles in periodicals led to the tearing apart of the parent connection. This came to a head at the Wesleyan Conference of 1849, when JAMES EVERETT, SAMUEL DUNN, and WILLIAM GRIFFITH refused explicitly to deny their association with the Fly Sheets and were expelled. By means of mass meetings and press propaganda "The Three Expelled" aroused widespread public sympathy. They and their followers were popularly known as "Wesleyan Reformers" and their campaign as "The Wesleyan Reform Movement." Within a few years 100,000 members were lost to the Wesleyan Methodist Church. The Wesleyan Reformers as a whole did not constitute themselves into a separate denomination, however. After protracted discussions many joined forces with the Wesleyan Methodist Association in 1857 to form the UNITED METHODIST FREE CHURCHES. A smaller number became federated in 1859 as the Wesleyan Reform Union. Others drifted back to Wesleyan Methodism or to other denominations, or severed their Christian affiliations completely.

WESLEYAN SERVICE GUILD, THE, is an organization of The United Methodist Church which is auxiliary to the WOMEN'S SOCIETY OF CHRISTIAN SERVICE. It was organized in the former Methodist Episcopal Church in 1921, and continued in The Methodist Church. It is composed of employed women who of necessity must set other times for their meetings than those which are held during normal business hours. This Guild uses the same program materials, magazines, and other literature as does the Women's Society, and through pledges and gifts aids in the support of the same type of mission to community local and general work. The Guild members, in part because of the diversity of their occupations, have been active in many phases of Christian Social Relations. Because there is a diversity of skills among the members of the Guild, it makes it possible to explore and assist in many specialized areas of work at home and abroad.

Disciplinary regulations outline the aim, duties and composition of the Wesleyan Service Guild, in its general, Conference and local church organization. Such regulations may be expected to be altered in minor particulars from quadrennium to quadrennium. Guild members pioneer in week-end gatherings for seminars on such subjects as mission study, spiritual development, and Christian Social relations. Membership of the Wesleyan Guild at last reporting was 122,700 and their gifts and pledges are proportionate to their membership. The Guild has played an influential part in the outreach of the Church to peoples in fifty-two countries and the United States; to the work with the United Nations, and to the local church.

WESLEYAN TAKINGS was an anonymous book which first appeared in 1840 in connection with the Centenary Celebrations of British Wesleyan Methodism. It was a collection of a hundred written sketches of WESLEYAN METHODIST ministers of the period, prefaced by the quotation, "Whose is this image? And they said _____'s; and they marvelled." Entertaining, sly, and cutting, the book gave offense because it was disrespectful to the pastoral office. The portrait of JABEZ BUNTING revealed the subject and (for many) the author: "He is great in mind, and great in influence—too great to be forgiven; if he were less so, it might be borne." (Takings, p. 6) Bunting's career, it was said, was "a monotony of greatness." His real offense to the anonymous author was his great power as a ruler: "He has kept his eyes fixed on the working of the whole of the machinery, while others have attended to the rotatory motion of a single wheel." (p. 12) The third edition contained a further biting preface for the guidance of the "Wesleyan detective force" in hunting down the author. The book was attacked in the Wesleyan Methodist Magazine, and general suspicion fell on JAMES EVERETT, who was in fact the author. Jabez Bunting's London District recommended the Conference to discover the identity of the author; it sent letters to the suspects, including Everett and his colleague, RICHARD BURDSALL, who were stationed at YORK. These letters were simply ignored; similar letters from the Conference of 1841 were met with defiance. Everett refused to answer "because of the suspicious circumstances in which I have been placed by Dr. Bunting and his Committee, and subsequently the Conference." (Takings, vol. ii, p. xii) Although Jabez Bunting declared in the Conference that the book could not kill a flea, even the president, JAMES DIXON, was obliged to clear himself of suspicion before the Conference. The Conference condemned the book, especially the preface to the third edition, which it called "Unworthy of any person maintaining the Christian or ministerial character" (Minutes of the Wesleyan Methodist Conference, 1841). It also condemned the letters which Everett and Burdsall had written. In 1851, in the midst of the great crisis of Wesleyan Methodism, a second volume of Takings was published; this contained further violent attacks on Jabez Bunting reprinted from the Wesleyan Times, a journal which supported the reforming party in Wesleyanism.

WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY, Middletown, Connecticut, chartered in 1831, was the first of the permanent Methodist colleges to begin classroom work. (RANDOLPH-MACON was chartered in 1830 and opened classes in 1832.) Its founders were the NEW ENGLAND and NEW YORK ANNUAL CONFERENCES, and its charter stated it was to be managed "in behalf of the annual conferences or GENERAL CONFERENCE of the M.E. Church." While the control of the institution was thus vested with the M.E. Church, the charter stands as an example of tolerance in a time of intense denominational rivalry. It held that "subscribing to religious tenets shall never be a condition of admission to students or a cause of ineligibility to the president, professors, or other officers."

At the outset it demonstrated that church control was not inconsistent with a "nonsectarian" spirit. A charter granted in 1870 required that "at all times the majority of the trustees, the president, and a majority of the faculty shall be members of the Methodist Episcopal Church." These restrictions were removed by revision of the charter in 1907. The 1907 charter granted twelve conferences in the northeastern part of the United States the right to elect one trustee each. It did, however, leave with the board itself the conditions under which they were to be elected and the continuation of the right to elect. By 1937 election of trustees by the twelve annual conferences was discontinued.

The university, now a self-perpetuating institution, makes no claim of Methodist connection except a historical one. Efforts to change the name of the university have on two occasions failed.

Beginning with the first president, WILBUR FISK, all of the presidents from 1831 until 1924 were Methodist ministers, with one exception: the fourth president was a Methodist layman. Since 1924 the presidents have been laymen and members of other denominations.

By its charter, Wesleyan was given the rights for a university, but notwithstanding pressures for theological and law schools it never expanded beyond an arts and science college.

The college from its inception through the first quarter of the twentieth century was Methodist-oriented with its roots deeply imbedded in the life of the church. At least eighteen of its alumni were elected bishops in the M.E. Church (two in the M.E. Church, South). Until 1930, twenty percent of the graduates entered the ministry, the large majority in the M.E. Church. Its leadership was felt in every area of the church's life, particularly in education.

The name "Wesleyan" was adopted by fifteen or more institutions, and its graduates led in establishing the church's educational program on the expanding frontier. Twenty-six percent of Wesleyan's graduates entered the teaching profession, and almost half of this number were connected with institutions of higher education. In the period when it had vital church connections it was never placed lower than fourth on the relative proportion of graduates of the colleges and universities who appeared in Who's Who in America.

Wesleyan's interest in being a church-related institution began to wane during the first quarter of the twentieth century. It no longer enjoyed the exclusive interest of Methodist conferences, and the conferences themselves did not possess the interest in education that existed in the founding conferences. This may have been foreseen by Wilbur Fisk, who gave to the New York Conference his "dying request" that it nurse Wesleyan University.

No one can estimate with accuracy the money received prior to 1930 by Wesleyan because of its Methodist connections. A check of the list of persons who helped to build Wesleyan's plant and endowment shows a preponderance of Methodist members. Its endowment during the administration of the last Methodist president, Shanklin (1908-24), increased from $1,540,632 to $4,392,019. The university participated in the financial development program of 1915-20 sponsored by the Board of EDUCATION of the M.E. Church.

The centennial of Wesleyan University was commemorated Oct. 10-12, 1931. The centennial sermon was preached by Bishop HERBERT WELCH, class of 1857, from the text, "Remove not the ancient landmark, which thy fathers have set."

The scholarship of Wesleyan under Methodist auspices gave it a reputation of being an educational institution of quality. Its Phi Beta Kappa chapter was installed in 1845. The roster of its professors included many excellent scholars who kept abreast of the developments of their fields, and who had an awareness of the relationship of religion to their work as teachers.

JOHN O. GROSS

WESLEYANA. Even during JOHN WESLEY's lifetime, and especially during his latter years, he was so venerated that engraved portraits and porcelain busts depicting him were in great demand, as were souvenirs of his visits to various homes or areas, or of his association with different people—chairs in which he sat, china which he used, articles of clothing which he had worn, coins which he had presented, locks clipped from his head (of which the writer has one). Personal letters from him were passed on as family heirlooms, and have increased enormously in value through the years. Examples of the five hundred or more items which he and his brother CHARLES published, which passed through two thousand editions during his lifetime, and many more since, continued to be read (or at least preserved) for sentimental if not always for devotional or theological reasons.

Wesley made it easier for treasure hunters in that he hoarded his correspondence and notebooks through the years, from time to time publishing extracts in his Arminian Magazine. By his will (1789) all his papers were bequeathed to THOMAS COKE, JOHN WHITEHEAD, and HENRY MOORE, "to be burnt or published as they should see good." At Wesley's death two years later Coke was in America, Moore stationed in BRISTOL, and Whitehead, then a LOCAL PREACHER living in LONDON, took charge of the manuscripts, agreeing to the request of the London preachers that he should prepare a biography of Wesley. He refused to allow his fellow literary executors to see Wesley's manuscripts until he had published the biography, which became a personal rather than a Methodist enterprise. Coke and Moore tried to forestall him by publishing a hasty life of Wesley, but they had to do so without much of the documentation enriching Whitehead's two volumes, which appeared in 1793 and 1796. After finishing volume two Whitehead handed the papers back to Methodism in the person of JOHN PAWSON, superintendent of the London circuit. Pawson proceeded to burn many items which he considered unedifying, including Wesley's annotated copy of Shakespeare, and probably many of the notebooks which contained his shorthand diary for the years 1742-81. It seems likely that other manuscripts were given away as souvenirs. When Henry Moore heard of this he protested, and the remaining books and papers were sent to him, to be used in his enlarged biography of Wesley, published in two volumes (1824-25) after the death of his fellow-executor Coke. Moore's collection was bequeathed to three literary executors, and from the last survivor, William Gandy, passed to J. J. Colman of Norwich, thence to his son Russell J. Colman, and eventually (as the Colman Collection) to the Methodist Church of Great Britain, which now houses it in the Methodist ARCHIVES and Research Centre in London.

Only the published material was available to Robert Southey when he compiled his biography of Wesley, though he did correspond with CHARLES WESLEY's daughter SARAH, obtaining from her some family traditions. Like his brother John, Charles Wesley also retained masses of correspondence and other papers, including many unpublished manuscript collections of hymns and poems. These were acquired for Methodism from his daughter Sarah Wesley by THOMAS JACKSON, and are similarly cared for in the Methodist Archives, which thus owns by far the best collection of Wesley manuscripts in the world. Many Wesley manuscripts of various kinds are to be found elsewhere, however, especially letters. Because in his later years Charles Wesley disagreed with his brother's increasing tendency to separate from the CHURCH OF ENGLAND he took a less active part in the life of the Methodist societies, and although highly regarded by many did not receive the mass veneration accorded his brother. One indication of this is that very few of his letters and other relics have been preserved apart from those kept by the family. G. J. STEVENSON secured some.

During the first half of the nineteenth century many Methodists tried to secure whatever they could which had been associated in any way with the Wesleys, especially John Wesley. Sometimes this was done with scholarly intent, more often with a purely sentimental or antiquarian interest, and usually with a mixture of the two. One of the earliest was WILLIAM MARRIOTT, one of the general executors of Wesley's will, who transmitted the fever to his son Thomas, who vividly remembered being taken when he was five to see Wesley lying in state in his coffin. Thomas Marriott (1786-1852) became a well known Methodist antiquary, enriching the pages of the Wesleyan Methodist Magazine with many articles based upon his collection of Wesleyana. Marriott's collection was bequeathed to GEORGE OSBORN. Much of Osborn's collection, including many bound volumes of pamphlets, was acquired by DREW UNIVERSITY in 1880, a decade before Osborn's death.

ADAM CLARKE is best known for his Bible commentary, but he was a deeply-read scholar in many fields, and it is largely to his enthusiasm for the Wesleys that we owe the survival of many early Methodist traditions and items of Wesleyana. For his Wesley Family Clarke utilized his own accumulations, those of Thomas Marriott, and (among others) those of JAMES EVERETT. Everett was notorious as a critic of the Methodist establishment as personified in JAREZ BUNTING, but he was also a great admirer of Wesley, a prolific writer on Methodist history, and an enthusiastic collector of Wesleyana and Methodistica. A large part of Everett's collection was bought by LUKE TYERMAN from the aged Everett, and he used it to good effect in his own works on the Wesleys and early Methodism. Many of the manuscripts in Tyerman's collection were purchased by George Stampe of Grimsby, co-founder with RICHARD GREEN of the WESLEY HISTORICAL SOCIETY, from whom they passed to EDMUND SYKES LAMPLOUGH, who will be discussed later. Tyerman's pamphlets were purchased about 1895 and found their way to Drew University—over 2,000 titles in 275 volumes. Many of these came originally from Everett, whose early start and business for several years as a practicing bookseller gave him more opportunities than most later collectors. Others of Everett's collected pamphlets are now in the British Museum. One of Everett's most prized treasures he retained until his death in 1872. Through his literary executors it came to the United Methodist Church, and thus to the present Methodist Archives in London. This was a bound volume of holograph letters by Wesley and his colleagues, which formed the backbone of George Eyars' Letters of John Wesley.

The latter half of the nineteenth century was the high day of collectors of Wesleyana and Methodistica, with many public auctions at which Wesley items sold for moderate prices, with plenty of Wesley material still in private hands, and occasional large collections coming on the market, such as those of Samuel Romilly Hall and John Sundius Stamp, descendant of one of Wesley's stepdaughters. Much of this material, happily, gravitated towards institutions, where it was usually carefully preserved while remaining accessible to scholars. Thus G. A. K. HOBILL'S LIBRARY was presented to the METHODIST NEW CONNEXION CONFERENCE, whence it came to VICTORIA COLLEGE, and then to HARTLEY-VICTORIA COLLEGE. Similarly CHARLES PREST'S pamphlets went to the Wesleyan Methodist Conference, Hall's to DIDSBURY COLLEGE, Stamp's (like Thomas Jackson's wonderful library) to RICHMOND COLLEGE. There were still pickings for the multiplying private collectors, however, among whom a few may be mentioned. Many private collections, large and small, eventually went to appease the rising desire of Methodist institutions overseas for relics of their founder.

Thomas E. Bridgen was a true scholar-antiquarian, who wrote the British section of Bishop J. F. HURST'S History of Methodism. Much of Bridgen's collection was bought by W. H. FITCHETT and presented to Queen's College, MELBOURNE, which owns the best collection of Wesleyana outside the British Isles and the American continent. C. D. Harcastle was a modest but eager collector who secured many of the rarer Irish editions of the Wesleys' publications, especially of their hymns; most of these are now in the Wesley Historical Society library in Belfast. E. Thursfield Smith of Whitchurch was able to accumulate a much more extensive collection, much of which came to EMORY UNIVERSITY, some to Rylands Library, MANCHESTER, some to Didsbury College, and some onto the open market. The varied holdings of Joseph C. Wright of Wolverhampton were sold by public auction after his death in 1910, though some portions have found their ways eventually to Methodist institutions. Richard Green's wonderful collection of the publications of the Wesleys (strongest in first editions) was bought after his death by Sir John Eaton, and presented to VICTORIA UNIVERSITY, Toronto. Marmaduke Riggall's Wesleyana were sold by auction in 1928.

One of the most resolute bidders at most of these auctions (under his pseudonym of "Smyth"), was E. S. Lamplough, who secured much of George Stampe's collection. So enthusiastic was Lamplough that he even managed to persuade the WESLEYAN METHODIST MISSIONARY SOCIETY to part with much of the material in their Museum of Methodist Antiquities in return for generous financial support, with the condition that upon his death this material would revert to the Methodist Church. Lamplough assembled one of the most voluminous and valuable collections of Wesleyana and Methodistica ever in private hands, and at his death in 1940 bequeathed the whole collection to Methodism. It now swells the rich resources of the Methodist Archives and Research Centre. More recently ISAAC FOOT'S library has been purchased by the University of California, the valuable Wesleyana therein being allotted to the campus at Santa Barbara. The bulk of my own collection of Wesleyana and Methodistica has been purchased by DUKE UNIVERSITY, which now holds easily the second best collection in the world of eighteenth century editions of the Wesleys' writings, second only to that in the Methodist Archives, London.

Although a few Americans began collecting Wesleyana in the nineteenth century (like Curtis H. Cavender, who specialized in anti-Methodist literature and used the anagram "Decanver" as a pseudonym) the heyday of the American collection has been the twentieth century. Again the normal procedure has been for the holdings of the private collector to find a permanent home in some Methodist institution. Thus (to mention only a few of those who have died) EZRA SQUIER TIPPLE's Wesleyana went to Drew University, Bishop F. D. LEETE's (after some migrations) to the PERKINS SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY, Southern Methodist University, Bishop G. BROMLEY OXNAM's to WESLEY SEMINARY, Washington, and ELMER T. CLARK's to the World Methodist Building, LAKE JUALUSKA. Elmer Clark also bought from J. Ernest Eagles of CLIFF COLLEGE the best collection of Wesley pottery then extant apart from that of James Botteley, presented to the Wesleyan Methodist Conference in 1912.

Many more names, both of individuals and of institutions, cry aloud for inclusion, but enough has been said to underline the fact that there has been and remains a great veneration for John Wesley and the Methodists of his day, a great enthusiasm to possess human artifacts associated with him, and (we believe) an increasing appreciation of his outstanding contribution under God to the spiritual development of the world. WESLEYDALE, near Kaeo on the Whangaroa Harbor, was the name given to the first Wesleyan mission station in NEW ZEALAND, founded by SAMUEL LEIGH in 1823. After only two months, when the mission staff suffered many indignities at the hands of unfriendly Maoris, Leigh's health broke down and he was forced to return to Australia, leaving Nathaniel Turner and John Hobbs (at that time a lay missionary) in charge.

With few encouragements and many disappointments, the missionaries faithfully carried on the work for several more years. Then early in January, 1827, a war party under Chief Hongi, attacked and destroyed the station, the missionaries escaping only with their lives. They returned temporarily to New South Wales and reestablished the mission later the same year in the Hokianga District.

In New Zealand Methodism's centenary year, 1922, a memorial cairn was erected to mark the site of Wesleydale, and in the main street of nearby Kaeo a beautiful church was built as a memorial to the pioneer missionaries and their families.

WESSINGTON SPRINGS ACADEMY, Wessington Springs, South Dakota, was established as an elementary and secondary school in September 1886 by the South Dakota Conference of the FREE METHODIST CHURCH. Largely through the influence of A. B. Smart, a Methodist minister of Wessington Springs, the location committee chose Wessington Springs as the most desirable location. The school was opened Nov. 15, 1887, Professor J. K. Freeland, principal. In 1916 the name was changed to Wessington Springs Junior College. After careful study the trustees in April 1964, decided to change to a four-year high school program to begin on Sept. 1, 1964. There are approximately 100 students.

WEST, ARTHUR (1910-), American minister and Executive Secretary of METHODIST INFORMATION of The United Methodist Church, was born in Grant City, Mo., on Feb. 13, 1910. He was the son of Elmer E. and Maude (Younkin) West. His education was at Missouri Wesleyan, A.A., 1929; BAKER UNIVERSITY, A.B., 1931, and D.D., 1953; BOSTON UNIVERSITY, M.A., 1934, and S.T.B., 1935. He specialized in journalism and public relations at NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY, 1945-55, and at the University of Chicago, 1957. His wife is Vera Spreckelmeyer, whom he married on Sept. 27, 1931, and their children are Paul and David.

Arthur West was received on trial in the MISSOURI CONFERENCE in 1928 and into full connection in 1933. He received his ELDER's orders in 1935. He served as pastor in Civil Bend, 1928-29; Wesley Church, St. Joseph, 1929-31; Savannah, 1931-32, (all appointments in MISSOURI). He was then transferred to MASSACHUSETTS where he served at Whitman, 1933-35; then came back to Cuba, Mo., in 1936. He was then in Warren, R. I., 1936-42; and in Grace Church, Bangor, Maine, 1944-48. He was made the religion editor of the Providence Journal and Evening Bulletin, 1942-44, and that of the Bangor (Maine) Daily News, 1946-48. He then went into the work of the Commission on Public Relations and Methodist Information of The Methodist Church, being made associate director in charge of the CHICAGO office in 1948-64. On the retirement of Dr. RALPH STODDY, he was elected general secretary of Methodist Information, 1964—the name of this organization being changed in 1968 to United Methodist Information.

Dr. West has also served as associate editor of the NORTHWESTERN JURISDICTION Daily Christian Advocate, 1948-52, and was a member of the press staff of the Second Assembly of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, 1954, and of the WORLD METHODIST CONFERENCE, 1947, '51, '56, and '61. WEST ALLIS, WISCONSIN, U.S.A., Methodist Manor, Inc., is a church-operated home for the aging owned and operated by the EAST WISCONSIN CONFERENCE of The United Methodist Church. Located on nineteen acres of land, it offers a home to 195 aging men and women. Construction was completed in 1960 at a total cost of $2,600,000, which included land, furnishings, and construction.

Methodist Manor has a Health Center of sixty-four beds licensed by the Boards of Health of the State of Wisconsin and the city of West Allis, and planned to give skilled nursing care to the residents. The Health Center is Medicare certified. Construction of an independent nursing home is imminent.

Methodist Manor is operated under a corporation of twenty-seven directors, elected by the East Wisconsin Conference of The United Methodist Church—nine ministers, nine laymen and nine laywomen. The functional operation of Methodist Manor has as its single aim the care of aging men and women and is an entirely non-profit organization. Adequate resident activities make home-life challenging. Methodist Manor allows no discrimination on the basis of race, color or national origin.

Methodist Manor is a member of the East Wisconsin Methodist Homes Association and is under the direction of the Executive Director, George H. Palmer.

WEST CHINA MISSION. In 1891, Szechwan, West CHINA, was selected by the Methodist Church of CANADA for its new mission field. It was situated at the head of China's central highway, the Yangtze River, in one of the most populous and inaccessible parts of the country.

The original party of missionaries consisted of Dr. and Mrs. VIRGIL C. HART, veterans of missionary work in China under the Methodist Episcopal Church, U.S.A., their daughter, Stella (afterward Mrs. Hare), Dr. and Mrs. Omar L. Kilborn, Rev. and Mrs. George E. Hartwell, and Dr. and Mrs. David W. Stevenson. The group landed at Shanghai on Nov. 3, 1891; in mid-February they left for the interior, arriving in Chengtu, the capital of Szechwan on May 21, 1892. At that time the China Inland Mission had six or seven workers in Chengtu, and the Methodist Episcopal Church had a single male missionary.

The first reinforcements, James Endicott and his wife, and Dr. H. Mather Hare, arrived in Chengtu in the spring of 1894. They were accompanied by Sara C. Brackbill and Dr. Retta Gifford (later the second Mrs. Kilborn), sent out by the Woman's Missionary Society. The latter were sent to replace Amelia Brown, who had been with the pioneer party, but had married Stevenson before they left Shanghai. In 1896 Dr. and Mrs. W. E. Smith joined the group in Chengtu.

The growth of the mission was slow at first. By 1901 there were only nineteen missionaries under the General Board and the Woman's Missionary Society. In 1917 the mission staff included seventy-five men, sixty-seven of whom were married, and thirty-five single women; in 1919 there were 155 under the General Board and thirty-two women under the W.M.S. At Union, there were 218 missionaries on the field, 177 under the board and forty-one under the W.M.S. By 1917 Szechwan had eight foreign missions with 443 missionaries, the Canadian Mission having thirty-six percent of this total.

As the number of missionaries increased, the territory of the mission expanded. In 1894 Kiating, 100 miles south of Chengtu, was opened; in 1905, Junghsien and Jenshow; in 1907, Penhsien and Tzeliutsing; in 1908, Luchow. In 1910 the mission took over the London Missionary Society field in West China, thus including Chungking in its territory. In 1911 Chungchow was opened; in 1913, Fowchow. By 1925 there were ten stations and a hundred outstations.

In 1892 a SUNDAY SCHOOL was started; in 1894 a church was built in Chengtu, the gift of Jairus Hart of Halifax. In 1893 the street chapel preaching began. Unfortunately the antiforeign riots of 1895 destroyed everything, but in 1896 the missionaries returned from Shanghai, and the work began again. In that year, churches were opened in Chengtu and Kiating, and the first convert was baptized, after a little less than five years work. By 1917 membership was 1,700; forty-three children were baptized members not as yet classed as communicants. There were nine native ordained preachers, twenty-eight probationers and evangelists, and eighteen Bible-women.

Steps were taken to make the Chinese church entirely indigenous and its Conference a separate, self-directing entity. The church was given a definite name (Mei Dao Hucci) as distinct from the mission. Also on recommendation of the Mission Council, the Mission Board made the whole grant for evangelistic or pastoral work directly to the Conference instead of through the medium of the Mission Council. The council also gave authority to Conference in all matters that had to do with regular pastoral work. Thus, the Conference had become virtually self-governing.

Emphasis was laid also on medical mission work. Two of the original four men sent out to China were doctors. Kilborn and Stevenson opened a dispensary in November 1892, but they had to close it after three months because the time was completely taken up and language study crowded out. During 1894 two hospital buildings were erected in Chengtu, and medical work began in 1895, but these structures were completely destroyed in the riots of that year. 1896-97 saw the second hospital built with a dispensary, waiting room and two wards for twenty-five patients. In 1907 a new modern hospital was begun under R. B. Ewan. By 1917 there were twenty-one doctors, fifteen men and six women, working in eleven hospitals in the ten central stations. A medical college was established in 1914, in connection with the university, to train native medical workers.

Dental hospitals were opened in Chengtu and Chungking, and in 1920 a faculty of dentistry was established in the university. In 1908 a pharmacist was sent to the field.

While small schools were opened soon after arrival in 1893, it was not until 1904 that special emphasis was laid on education, and J. L. Stewart was appointed solely to educational work. By 1907 the stated policy was to have an educational missionary in each central station. About 1903 an educational revolution swept the nation, creating a new demand for Western methods.

The new enthusiasm created by the national reform led the Canadian Mission and others to unite their efforts in the West China Christian Education Union, all the missions adopting similar grades, courses, and textbooks along with registration, certification, and inspection of schools. The aim was to develop "a complete and properly co-ordinated system of Christian education, parallel to the system of the Chinese Government, but with such deviations from it as from time to time seem necessary."

In March 1909, the Canadian School for Missionaries' Children was opened in temporary quarters with five pupils and one teacher, Lela A. Ker of the W.M.S. A new school building was begun in December 1916.

The greatest educational venture in West China was the establishment, in 1910, of the West China Union University at Chengtu. This institution was formed by the united effort of the Friends' Foreign Mission Association of Great Britain and Ireland, the American Baptist Foreign Mission Society, the Board of Foreign Missions of the Methodist Episcopal Church, U.S.A., and the General Board of Missions of the Methodist Church, Canada. In 1910 only classes in arts and science were attempted. A medical faculty was added in 1914; a faculty of religion in 1915; education, in 1918; and dentistry, in 1920. To these faculties must be added pharmacy courses, an agricultural department, and the Union Middle School, the Union Normal School, the Union Bible Training School, the Union Training School for Missionaries, and a lower and higher primary school. The University was controlled by a board of governors in the homelands, and in 1922 it was incorporated under the board of regents of the university of the State of New York. The campus of over 150 acres contained some twenty-two teaching buildings and dormitories and thirty-four teachers' residences. The first class, two in number, was graduated in 1915. Girls were first admitted to university classes in 1924.

An important means of reaching the people was through the mission press. After the Boxer Rebellion in 1900, J. Endicott took charge of the press. The earliest business was with the West China Religious Tract Society and the AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY. In 1904 the whole plant was moved into new press buildings at Chengtu. In 1918 over 21,000,000 pages of literature were printed in Chinese, English, Tibetan, and Miao.

Three times prior to 1925 the Canadian missionaries were forced to give up their work and flee to the coast. The first outbreak was in 1895, when riots broke out in Chengtu, lasting for about a day and a half, in which all the foreign missionaries were thankful to escape with their lives. The missionaries returned within a year and were compensated for their losses.

The second exodus was in 1900, when the consuls ordered everyone to the coast, as the result of the Boxer upheavals in the northern provinces. When the missionaries returned in 1901 they found their property intact.

The third general exodus was in 1911, owing to the revolutionary disturbances which led to the overthrow of the empire and the establishment of the Republic of China. In September, 1911, all Chengtu missionaries were asked by the British consul to gather in the compounds of the Canadian Mission inside the city. After three months in the crowded quarters almost all were sent to the coast. In two or three months the missionaries were able to return to their stations. Despite the fact that government and rebel troops and brigands were everywhere, no missionary in West China received bodily harm, and there were only insignificant losses of property.

The missionaries returned in 1912, to enter upon a decade of continuous political unrest. The central government had little control. Ambitious politicians and their warlord allies sprang up everywhere. In Szechwan these fought the national forces from the nearby provinces, and each other. Yet there was no animus against the foreigner. Hospitals, churches, and schools were places of refuge, fairly well respected by all parties. In the midst of this turbulence and violence the mission was able to progress. From the early 1920's onward, however, the missionaries faced a new menace, a rising tide of anti-foreign, anti-Christian feeling, aided and abetted by Communism which was beginning to acquire influence in China.

With the formation of The United Church of Canada in 1925 the mission passed to the new denomination.

WEST INDIES, THE, sometimes called The Antilles, is an archipelago of several hundred islands and cays separating the Caribbean Sea from the Atlantic Ocean. The largest island, CUBA, is only ninety miles south of Key West, Fla. The total population of all the islands approximates 19,650,000.

The larger islands are autonomous nations, members of the United Nations: Cuba (Spanish-speaking); Hispaniola, divided between HAITI (French-speaking) and the DOMINICAN REPUBLIC (Spanish-speaking); JAMAICA, TRINIDAD and TOBAGO, and BARBADOS (English-speaking). PUERTO RICO (Spanish-speaking) is a self-governing commonwealth associated with the United States of which its people are citizens. The many lesser islands are associated in different ways with Great Britain, France, the Netherlands and the United States. To the east of Puerto Rico, the chain divides into two groups, the Leewards and the Windwards.

Methodism came to the West Indies in 1760, when NATHANIEL GILBERT, lawyer and planter, returned to ANTIGUA from a sojourn of a few years in England where he was converted by JOHN WESLEY. In a short time he organized a Methodist Society of over 200, almost all Negroes. Nathaniel's brother, FRANCIS GILBERT, and his wife Mary continued the work after Nathaniel's death until ill health forced Francis back to England.

In 1778 JOHN BAXTER, a local preacher, went to Antigua as a shipwright for duty at "Nelson's Dockyard," English Harbour, where the British fleet was based. The mission grew steadily under his leadership. After the organization of the M.E. Church (U.S.A.) in 1784, Baxter was ordained by THOMAS COKE at BALTIMORE, Md., in June 1785, FRANCIS ASBURY certifying the action in the Minutes. Coke visited the West Indies in late 1786-87, going to many of the islands, organizing Baxter's work into a regular circuit. Coke made four more visits to the West Indies in the following decade, visiting the growing work in many of the islands.

From 1855 to 1904, British Wesleyan work in the West Indies, with the exception of the Bahamas and Honduras, was transferred to an autonomous West Indian Conference. After 1894, the Conference met in two sections, concerned respectively with the Eastern and Western parts of the area. For financial and other reasons, the two sectional conferences invited the Wesleyan METHODIST MISSIONARY SOCIETY in 1903 to resume responsibility for the area. In 1967, the METHODIST CHURCH IN THE CARIBBEAN AND THE AMERICAS was inaugurated.

The Methodist Church (U.S.A.) inherited the work of the M.E. Church and the M.E. Church, South in Cuba, Puerto Rico and the VIRGIN ISLANDS. Other Methodist Churches at work in the West Indies are the A.M.E. in BAHAMAS, Jamaica, Haiti, Dominican Republic, Trinidad, the Leewards; the A.M.E. ZION CHURCH in the Leewards; the WESLEYAN METHODIST CHURCH (U.S.A.) in Haiti and Puerto Rico; the FREE METHODIST in the Dominican Republic; the United Church of CANADA in Trinidad.

WEST LAFAYETTE, OHIO, U.S.A. Methodist Protestant Home for the Aged was opened in March, 1917, in the buildings formerly used for the West Lafayette College and though located within the boundaries of the Muskingum (later Ohio) Annual Conference, it was open to elderly members from throughout the entire Methodist Protestant Church. The Methodist Protestant-Recorder, on June 7, 1935, noted that some forty-three persons had been received in the home since its opening. Reverend J. Sala Leland, E. R. Biggs and Mrs. C. A. Isner were among those who served as president or superintendent of the Home. Following the Methodist Union of 1939, the Home has been privately operated.

West Lafayette College was in existence between 1900 and 1916 and was one of the official colleges of the M.P. Church. It was established by the Muskingum Annual Conference and the Honorable Vincent Ferguson donated land valued at $20,000 about one mile east of West Lafayette, Ohio, on Route 16. The charter for the college was secured on April 16, 1900, and S. A. Fisher, W. L. Wells, Joseph Porteus, H. C. Ferguson and J. W. Casingham were elected by the Conference to serve as the first Board of Trustees. A brick building was erected to accommodate the needs of the preparatory and commercial departments of the college and the institution opened in September 1900. By 1904, there was an average attendance of 100-125 students. West Lafayette College closed in the fall of 1916 and was united with ADRIAN COLLEGE. The college buildings were then used as a Home for the Aged for the M.P. Church. Since Methodist Union in 1939, the Home has been privately owned.

WEST NEBRASKA CONFERENCE (ME) was organized at Kearney, Neb., Sept. 10, 1885 with Bishop EDWARD C. ANDREWS presiding. The conference superseded the West Nebraska Mission which was formed in 1880 by dividing the Nebraska Conference. At the beginning the West Nebraska Conference included the western two-thirds of the state. It had three districts, Platte Valley, Niobrara Valley, and Republican Valley; sixty-six charges, and 3,366 members.

The Northwest Nebraska Conference was carved from the West Nebraska Conference in 1892. Then in 1913 West Nebraska was absorbed by the NEBRASKA CONFERENCE. At its final session in 1912 the West Nebraska Conference reported three districts, Holdredge, Kearney, and North Platte; 105 pastoral charges, and 13,975 members.

WEST OHIO CONFERENCE (ME) was organized at Urbana, Ohio, Sept. 9, 1913 with Bishop WILLIAM F. ANDERSON presiding. The conference was formed by merging the CENTRAL OHIO and CINCINNATI CONFERENCES pursuant to a specific enabling act passed by the 1912 GENERAL CONFERENCE. The territory of the West Ohio Conference was western Ohio. The conference began with ten districts, 351 charges, 464 preachers, 124,711 members, and 753 churches and 286 parsonages valued at $6,920,090.

The West Ohio Conference supported OHIO WESLEYAN and OHIO NORTHERN UNIVERSITIES and the Cincinnati Missionary Training School. Hillsboro College closed soon after the conference was formed. The conference was related to the Christ Hospital in CINCINNATI and the Flower Deaconess Hospital in Toledo, and it shared with the other Ohio conferences in the support of LAKESIDE, and the Methodist Children's Home near Columbus.

The West Ohio Conference continued in existence for fifteen years and experienced moderate growth during that time. In 1927 it had eight districts, 358 charges, 505 preachers, 136,849 members, and 664 churches and 323 parsonages valued at $14,123,683.

In 1927 the West Ohio Conference joined the OHIO CONFERENCE in asking the General Conference to merge the two bodies into one conference to be called the Ohio Conference. The General Conference so ordered, and in September, 1928 the Ohio Conference became the largest in the denomination; it then had 229,650 members.

WEST PALM BEACH, FLORIDA, U.S.A. First Church is the mother church of the Palm Beaches. Organized in 1892, the church recently celebrated seventy-five years of service to the greater Palm Beach area.

The first building was erected in 1898. Built largely with volunteer help, everyone in town, including the saloon keeper, made some contribution. In 1914 an impressive brick church was erected at a cost of $60,000. Within ten years it was apparent that the brick church could no longer meet the needs of a growing membership. In 1925 the present structure was erected with balcony on three sides, seating approximately 1,500. Almost before completion, the financial crash left the church with a colossal debt. In 1937-38, the congregation lost the building to the company holding the mortgage, and worshipped briefly in the high school auditorium, just a block away. A refinancing plan finally made it possible for the congregation to regain possession and eventually retire the debt.

A Program of Progress was inaugurated in 1966 to completely remodel the educational building and sanctuary, which resulted in what is said to be one of the most beautiful and serviceable plants in the southeast. In 1968 and 1969, ten new faceted glass windows were installed, depicting events in the life of Christ. In 1970 First Church reported 1,907 members.

WEST TEXAS CONFERENCE began as the West Texas Conference of the M.E. Church. It was formed by dividing the TEXAS CONFERENCE. The conference was organized at Austin, Jan. 22, 1874 with Bishop THOMAS BOWMAN presiding. Composed of both white and Negro ministers and churches at the beginning, the conference reported in 1875, three districts, fifty-four charges, and 5,338 members.

In 1877 the white ministers and churches of the West Texas Conference were constituted as the Austin Conference. Organized at Dallas, Nov. 15, 1877, the Austin Conference had only eight charges and 400 members, but it immediately organized two districts—Dallas and Denison—with a total of nineteen charges. In 1910 there were thirty-three charges and 3,637 members. The next year the Austin Conference was dissolved and its ministers and churches were absorbed by the OKLAHOMA and GULF CONFERENCES and the Southern Swedish Mission Conference.

The West Texas Conference established Samuel Huston College in Austin in 1900. In 1952 it merged with Tilton College which was started in the same city by the Congregational Church in 1876. Now HUSTON-TILTON COLLEGE, it is related to both The United Methodist Church and the United Church of Christ. The college plant is valued at more than $3,000,000 and the enrollment is nearly 1,000.

After the formation of the Austin Conference the West Texas Conference continued as a Negro body. In 1900 it had five districts and 11,057 members. It came to unification in 1939 with six districts, 102 charges, 15,767 members, and property valued at $595,654. Continuing as a conference of the CENTRAL JURISDICTION in The Methodist Church, the West Texas Conference reported in 1968 four districts—Austin, Dallas, San Antonio, and Waco—ninety-four charges, 20,101 members, and property valued at $5,326,578. Following the abolition of the Central Jurisdiction in 1968 the West Texas Conference was united with the former Anglo conferences in TEXAS, primarily the SOUTHWEST TEXAS and the NORTH TEXAS.

WEST THOMPSON, CONNECTICUT, U.S.A. This Methodist church in the rural northeastern part of CONNECTICUT is the outgrowth of services conducted in the neighboring town of Pomfret in 1792 by John Allen. The movement was nurtured by Noah Perrin, who was lay leader for the first sixty years. Services were held at the home of Jonathan Nichols, and for many years a bronze plaque on the house stated this. This plaque is now in the Methodist church in neighboring North Grosvenordale. The sixth NEW ENGLAND CONFERENCE met here in 1796 with Bishop ASBURY presiding, and thirty preachers were in attendance, some coming from MAINE. The first Methodist church building was erected in Thompson in 1797, and Bishops ASBURY and WHATCOAT preached here on the same day in 1800. A second church, built in 1841, was used for worship until 1963. This simple colonial structure was dismantled in 1963, and moved piece by piece to the Belmont Hill School in Belmont, Mass., where it has been restored for chapel purposes. This church was the mother of thirteen neighboring churches including Putnam, Danielson, Eastford, East Woodstock, North Grosvenordale, East Thompson, Webster, and Attawaugan. West Thompson was included in the flood control area of the U.S. government project completed in 1965, and the few remaining members merged with the Methodists of North Grosvenordale.

WEST VIRGINIA, U.S.A., is an eastern mountain state bounded on the north by PENNSYLVANIA and a fraction of MARYLAND, on the east and south by VIRGINIA, on the southwest by KENTUCKY, and on the northwest by OHIO. Its area is 24,181 square miles and its population is 1,793,000 (1967 estimate). West Virginia was a part of Virginia until Virginia seceded in 1861. West Virginia was admitted to the Union in 1863. The state produces thirty per cent of the nation's bituminous coal, and coal accounts for eighty per cent of its total annual income. West Virginia leads the eastern states in the production of natural gas, and it manufactures steel and iron, glass and pottery. The hilly terrain is not conducive to large scale agriculture. About sixty-five per cent of the state is in forests. The state has twenty-one institutions of higher learning.

The exact date of the beginning of Methodism in West Virginia is not known, although it was certainly not long after the movement began in America. ROBERT STRAWBRIDGE spread the seeds of Methodism over four states, and he may have been the first Methodist preacher to visit what is now West Virginia. Strawbridge raised up a number of young preachers, one of whom, RICHARD OWINGS, along with JOHN HAGERTY, is credited with having done "the first Methodist preaching" in the Shenandoah Valley. It is probable, but not certain, that these two were the first Methodists to preach in the eastern panhandle of West Virginia. Bishop ASBURY implies that there was preaching in Shepherdstown, W. Va., about 1772 when he refers in his journal for Aug. 17, 1802 to "thirty years' occasional preaching" there. Philip V. Fithian visited Berkeley Springs, W. Va. in August, 1775 and reported that "a Methodist preacher was haranguing the people." The next year Asbury was at Berkeley Springs for his health, and he did some preaching while there.

Prior to 1775 Methodist work in West Virginia was sporadic, but in 1775-76 Asbury reported in a letter to John Wesley that there was a "blessed outpouring of the Spirit in several counties bordering upon Maryland." The revival was largely the work of WILLIAM WATTERS, the first native Methodist preacher in America. In his autobiography Watters says that in Berkeley County "the work increased on every hand." FREEBORN GARRETTSON assisted in that first in-gathering. In the latter part of 1776 while on the Fairfax Circuit, "he extended his travels far up the Potomac to what was called New Virginia, where his labors were greatly successful."

As a result of the work of Watters, Garrettson, and others, the Berkeley Circuit, the first in West Virginia, was formed in May, 1778, and Edward Bailey was appointed to it.

Until about 1784 the penetration of Methodism into what was to become West Virginia was in the eastern panhandle to the base of the Allegheny Mountains. Then Methodism began to "spill over the mountains" to westward flowing waters, going into the Redstone and Greenbrier regions.

Methodism entered the north and north central portions of West Virginia by way of Pennsylvania from the old REDSTONE CIRCUIT which was formed in 1784. In 1787 the Ohio and Clarksburg Circuits were carved from the Redstone Circuit. The Ohio Circuit included the northern panhandle of West Virginia. Clarksburg was the first circuit wholly within present-day West Virginia.

The Greenbrier region, consisting of present-day Monroe, Greenbrier, and Pocahontas Counties in southeast West Virginia, was inhabited at the close of the Revolutionary War by several families who had been Methodists prior to settling there. A Methodist society was organized near Union. West Virginia late in the summer of 1784; at first it met in homes and later in a school house. REHOBOTH CHURCH, now one of the historic SHRINES of American Methodism, was completed in June, 1786. The manuscript journal of JOHN SMITH for 1787-88 tells of his trials in forming a circuit in this pioneer region.

In 1790 attempts were made to establish the Randolph and Kanawha Circuits in western West Virginia, but the region was too sparsely settled for continuous Methodist work at the time. The next appearance of Methodism in a new area was the formation of the Little Kanawha Circuit in 1799 after two local preachers, WILLIAM BEAUCHAMP and Reece Wolf, wrote letters asking for a circuit preacher. By 1803 there were seven circuits within the bounds of present West Virginia—Berkeley, Allegheny, Pendleton, Greenbrier, Ohio, Clarksburg, and Little Kanawha. The Allegheny Circuit was formed in 1783 by dividing the Berkeley Circuit, and the Pendleton Circuit was carved in 1794 from the Allegheny.

In 1803 Methodism penetrated a new region and it resulted in the formation of the Guyandotte Circuit the next year in southwest West Virginia. The first preacher assigned to the circuit was ASA SHINN, later one of the founders of the METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCH.

During the first quarter of the nineteenth century the original circuits described above extended their bounds and subdivided to form more circuits. The new circuits, down to 1826, were: Monroe, 1805; Randolph, restored in 1806; Monongalia, 1806; New River, 1808; East Wheeling, 1810; Big Sandy, 1810; Hampshire, 1813; Harrison, 1816; South Branch, restored in 1819; Preston County, 1819-1822; Short Creek, 1819; Big Kanawha, restored in 1820; Jefferson, 1820; Middle Island, 1820; Lewis, 1821; Nicholas, 1823; Wheeling (town), 1825; Logan, 1825; and Charleston, 1825.

The M.P. Church began early in West Virginia and was relatively strong in the state. The first M.P. congregation in the state was organized in 1829 in a building that was erected in 1819 and is known as Old Harmony Church. The West Virginia work of the denomination was first attached to the Pittsburgh Conference (MP). The West Virginia Conference was created in 1854 by dividing the Pittsburgh Conference. At unification in 1939 the West Virginia Conference brought about 260 churches and some 20,000 members into the West Virginia Conference of The Methodist Church. (See West Virginia Conference (MP).)

Since West Virginia was border territory, following the division of the M.E. Church in 1844, it became a no-man's land with both the Northern and Southern branches of the church striving to occupy it. Perhaps the most controversial area was the Kanawha District to which in 1846 the OHIO CONFERENCE (ME) and the KENTUCKY CONFERENCE (MES) both made a complete list of appointments. The M.E. Church organized its WEST VIRGINIA CONFERENCE in 1848, and the M.E. Church, South formed its WESTERN VIRGINIA CONFERENCE in 1850. The preachers and laymen in the M.E. and M.P. conferences played a large part in the formation of the state of West Virginia during the Civil War. The work of the Southern Church in the state suffered during the war, but it recovered when the conflict was over and carried on until unification in 1939. In addition to the Western Virginia Conference, the Southern Church's HOLSTON CONFERENCE had work in the extreme southern edge of West Virginia, and its BALTIMORE CONFERENCE had work in the eastern panhandle of the state. The West Virginia part of the Western Virginia Conference (MES) brought nearly 45,000 members to unification in 1939, not to mention modest numbers which came from the Baltimore and Holston Conferences. The West Virginia (ME) had 89,782 members in 1939.

Before unification in 1939, no fewer than 17 annual conferences included a part, if not all, of West Virginia within their bounds. They were as follows: (1) M.E. Church conferences before the division of 1844: Baltimore, Western, Ohio, Pittsburgh, and Kentucky; (2) M.P. Church conferences: Ohio, Pittsburgh, and West Virginia; (3) M.E. Church conferences after 1844: Western Virginia (1848-1864), West Virginia, Baltimore, and Virginia; and (4) M.E. Church, South conferences: Kentucky, Western Virginia, Virginia, Baltimore, and Holston.

With such a background of varied and divided church loyalty, it was said, as Methodist unification approached, that if unification would work anywhere it would work in West Virginia. It has worked well. Though the state showed a six per cent decrease in population between 1940 and 1967, the West Virginia Conference had an increase of twenty-six per cent in membership between 1940 and 1968. About twelve per cent of the population of West Virginia were members of The Methodist Church in 1968, a higher percentage than Methodism could boast in any other state in that year. Other evidence of the success of unification is the marked growth of WEST VIRGINIA WESLEYAN COLLEGE (Buckhannon, W. Va.), the new hospital at Clarksburg, two child care centers, the home for the aging, an educational center, WESLEY FOUNDATIONS at the state institutions of higher learning, the designation of West Virginia as an episcopal area in 1960, and the reception of former CENTRAL JURISDICTION ministers and churches in the state into the West Virginia Conference in 1964.

In 1968 The Methodist Church had in West Virginia $57 charges, 200,054 members, and property valued at $87,168,520.

WEST VIRGINIA CONFERENCE (ME) was created by the 1848 GENERAL CONFERENCE. (It was called the Western Virginia Conference until after West Virginia was admitted to the Union in 1863.) The conference, formed by dividing the PITTSBURGH CONFERENCE, was organized at Wheeling, July 5, 1848 with Bishop LEONIDAS L. HAMLINE presiding. It began with three districts, thirty-seven charges, fifty-one preachers, and 13,899 members. This conference had more than twice as many members as the WESTERN VIRGINIA CONFERENCE (MES) which was organized two years later, and the relative strength of the two bodies continued somewhat the same until unification ninety-one years later.

For many years the West Virginia Conference was officially related to Mt. UNION COLLEGE and OHIO WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY in OHIO, and ALLEGHENY COLLEGE in PENNSYLVANIA. In 1890 the conference started the co-educational school at Buckhannon which became WEST VIRGINIA WESLEYAN COLLEGE. The Pittsburgh Christian Advocate was the official paper for the conference.

By 1875 the membership of the West Virginia Conference had nearly doubled, and by 1900 it had doubled again. It came to unification in 1939 with five districts, 248 charges, 89,782 members, and property valued at $6,973,105.

WEST VIRGINIA CONFERENCE (MP) was formed by dividing the PITTSBURGH CONFERENCE, and it was organized at the session of that conference in Allegheny, Pa., Sept. 20, 1854. It was called the Western Virginia Conference until 1869. Peter T. Laisley was the first president. The conference began with twenty-four charges, fifty churches, twenty-four preachers, and 3,036 members. In the first twelve years the church membership increased thirty per cent.

The West Virginia Conference was torn by dissension when the northern and western conferences of the M.P. Church organized themselves as the "Methodist Church" in 1866. About one-fifth of the ministers and churches of the West Virginia Conference withdrew and were received into the Pittsburgh Conference which allied itself with the "Methodist Church". At the same time two circuits of the Muskingum Conference in OHIO withdrew and were received in the West Virginia Conference because they wished to remain in the Methodist Protestant Church. Following the reunion of the M.P. Church and the "Methodist Church" in 1877, conference boundaries were readjusted, and in 1878 the West Virginia Conference reported thirty-three charges and 8,571 members.

J. A. Selby, president of the West Virginia Conference in 1917, reported that in the 1880's "we began to see how great was our loss every year because so few of our towns and cities were occupied, [and] we began to make arrangements to remedy this defect." He then named ten

West Virginia cities and towns in which M.P. churches had been built, noted that more than one-third of the charges in the conference had been organized in the preceding thirty years, and pointed out that the total church membership of the conference had increased by one-third in that time.

As it came to unification in 1939, the West Virginia Conference (MP) reported seventy-three churches, seventy-six ministers, 19,454 members, and churches and parsonages valued at $1,304,050.

WEST VIRGINIA CONFERENCE (EUB) was originally part of the VIRGINIA CONFERENCE. In 1836 Jacob Rinehart, presiding elder of the Virginia Conference, and Moses Michael were sent by the conference across the Allegheny Mountains to the western part of VIRGINIA. On Aug. 20, 1836, in a little log church owned by the Lutherans about two miles from the Ohio River in Mason County, they organized the first UNITED BRETHREN class in this territory. This class is now known as the Union appointment. The first church building erected was the Sand Hill Church near Point Pleasant, Mason County, dedicated in 1847.

In 1840 a colony of Germans, members of OTTERBEIN'S CHURCH in BALTIMORE, Md., came to Braxton County, near the center of what is now WEST VIRGINIA, with Daniel Engle, a licensed preacher; and in 1841 they established a class on Steer Creek, Braxton County, later known as the Otterbein appointment. In 1846 Benjamin Stickley, the mountain evangelist, was sent by the Virginia Conference to Lewis Mission, a circuit covering 300 miles in Lewis, Braxton, Barbour, Gilmer, and Upshur Counties.

In the years following 1836 many new churches were established. Because of the problems of travel over the mountains, the Virginia Conference found it difficult to serve this section. The GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1857 agreed to incorporate the part of Virginia west of the mountains into a new Mission Conference to be called the Parkersburg Conference. The first session of this new conference was held at Centerville, in Tyler County, March 4, 1858, with Bishop J. J. GLOSSBRENNER presiding. There were eleven charter members. In 1863 the State of West Virginia was formed from the western part of the State of Virginia, thus placing all of the churches of the new conference in the State of West Virginia. Later Garrett County, Md., was added to this conference. In 1897 the name of the conference was changed to the West Virginia Conference.

Among the early pioneers of the Virginia Conference who crossed the mountains and helped to establish the work in this section were Jacob Bachtel, Zebedee Warner, J. W. Perry, J. W. Miles, H. R. Davis, Levi Hess, J. T. Hensley, Eli Martin, Samuel Martin, and G. W. Statton.

Bishop W. M. WEEKLEY was born within five miles of the spot where the West Virginia Conference was organized and served as an itinerant presiding elder in the conference for twenty years.

In 1967 there were ninety-six charges and 245 churches in the conference, with ninety-eight ordained ministers, twenty-two probationers, twenty-one lay preachers and sixteen ministerial students. The membership was 24,472; the total value of local church property, $7,045,959.

In 1965 the West Virginia Conference cooperated with the denomination in a program of assistance to Appalachia. The Heart and Hand House in Philippi and a branch in South Charleston were under the direction of the denominational Board of Missions.

The West Virginia Conference included all of the state of West Virginia except eight counties of the eastern panhandle. It also included Garrett County, Maryland.

In 1969, the conference united with the West Virginia Conference of the former Methodist Church, retaining the name common to both.

WEST VIRGINIA CONFERENCE (MC) was organized at Fairmont on Sept. 8, 1939 with Bishop ADNA W. LEONARD presiding. The conference was formed by merging at unification the WEST VIRGINIA CONFERENCE (ME) with 90,000 members, a part of the WESTERN VIRGINIA CONFERENCE (MES) representing about 44,000 members, the WEST VIRGINIA CONFERENCE (MP) with 20,000 members, and small West Virginia segments of several other conferences. The territory of the West Virginia Conference at the beginning was the state of West Virginia, except three counties in the eastern panhandle and two in the northern panhandle which were assigned to the BALTIMORE and PITTSBURGH CONFERENCES, respectively. At the same time the West Virginia Conference included a part of Garrett County, Maryland. In 1940 the conference reported thirteen districts, 472 charges, 154,178 members, and property valued at $13,164,939.

No other conference (save the Baltimore) began unification with such a large admixture of members from the three uniting churches as did the West Virginia Conference. Unification proved helpful to Methodism in West Virginia. Between 1940 and 1968 there was a substantial increase in the membership of The Methodist Church notwithstanding a slight decrease in the population of the state during the same period. (See WEST VIRGINIA.)

At its 1940 session the West Virginia Conference noted that it was the largest in the Northeastern Jurisdiction and that it had no home or hospital though there was need for both in its territory. By 1950 the conference had established at Burlington, W. Va., the Children's Home. By 1955 the Union Protestant Hospital at Clarksburg was under way. The Beckley Child Care Center was established in 1962, and the next year the Glenwood Park Home for the Aged in Mercer County had begun.

The West Virginia Conference received MORRIS HARVEY COLLEGE at Barboursville (founded 1888) from the former Western Virginia Conference (MES) and WEST VIRGINIA WESLEYAN COLLEGE at Buckhannon (founded 1890) from the West Virginia Conference (ME). West Virginia Wesleyan now has an endowment of about $1,500,000, a plant valued at nearly $7,000,000, and some 1,700 students. Morris Harvey College moved to Charleston in 1935 and became an independent institution in 1942. The conference maintains three WESLEY FOUNDATIONS at state institutions of higher learning, and has campus ministries at seven other schools. The conference owns one camp called Spring Hill Education Center.

In 1968 the West Virginia Conference reported eleven districts, 572 charges, 482 ministers, 194,452 members, property valued at $84,703,930, and a total of $10,048,780 raised for all purposes during the year.

WESLEY STATUE AT WEST VIRGINIA WESLEYAN

WEST VIRGINIA WESLEYAN COLLEGE, Buckhannon, West Virginia, was established as West Virginia Conference Seminary in 1890 by the M.E. Church. In 1904 the school attained college status, and the name was changed to West Virginia Wesleyan. When unification of the three branches of Methodism was completed, the West Virginia Conference had two colleges—MORRIS HARVEY and West Virginia Wesleyan. The UNIVERSITY SENATE recommended that the conference concentrate its interest upon West Virginia Wesleyan. Morris Harvey became an independent private college at Charleston, and West Virginia Wesleyan the sole college in the state owned by The Methodist Church.

At that time, as the nation was emerging from the depression years of the 1930's, both schools were struggling to survive. In 1939, West Virginia Wesleyan's total resources were listed at $674,509 and its indebtedness $209,674. Morris Harvey's resources were $303,220 and its indebtedness $33,065. Unification opened the way for West Virginia Wesleyan to increase its ability to draw students from the North Central JURISDICTION, and since then the enrollment has tripled. It was one of the first schools in the South to admit Negroes. In 1955 it enrolled more preministerial students than any other Methodist college in America. It offers the B.A., B.S., and B.M.E (Music Education). The governing board has forty members plus three ex officio, elected by the WEST VIRGINIA CONFERENCE; half of the board are laymen and half are ministers.

WEST WISCONSIN CONFERENCE (ME) was organized at Madison, Wis., Aug. 20, 1856 with Bishop MATTHEW SIMPSON presiding. The conference was formed by dividing the Wisconsin Conference. (See WISCONSIN for beginnings of Methodism in the state.) Its territory was southwest Wisconsin; the northwestern part of the state was placed in the MINNESOTA CONFERENCE which was also created in 1856. Four years later the Northwest Wisconsin Conference was formed, but after eight years it was absorbed by the West Wisconsin Conference which then included the west half of the state. After 1868 there was little or no change in the boundaries of the West Wisconsin Conference.

The West Wisconsin Conference began in 1856 with five districts—Portage City, Madison, Platteville, Prairie du Chien, and La Crosse—sixty charges, and 5,962 members. After absorbing the Northwest Wisconsin Conference in 1868, it had 10,514 members. By 1900 the membership had grown to 20,763 and by 1939 to 38,633.

Realizing that they and the people needed learning, the pioneer circuit riders helped to provide and back up such attempts as Foster Institute, later known as Brunson, Mineral Point Seminary, Mount Hope, Tomah, and Kilbourn Institutes, Galesville Institute, later called University, and LAWRENCE UNIVERSITY. Youth camps were conducted from the early days. Summer camps were held on the Platteville Campgrounds, and there were camps at Wonewoc, Lake Chetek, and Lacrosse. In later years better sites were purchased at Pine Lake (1948), and Whispering Pines (1953).

In 1917 the Morrow Memorial Home for the Aged was dedicated at Sparta. The conference now has also the Schmitt Methodist Home at Richland Center. The Methodist Hospital was established at Madison in 1919, and later the Lakeside Methodist Hospital at Rice Lake. These four institutions continue to serve. Hospitals started at Richland Center and La Crosse have been given up.

The name of the WOMAN'S FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY appeared in the 1870 conference journal, and the WOMAN'S HOME MISSIONARY SOCIETY was organized in 1884. In 1968 the WOMEN'S SOCIETY OF CHRISTIAN SERVICE reported 11,120 members and $163,262 paid for local work.

In 1968 the West Wisconsin Conference reported 128 charges, 143 ministers, 53,172 members, property valued at $20,866,575, and a total of $3,008,422 raised for all purposes during the year.

WESTELL, THOMAS (c. 1719-1794), British Methodist, a carpenter of BRISTOL, was one of the first four whom WESLEY joined in society there in April, 1739. Westell became the third of Wesley's assistants, traveling spasmodically as a "half-itinerant" in Cornwall (1769) and Sussex (1776), but usually living in Bristol. A memorial to him is found in Portland Chapel, where he was buried on April 24, 1794.

WESTERN AUSTRALIA CONFERENCE began officially in 1840 as a missionary outpost under the control of the WESLEYAN MISSIONARY SOCIETY in England. It remained under the sole leadership of JOHN SMITHIES for twelve years when a second missionary was appointed. In 1855 the first Conference of the Australasian Wesleyan Methodist Church was held in SYDNEY and it took over the direction of the Church in Western AUSTRALIA. In 1866 the first meeting of ministers and laymen was held in Western Australia to discuss administrative problems and this became an annual meeting until 1873, when four Annual Conferences were established in Australia, NEW SOUTH WALES, VICTORIA, SOUTH AUSTRALIA and NEW ZEALAND. Western Australia then became a District under the control of the South Australia Conference and the Superintendent Minister of Wesley Church, PERTH, became the Chairman of that District.

The Wesleyans were the only Methodists to really establish themselves in the Colony and union presented no real problems. When it was consummated in 1897, some years earlier than in most of the other Australian States, there was only one PRIMITIVE METHODIST minister in the Colony and one BIBLE CHRISTIAN minister.

The growth of the Colony was painfully slow until the discovery of gold in the 1890's and the growth of the Wesleyan Methodist Church reflected that pattern. However, by 1900 it was ready to manage its own affairs. In that year the Western Australia Conference was established with three Districts. In 1965 there were six Districts with seventy-five ministers and probationers, four deaconesses and thirteen home missionaries. There were, in addition, four ministers working in the northern parts of the State under the Methodist Federal Inland Mission Board and a mission to the aborigines at Mogumber under the control of the Overseas Mission Board. The conference has Departments of Home Missions, and of Christian Education, both with full-time Directors, and a Department of Christian Citizenship and a State Secretary for Overseas Missions. The Conference now trains its own ministers at the Barclay Theological Hall which is part of KINGSWOOD COLLEGE, the Methodist residential College in the University of Western Australia. The 1965 membership returns revealed that there were 145 churches, 7,665 under instruction and 6,375 adherents in the State.

Aborigines in Western Australia. The Aborigines of Western Australia were from the beginning of the Colony the deep concern of the Wesleyan Missionary Society and when it sent out John Smithies to commence work in the Colony in 1840 he was expressly charged with responsibility for their evangelization and welfare. Immediately after his arrival he met the Government Superintendent of Aborigines and Interpreter, a Wesleyan layman named Francis Armstrong, and sought his assistance in establishing a native school in Perth. Later this was transferred to Wanneroo a few miles to the northwest of Perth where a mission station was established on land granted by the Government. This came to be considered the most successful mission in the Colony. In 1853 it was moved to more arable land at York in the Avon Valley. The move proved to be disastrous and within three years the mission was closed.

It was not until 1951 that the Methodist Church of Western Australia took up this work again. In that year it assumed responsibility, through the Overseas Mission Board, for a native settlement at Mogumber, on the Moore River, which had been conducted by the Department of Native Affairs.

After its failure to establish an Aboriginal settlement at Moore River, the Western Australian government approached the Methodist Church with the offer of the whole settlement, consisting of over 12,000 acres worth £100,000 with a yearly subsidy to assist its educational and agricultural work. There were only four old men and four small children left at the settlement, although it was estimated that there were 30,000 full-blood and part-Aborigines in the state. In the next five years the Board of Missions spent nearly $200,000 on developing the mission. The number of natives on the mission has steadily grown, the standard of education improved, the farm developed and a new sense of security and hope has come to the Aborigines.

In 1966 Mogumber became a training center. The emphasis is now placed on preparing the Aborigines to take their place as citizens in society. The chief architect of this progress, E. A. Clark, was subsequently decorated by the Queen for his outstanding work. Situated ninety miles from Perth, the area was slowly transformed and brought under cultivation. Children's homes have been built and staffed by missionary cottage mothers, caring for up to ten children, neglected, deserted or orphaned in Perth or surrounding areas. Up to 100 children altogether call Mogumber home, from babies to teenagers; they receive medical attention, schooling, domestic training and the opportunity to grow in a Christian home. An agriculture school trains boys to a standard where they are acceptable for employment on neighboring farms and high school opportunities are available for bright students. The agricultural school is now controlled by the Education Department while the mission is particularly responsible for the family, social and spiritual welfare of the children.

Methodism and the Goldfields. Gold was discovered in the north of Western Australia in 1886 and later in the east. In each case there was a tremendous desert barrier to be breached but despite that towns and cities grew up rapidly on the mines far beyond the reach of either road or railroad. One of the mining engineers living in an iron hut 100 miles north of Kalgoorlie was a young man named Herbert Hoover, later destined to live at the White House, Washington. The church was ill equipped to meet this situation. It was lamentably short of trained ministers and the church coffers were empty. It rose to the occasion, however, and soon its ministers and agents had penetrated to the furthest fields travelling on horseback, camel, bicycles and even on foot. Methodism flourished on the mining fields. The adventurous and freedom loving miners were attracted by the evangelical zeal of the Methodist preachers and the freedom of worship which they encouraged. In ten years the population of the State trebled and the membership of the Methodist Church grew fourfold. The number of Methodist ministers in the Colony grew from eight to thirty and there were seventeen home missionaries in the fields as well. Forty-seven percent of the increased membership came from the goldfields and nearly half of the total ministerial force was stationed there.

The New Wheat-Belt Area presented the Church with a new problem and a new opportunity. As alluvial gold mining petered out and was replaced by deep mining hundreds of miners were forced to leave the goldfields. Almost overnight Methodism was faced with the challenge of a new frontier. Ministers released from the goldfields were transferred to the new wheat growing areas adjacent to the Eastern Goldfields Railway. In 1903 the Conference established the Great Southern Mission to cope with a similar problem which was developing in the South. New settlers were taking up land along the Great Southern Railway which linked Perth and Albany and which had been opened in 1889, and ministers and missionaries moved in with them. They had often to travel great distances and were called upon to conduct services in coffee palaces and pubs, private homes, schools or hay sheds. Towns sprang up quickly along the line and churches were built. This was a period of great progress for the church, perhaps its period of greatest growth. In twenty years the number of Methodist churches in the State nearly doubled and the church deployed over one-third of its work force over the wheat-belt area to cope with the demands of the expanding frontier.

As stated above, organizational work began in 1903, when T. Allen was secretary for Home Missions. He organized the appointments to Narrogin (Harley J. Morrell) and Katanning (T. Pollard James). In 1911 the Conference set A. J. BARCLAY apart to work as General Superintendent of Home Missions. He recruited men from Eastern Australia and England, demonstrating a capacity to read the prospects and possible population movements. In his term of office, many areas were under the pastoral care of the Methodist Church so effectively as to be the main circuits of the present Conference.

Industrial Development. The next phase of Western Australian development came after the 1939-45 war. When big complexes were established at Kwinana and elsewhere around Perth, the population increased from 490,000 to 825,000 in the years 1945-1965.

The Methodist denomination was charged with the responsibility of matching the resources of the Church with this growth. It was a question of finding men and buildings in areas that had been only bush.

This was successfully done in many areas, while in other such Timber Mill towns there was little success.

More recently L. L. Semple has led a move to minister to the rapidly growing industrial complexes in the North-West. This has happened because of the iron ore mining explosion which makes Western Australia the key state in Australia's future industrial progress. Statistics for the Western Australian Conference as of May 1969, are as follows: 63 active ministers, 145 churches, and 7,898 members.

WESTERN CHRISTIAN RECORDER. A publication of the African Methodist Episcopal Church. (See AFRICAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, Publications.)

WESTERN CONFERENCE, the original conference in what was then called the west, was created by the GENERAL CONFERENCE at BALTIMORE in October 1796. At the beginning the territory of the Western Conference was somewhat indefinitely referred to as KENTUCKY and TENNESSEE. In 1804, however, it included "OHIO and the part of VIRGINIA which lies west of the great River Kanawha, with the ILLINOIS, and the NATCHEZ (circuits)." This vast region today has about twenty annual conferences, and in the past when conferences were smaller, it included even more.

Bishop ASBURY conducted conferences of preachers in Kentucky and Tennessee before the territory was formally designated as the Western Conference. He held a conference at Masterson's Station near LEXINGTON, Ky., April 15-16, 1790, stationing twelve preachers on six circuits, with FRANCIS POYTHRESS as PRESIDING ELDER. Five of the circuits were in Kentucky, and one, the Cumberland, was in Tennessee. Apparently there was no conference in the region in 1791, but in 1792 and again in 1793 Asbury met with the preachers at Masterson's. A conference was conducted at Lewis' Chapel near BETHEL ACADEMY in 1794, but Asbury missed it because of illness. In 1795 he met the preachers at Ebenezer in Greene County, Tenn., and in the spring of 1796 once again at Masterson's in Kentucky.

The 1796 General Conference divided the M.E. Church into six annual conferences with geographical boundaries. One of the six was the Western Conference which included "the states of Kentucky and Tennessee." In view of the General Conference action of 1796, one would expect the 1797 meeting of the Kentucky and Tennessee preachers to be called the Western Conference. But as a matter of fact the conference in that region was not referred to in the General Minutes as the Western Conference until 1802. Presumably Bishop Asbury was responsible for the failure to call the Western Conference by its proper name for six years.

Asbury did not attend the first session of the Western Conference which was held at Bethel Academy beginning May 1, 1797, but he sent a plan for stationing the preachers. That year the conference reported six charges in Kentucky and two in Tennessee with a total of 2,274 white and ninety colored members.

The Western Conference showed no appreciable growth from 1796 to 1800, a matter of real concern to Asbury. In 1797 he replaced Francis Poythress with JOHN KORLER as presiding elder. Then in 1800 he moved most of the preachers to other conferences and brought in WILLIAM MCKENDREE from VIRGINIA as presiding elder. Placing McKendree in charge of the Western Conference was one of the best and most strategic appointments Asbury ever made. McKendree had a remarkable capacity to lead in the work and to infuse the preachers with his own consecrated and aggressive spirit. He formed new circuits and found or developed preachers to man them. He soon extended the work of the Western Conference into Illinois, OHIO, MISSOURI, and other areas. In 1803 the conference reported three districts, fifteen charges, and 3,955 white and 186 colored members. Five years later, when the General Conference overwhelmingly elected McKendree a bishop, the Western Conference had five districts, thirty-six charges and some 16,000 members. In 1812 the Western Conference under that name disappeared, its territory being divided to form the OHIO and TENNESSEE CONFERENCES. In its last year the Western Conference reported eight districts, sixty-nine charges, and 30,782 members.

WESTERN CONFERENCE (MES) was organized by the GENERAL CONFERENCE of the Southern Church in 1870, and held its first session at Leavenworth, Kan., on September 8 of that year. Bishop McTYRE presided. It was organized out of those Methodists who adhered to the M.E. Church, South, or were in sympathy with the South, and who wished to be connected with that Church following the Civil War which had ended six years before. There were twenty-five traveling and eleven local preachers, 1,538 white, 133 colored, and thirty-seven Indian members reporting at the organizational meeting. The next General Conference—1874—defined the Western Conference so as to "include the states of KANSAS, NEBRASKA, and the territories of WYOMING and IDAHO and other territories east of the Rocky Mountains and West of the Missouri state line not included in other Conferences." With the growth of the Church, South, and of the M.E. Church, Annual Conferences in these states and territories were in due time organized. In 1890 the Western Conference was made to include "the states of Kansas and Nebraska." By that time other regions originally covered had been put into other Conferences. In 1906 the Western Conference was placed into the SOUTHWEST MISSOURI CONFERENCE.

WESTERN MARYLAND COLLEGE, Westminster, Maryland, opened in 1867 and was chartered in 1868 by the MARYLAND CONFERENCE as an institution of the METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCH. Since Unification in 1939, Baltimore and Peninsula annual conferences have supported the college through their conference-wide budgets. Western Maryland College, along with other privately supported and church-related colleges in MARYLAND, has received scholarship grants from the state for students of Maryland preparing to teach in its public schools. Maryland has also made a grant toward the erection of a building. It is the only state to utilize and finance educational resources of private colleges and universities not directly under state control.

Degrees offered are the B.A., B.S., and M.Ed. (Education). The governing board is a self-perpetuating body, with all members elected for life or until resignation; one third plus one must be United Methodist ministers.

WESTERN NEW YORK CONFERENCE superseded the GENESEE CONFERENCE. On June 5, 1964 the Genesee Conference voted to become the Western New York Conference, effective July 1, 1964, subject to the approval of the NORTHEASTERN JURISDICTIONAL CONFERENCE. Conference leaders pointed out that the new name would enable outsiders to understand more readily the geographical location of the conference, and it would obviate the error of printing "Tennessee" for "Genesee" in the GENERAL CONFERENCE Daily Christian Advocate. The Jurisdictional Conference approved the change of name on June 25, 1964.

The first session of the Western New York Conference was held at Jamestown, N. Y., June 9-13, 1965 with Bishop W. RALPH WARD, JR. presiding. The conference began with five districts, 221 charges, 255 ministers, 83,281 members, and property valued at $44,549,862. Its territory is western New York. It should be noted that the same region, though not with exactly the same boundaries, was designated as the Western New York Conference (ME) from 1872 to 1876.

The Genesee Conference (ME) had been formed in 1810 by Bishops ASBURY and McKENDREE in accordance with discretionary authority granted them by the 1808 General Conference. When created the Genesee Conference embraced territory taken from both the New York and PHILADELPHIA CONFERENCES—the Cayuga and Upper Canada Districts from the former, and the Susquehanna District from the latter. Thus at the outset the new conference included western New York, a part of PENNSYLVANIA, and a part of CANADA. Named for the Genesee River, the conference was organized at Lyons, N. Y., July 20, 1810 with Bishop McKendree presiding. At the beginning the conference had sixty-three preachers, twenty-eight charges, and 10,693 members.

The difficulties and tensions during and following the War of 1812, with England—and Canada—resulted in 1824 in the division of the Genesee Conference to form the CANADA CONFERENCE. Then in 1828 the General Conference authorized the bishops to divide the Genesee Conference again if it approved. The division was made in 1829, thereby forming the ONEIDA CONFERENCE with some 19,000 members and leaving about 13,000 in the Genesee Conference. In 1848 the EAST GENESSEE CONFERENCE was carved from the Genesee body. The new conference had about 16,500 members, while some 10,500 remained in the Genesee Conference.

The 1872 General Conference consolidated the five conferences of central and western New York into four. In the process the East Genesee Conference disappeared; its territory was divided between the CENTRAL NEW YORK and the Genesee Conferences. As suggested above, the name of the enlarged Genesee Conference was then changed to Western New York, but in 1876 it reverted to Genesec. (See NEW YORK.) The new Genesee Conference embraced most of western New York and a small part of Pennsylvania, and it began with 29,116 members. In 1880 a part of the Genesee Conference territory was assigned to the Central New York Conference, thereby reducing the membership of the former to about 23,380. After 1880 there were no important changes in the boundaries of the Genesee Conference until 1962 when it gave up its work in Pennsylvania in exchange for the part of the ERIE CONFERENCE that extended into New York.

The Genesee Conference came to unification in 1939 with four districts, 259 charges, 63,752 members, and property valued at $10,195,012. The conference received a few ministers and churches from the Onandaga Conference of the Methodist Protestant Church at that time. The 1932 General Conference assigned the Negro work in Buffalo to the Genesee Conference, and that arrangement continued after unification in 1939.

For many years in the nineteenth century the Genesee Conference maintained or was related to a number of schools. The most important was the Genesee Wesleyan Seminary at Lima, New York, which opened in 1832, was a strong and influential academy for a century, struggled for survival for the next 20 years, and finally expired in 1951 while trying to become a viable junior college. The conference now supports SYRACUSE UNIVERSITY. In 1968 the conference contributed over $70,000 for Christian higher education, much of it being used in an ecumenical approach to ministry to students in state supported schools.

The summer program at CHAUTAUQUA (see Chautauqua Institution) began in 1874 and continues with an average attendance of 50,000 each year. Within its boundaries the conference has Beechwood Retirement Homes owned and operated by the Niagara Frontier Methodist Homes, Inc., the Rochester Methodist Home, and three youth camps. The conference joins other conferences of the area in supporting the Folts Home in Herkimer, and the Gateway Methodist Home for Children.

In 1970 the Western New York Conference reported five districts, 227 charges, 310 ministers, 82,336 members, property valued at $56,067,338 and a total of $7,498,146 raised for all purposes during the year.

WESTERN NORWEGIAN-DANISH CONFERENCE (ME) grew out of mission work among Norwegian and Danish immigrants on the west coast. In 1878 CARL J. LARSEN, a wood carver, began a CLASS MEETING composed of Scandinavian people in his own home in Oakland, Calif. Larsen had been converted at a Norwegian-Danish Methodist church in CHICAGO. Soon Larsen's home was too small for the class meeting, and a Seventh Day Adventist church was rented for the gatherings. In 1880 Larsen and his group erected a church costing $1,100 at Market and 24th Streets, Oakland, the first Scandinavian Methodist Episcopal Church on the Pacific coast. Larsen then joined the CALIFORNIA CONFERENCE and gave full time to the ministry. Serving as a missionary among the Norwegians and Danes, Larsen transferred successively to other conferences and succeeded in organizing churches at PORTLAND, SEATTLE, TACOMA, and Spokane, and at Moscow, Idaho, and Kalispel, Butte, and Helena, Montana.

Until 1888 all Norwegian-Danish churches were linked with the English-speaking conferences, but in that year the Northwest Norwegian-Danish Mission was organized at Moscow, Idaho, with fourteen charges in WASHINGTON, OREGON, and IDAHO. The next year the mission reported 282 members. In 1892 the name was changed to Western Norwegian-Danish Mission, and in 1895 it became the Western Norwegian-Danish Conference. Its territory included CALIFORNIA, Oregon, Washington, Idaho, MONTANA, and UTAH. The organizing session was held at Astoria, Ore., on Sept. 19, 1895 with Bishop THOMAS BOWMAN presiding. The conference began with five districts, California, Montana, Oregon, Utah, and Washington; and thirty-three charges. Ten of the charges were in Washington. There were 621 members.

The Western Norwegian-Danish Conference continued until unification in 1939 when it was absorbed by the overlying English-speaking conferences. Various factors, including reduced Scandinavian immigration, caused its demise. The conference was never large, but the good it did cannot be fully measured by statistics. In its last year it had two districts, California and Pacific Northwest, and thirteen charges, thirty-five preaching places, twenty ministers, 1,323 members, and property valued at $307,500.

WESTERN NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE was organized at Concord, Nov. 26, 1890 with Bishop JOHN C. KEENER presiding. It was formed by merging parts of the NORTH CAROLINA and HOLSTON CONFERENCES. Its territory included all of NORTH CAROLINA west of a north and south line a little east of CHARLOTTE and GREENSBORO. The new conference included most of the piedmont and all of the mountain section of the state, areas that were destined to grow in population because of industrialization and tourism. The conference began with nine districts, 134 charges, 56,232 members, and property valued at $678,380. At the beginning there were two Methodist colleges within the bounds of the conference, GREENSBORO COLLEGE for women, and Trinity College (later DUKE) which was then located near HIGH POINT. The conference grew steadily. In 1910 there were eleven districts, 227 charges, and 91,960 members. In addition to Trinity College which had moved to DURHAM, the conference then supported four colleges within its bounds, DAVENPORT, Greensboro, Rutherford, and WEAVERVILLE. By 1925 the conference had 294 charges, and 136,302 members. It came to unification in 1939 with nine districts, 310 charges, 167,110 members, and churches and parsonages valued at $14,768,373.

Following unification the Western North Carolina Conference of The Methodist Church was organized at Greensboro, Oct. 21, 1939 with Bishop CLARE PURCELL presiding. The boundaries of the conference remained the same after unification. But due to its own growth and to receiving some ministers and churches from both the BLUE RIDGE-ATLANTIC CONFERENCE (ME), and the NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE (MP), the Western North Carolina Conference immediately provided for two new districts, and in 1941 its membership had risen to 181,950.

Several church papers were being published in North Carolina when the Western North Carolina Conference began in 1890. Within a few years, however, only two remained, the North Carolina Christian Advocate at Greensboro and the Raleigh Christian Advocate, each serving its respective annual conference. In 1919 the two were consolidated under the name of the North Carolina Christian Advocate published at Greensboro, which since that time has been one of the strongest conference and area organs in the church.

The Western North Carolina Conference supports the Methodist Children's Home at WINSTON-SALEM; and the Methodist Home for the Aged at CHARLOTTE. The plant at Charlotte is valued at $5,000,000, and it has about 500 residents, some of whom are cared for without charge. In 1968 the conference contributed to its homes for children and the aged $477,673. The conference supports GOODWILL INDUSTRIES and Bethlehem Houses at Charlotte and Winston-Salem, as well as seven WESLEY FOUNDATIONS at state institutions of higher learning. The LAKE JUNALUSKA ASSEMBLY, owned by the SOUTHEASTERN JUR-ISDICTION, and the Brooks-Howell Home for retired missionaries and deaconesses at ASHEVILLE, owned by the Women's Division of the BOARD OF MISSIONS, are within the bounds of the conference.

Four members of the Western North Carolina Conference have been elected bishops, JAMES ATKINS (1906), W. WALTER PEELE (1938), PAUL N. GARBER (1944), and W. KENNETH GOODSON (1964).

In 1968 the NORTH CAROLINA-VIRGINIA CONFERENCE (CJ) was merged with the overlying conferences of the Southeastern Jurisdiction, and the Western North Carolina Conference received from that body forty-eight charges, 102 churches, thirty-six ministers, and 10,398 members.

The Western North Carolina Conference owns BREVARD COLLEGE, and it shares the ownership of Greensboro and High Point Colleges with the North Carolina Conference. Two colleges within the bounds of the conference, BENNETT and PFEIFFER, are related to both the General BOARD OF EDUCATION and the Board of Missions as well as to the conference. The conference is related to Duke University, and makes an annual contribution to the DUKE DIVINITY SCHOOL. In 1968 the Western North Carolina Conference raised for its colleges and Wesley Foundations $780,531.

Measured by church membership, the Western North Carolina Conference was the second largest conference in the M.E. Church, South prior to 1939. It continued as one of the strongest conferences in The Methodist Church. In 1970 in The United Methodist Church the conference reported fourteen districts, 687 charges, 961 ministers, 283,005 members, and property valued at $174,721,064. It raised for all purposes that year $24,196,584.

WESTERN PENNSYLVANIA CONFERENCE was organized at Grove City, Pa., June 20, 1962 with Bishop W. VERNON MIDDLETON presiding. It was formed by merging the PITTSBURGH and ERIE CONFERENCES. As its name indicates, its territory includes western PENNSYLVANIA. After boundaries were adjusted and transfers were made the new conference reported in 1963, 10 districts, 782 churches, and 233,452 members.

Since the Erie Conference was carved out of the Pittsburgh Conference in 1836, the merger of the two to form the Western Pennsylvania Conference was in a sense a return to the status quo ante. However, with some 41,000 members before it was divided in 1836, the original Pittsburgh Conference was only a little more than one-sixth as strong numerically as the newly formed Western Pennsylvania Conference in 1962.

The 1960 NORTHEASTERN JURISDICTIONAL CONFERENCE readjusted the boundaries of a number of conferences to make them conform as nearly as possible to state lines. This action was preliminary to the merger of the Pittsburgh and Erie Conferences. In 1962 the Jamestown District (N. Y.) of the Erie Conference went to the GENESEE CONFERENCE, while the Genesee Conference appointments in Pennsylvania were incorporated in the Western Pennsylvania Conference, and the Pittsburgh Conference churches in the northern panhandle of WEST VIRGINIA were given to the WEST VIRGINIA CONFERENCE.

The Western Pennsylvania Conference has ALLEGHENY COLLEGE at Meadville, and it has representation on the boards of trustees of MOUNT UNION COLLEGE and WEST VIRGINIA WESLEYAN. It maintains WESLEY FOUNDATIONS at Penn State, the University of Pittsburgh, and the state colleges at Edinboro and Indiana, Pennsylvania. The conference owns the Robert Boyd Ward Home for Children at Pittsburgh, and it is related to the following institutions: the Elizabeth A. Bradley Children's Home, Oakmont; the Ruth M. Smith Children's Home, Sheffield; and the Zoar Home for Girls, Allison Park. The conference supports three homes for the aged: the Methodist Home for the Aged, Meadville; the Methodist Home, Pittsburgh; and Arbutus Manor, Johnstown, which was projected in 1967.

In 1968 the Western Pennsylvania Conference reported 10 districts, 529 ministers, 519 pastoral charges, 226,876 members, and property valued at $138,361,727.

WESTERN PENNSYLVANIA CONFERENCE (EUB) covered the western third of the State of PENNSYLVANIA. Its northern boundary was an arc encompassing the lower two-thirds of the region and touching Greenville, Oil City, Clearfield, and Tyrone. The eastern boundary rested in the valley east of the Allegheny Mountains. With the exception of Ellerslie, MARYLAND, the southern and western boundaries followed the state line. The Conference was formed in 1951 through the merger of the Allegheny Conference of the former UNITED BRETHREN CHURCH and the Pittsburgh Conference of the former EVANGELICAL CHURCH.

The United Brethren witness began in 1795, when CHRISTIAN NEWCOMER conducted a preaching tour which brought him into the region. Beginning in 1800, these preaching places were under the supervision of the Original (Hagerstown) Conference. When the Original Conference was divided in 1830, the circuits were under the supervision of the Pennsylvania Conference. Continued growth caused the formation of the Allegheny Conference in 1838.

The first class was organized by the Evangelicals in 1806. From the beginning, the work was supervised by the Eastern Conference until 1839. In that year the circuits became one of three districts in the newly formed West Pennsylvania Conference. Twelve years later, the creation of the Pittsburgh Conference was authorized. In March, 1852, it held its first meeting in Pittsburgh.

In 1967 the Conference had a membership of 51,696. There were 298 organized congregations and 165 pastoral charges. Ministerial leadership in all classes was 229. The value of local church property exceeded $24,900,000. The churches gave for all purposes $3,587,000. The conference maintained an office at Johnstown, Pennsylvania.

There were two significant historical sites within the bounds of the Conference. The oldest was the BONNET SCHOOL HOUSE near Mt. Pleasant, Westmoreland County, Pennsylvania, where the first session of the General Conference of the United Brethren Church was held. The second site was First Church, Johnstown, Pennsylvania, where in 1946 the former Evangelical Church and the former United Brethren Church merged to create The Evangelical United Brethren Church.

In 1969, the conference united with the Western Pennsylvania Conference of the former Methodist Church to form a conference of the same name. A small group of churches in the eastern portion of the conference joined with the Central Pennsylvania Conference.

WESTERN VIRGINIA CONFERENCE (MES) was created by the 1850 GENERAL CONFERENCE and was organized Sept. 4 of that year at Parkersburg with Bishop JAMES O. ANDREW presiding. The conference was formed by dividing the KENTUCKY CONFERENCE. At the beginning it had three districts, Greenbrier, Parkersburg, and Guyandotte. The Guyandotte District was in KENTUCKY. There were twenty-four charges and 5,354 white and 149 colored members.

The work of the M.E. Church, South in WEST VIRGINIA suffered greatly during the Civil War. Between 1860 and 1866 no legal sessions of the Western Virginia Conference were held. There were two sessions of the conference in 1866, one in February at Greenup, Ky., and the other at Parkersburg in September. In 1860 the conference reported forty-seven charges, sixty-five preachers, and 10,045 full members, but in 1867, the first year for which statistics are available following the war, there were only forty-one charges, forty-six preachers, and 6,731 members. However, recovery was rapid; in 1870 the conference had 10,882 members, and the number had risen to about 13,000 by 1875. In 1900 there were 24,196 members.

The Western Virginia Conference launched MORRIS HARVEY COLLEGE at Barboursville, W. Va., in 1858, and many of its graduates became ministers in the conference. The school moved to Charleston in 1935, and at unification in 1939 it was accepted as one of the colleges of the WEST VIRGINIA CONFERENCE of The Methodist Church. However, in 1942 it became an independent college.

The Western Virginia Conference patronized two church papers, the Central Methodist and the Methodist Advocate, both of which were published independently under several different names for some years in Louisville, Ky. and Parkersburg and Moundsville, W. Va., respectively.

One member of the Western Virginia Conference, U. V. W. DARLINGTON, was elected bishop in 1918.

In 1920 the Western Virginia Conference reported 32,342 members, and in 1939 it brought to unification 51,680 members, some 44,733 of them in the state of West Virginia. In 1939 the conference also reported five districts, 132 charges, 130 preachers, and 409 churches and 133 parsonages valued at $4,040,109.

WESTFIELD, NEW JERSEY, U.S.A., First Church. Methodism in Westfield has had a long and significant history. In 1849 a small and dedicated group met under a tree-canopy on the farm of one Cornelius Leveridge. For two years outdoors or in homes they met and planned and in 1851 elected trustees, prepared a certificate of incorporation and obtained Conference permission to become a mission station. A small building erected in 1852, soon outgrown, was followed by a larger edifice in 1876 and this by the present gray-stone building erected in 1910. An educational annex, a remodeled sanctuary and a renovated chapel wing have marked succeeding years.

In 1970 with a membership of 2,467, an Official Board of 100 members and a church school of over 1,000, Westfield is the largest church in Methodism's NORTHERN NEW JERSEY CONFERENCE. Property is valued at over $1,600,000.

Involvement in missions is deep and meaningful. Benevolence giving for world, national and local projects totals $53,000, twenty-eight percent of the annual budget. Included is support of several missionary families, student and ministerial scholarships, schools, universities, church Conference projects. Special offerings represent concern for needs ranging from resettlement of Cuban refugees to summer camperships for inner city youth. A racially integrated congregation, this church has also been sensitive to the ecumenical emphasis, with growing dialogue and cooperative ventures with Roman Catholic and Jewish brethren.

JOHN WESLEY LORD, pastor here for ten years (1939-48), became a bishop in 1948. Another former pastor, GORDON E. MICHALSON, is President of the SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY at CLAREMONT, Calif. One of the prominent laymen, Joe Mickle, was President of CENTENARY COLLEGE, Shreveport, La., for almost twenty years. Mrs. Franklin Reed of this church was four years the President of the WORLD FEDERATION OF METHODIST WOMEN.

In 1949 a significant centennial celebration was observed. This Westfield Church has been on the growing edge of the suburban expansion and has become a noteworthy congregation in Methodism.

WESTMAR COLLEGE, Le Mars, Iowa, was the result of the union of two schools, York College and Westmar College. York College was established at York, Neb., in 1890 by the CHURCH OF THE UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST. Western Union College was founded at Le Mars, Iowa by The UNITED EVANGELICAL CHURCH in 1900. The first building of Western Union College burned only a few weeks before first classes were scheduled. This severe test for the new college was survived, and Thoren Hall, replacing the original structure, was dedicated Sept. 18, 1901.

These two institutions are not the total ancestry of Westmar College. Other church-founded schools whose records and alumni, by various paths, have become the responsibility of the present institution include Western College (later Leander Clark); Avalon College of Avalon, Mo.; Gould College of Harlan, Kan.; Lane University of Leocomton, Kan.; Campbell College of Holton, Kan.; and Kansas City University of Kansas City, Kan. This indicates the difficulties of establishing and maintaining a college in the latter nineteenth and early twentieth centuries.

The depression of the thirties struck hard at both struggling institutions. They managed to survive through various student "work" programs and the great devotion and sacrifice of the faculty members. Relative prosperity returned with the flood of post-World War II "G. I.'s."

A final crisis struck York College in 1951. A fire destroyed the Administration Building. The sponsoring denominations had united in 1946, and the leaders felt that the maintenance of two colleges, constantly in financial difficulties, and located within 200 miles of each other, was not sound. Formal union was effected June 30, 1955, though students and faculty had transferred to Le Mars in the fall of 1954.

Degrees granted: B.A., B.S., B.Mus., B.Mus.Ed.

In the E.U.B. Church the governing board was comprised of thirty-four trustees, twenty of whom represented supporting conferences of the E.U.B. Church. In The United Methodist Church, the College will in time be related only to the IOWA CONFERENCE.

Library, 58,000 volumes; total enrollment, 1,200; total faculty, seventy-five; campus acreage, twenty-five; number of buildings, twenty-four; endowment, $725,000; current income, $1,858,740; current expenditures, $1,791,250; value of physical facilities, nearly $6,000,000.

WESTMINSTER, MARYLAND, U.S.A., is a small city, the county seat of Carroll County, located northwest of Baltimore about thirty miles. In Methodist annals it had always been one of the major centers of the METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCH since from early days it maintained a close relationship to WESTERN MARYLAND COLLEGE located there. The College was founded and the first building erected in 1867 by F. R. Buell with the assistance of J. T. WARD, a M.P. minister. Buell sought the financial support of the MARYLAND ANNUAL CONFERENCE, but instead the Conference authorized the incorporation of a Board of Trustees which in August 1868, bought the College from Buell and elected J. T. Ward as the first president.

The influence of Western Maryland College and the strength of Methodist Protestantism in Maryland centering here served to strengthen and increase the influence of Westminster as the years went by. In time, on adjacent property given by the College, WESTMINSTER THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY was established and a great many of the ministers of that Church received their collegiate and theological training at the two institutions.

The Westminster M.P. local church grew in close connection with the College, but one city block away was Centenary M.E. Church. In 1941, two years after the 1939 unification of Methodism, these two churches merged becoming the Westminster Methodist Church, which now reports (1970) 1,681 members. Lowell S. Ensor of the former M.E. Church became pastor of the newly merged congregation and in 1947 was elected President of the College.

Also in the city is Union Street Methodist Church, formerly of the Washington Conference of the CENTRAL JURISDICTION, but now a part of the BALTIMORE CONFERENCE. These two churches became a single parish in 1969 with the same ministers serving both churches.

Three miles outside of Westminster is Stone Chapel, one of the earliest churches of Methodism, built in 1783. The original church still exists and reports in 1970 a membership of 220.

Home for the Aged (1895-1942), an institution for the care of needy aged and infirm of the Maryland Conference (MP), was located in Westminster. At the time of Methodist Union, the home was merged with two other Homes of like nature. The merger was completed in 1942. These three homes were then consolidated under one roof and renamed "The Asbury Methodist Home for the Aged" in Gaithersburg, Md.

WESTMINSTER COLLEGE, British Methodist teachers' training college, was opened in central LONDON in 1851 for men and women teachers. From 1872 women students went to their own college in Battersea. In 1930 the college instituted a four-year course which produced a number of graduate teachers. In 1946 the original policy of two-year courses was started again, as with increased opportunities to enter universities, few desired a four-year course. The premises became increasingly unsuitable, and in 1954 it was decided to build new premises at North Hinksey, OXFORD. The new buildings for 220 resident students were opened in September, 1959. In response to a request by the Ministry of Education, numbers increased to 400 by 1962, and growth continued. In 1960 the college reverted to its original policy of training women as well as men, and the initial course of training was extended to three years. The University of Oxford gave permission for forty graduates to be trained at Westminster for the Oxford University Diploma in Education. Former students occupy distinguished positions in education at home and abroad in schools of all types, including those for the handicapped and underprivileged, and in administration.

WESTMINSTER COLLEGE, Salt Lake City, Utah, is related to the United Methodist and Presbyterian Churches and to the United Church of Christ. It was established as Salt Lake Collegiate Institute in 1875 by the Presbyterian Church; the name was changed to Sheldon Jackson (Junior) College in 1895. It became a senior college in 1944. In 1953 affiliation was effected with the ROCKY MOUNTAIN CONFERENCE of The Methodist Church. It is the only evangelical senior college in UTAH, where the population is preponderantly Mormon.

Degrees offered are the B.A. and B.S. The governing board consists of thirty-six members; it is a self-perpetuating body with each participating denomination entitled to nominate two members each per year for three-year terms.

WESTMINSTER COLLEGE, Tehuacana, Texas, was founded at Westminster, Texas, in 1895. It was moved to Tehuacana in 1902. When Trinity College, then at Tehuacana, was moved to Waxahachie, Texas, the property was offered to the TEXAS ANNUAL CONFERENCE of the METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCH on condition that this church maintain a college there for ten years. The conference complied with this agreement and in 1912 obtained title to the buildings and grounds. James L. Lawlis was president during the years of these undertakings.

For fourteen years it was operated as a four-year college. The demands for its accreditation as a senior college could not be met, and in 1916 it became a junior college, the first of its kind in Texas. It became a junior college of SOUTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY, Georgetown, Texas in 1942, but because of continued financial difficulties the university returned the college in 1949 to its previous trustees. In 1952 the properties were sold to the CONGREGATIONAL METHODIST CHURCH.

WESTMINSTER THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, Westminster, Maryland, an institution of the M.P. Church, opened in connection with WESTERN MARYLAND COLLEGE under the supervision of the MARYLAND CONFERENCE (MP). THOMAS HAMILTON LEWIS was principal. Before classes were started it was determined by the Board of Trustees of the College that a theological school was impractical within the college organization. Land was purchased adjacent to the college campus and a building was erected for an independent school which was incorporated as the Westminster Theological Seminary of the Methodist Protestant Church in 1884, and Thomas Hamilton Lewis was elected the first President. Under the presidency of HUGH LATIMER ELDERDICE (1897-1932) a new classroom-administration building and residences for the President and faculty members were erected.

In 1957 the name was changed to Wesley Theological Seminary and in September 1958, it was moved to Washington, D. C., where it operated in connection with American University. Up to that time the presidents were Thomas H. Lewis (1882-86), JAMES T. WARD (1886-97), Hugh L. Elderdice (1897-1932), FRED C. HOLLOWAY (1932-35), CHARLES E. FORLINES (1935-43), LESTER A. WELLIVER (1943-55), Norman L. Trott (1955-). (See WESLEY THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY.)

WHAKATUMUTUMU, near Te Kuiti, NEW ZEALAND, was the site of an early mission station on the banks of the Mokau River, established by Frederick Miller in 1840. Miller had been sent to New Zealand by the London Missionary Society, but through the influence of JOHN WHITELEY, he accepted employment under the Wesleyan mission, as a catechist. Miller worked faithfully at Whakatumutumu under the superintendency of Whiteley for eight years, and then died at his post of duty at the early age of thirty-two. The station was never reoccupied by European missionaries, but the site is marked by a memorial cairn, unveiled in May, 1959.

WHATCOAT, RICHARD (1736-1806), second elected bishop of American Methodism, was born in Quinton parish, Gloucestershire, England, on Feb. 23, 1736, the son of Charles and Mary Whatcoat. At the age of eighteen he was apprenticed for eight years, at the conclusion of which he entered business at Wednesbury.

In 1758 he began attending Methodist meetings and entered the itinerancy in 1769. He traveled for fifteen years and then in 1784 he was ordained by JOHN WESLEY and selected to accompany THOMAS COKE and THOMAS VASEY to America where they organized the Methodists there into a Church. This was done at the famous CHRISTMAS CONFERENCE at Baltimore, Md.

Following the organization of the M.E. Church, Whatcoat continued in America taking his place in the itinerant ministry. Because he was one of the few ordained preachers who could administer the sacraments, he was nearly always appointed as elder over a number of circuits, in which capacity he traveled for fifteen years in the middle states. In 1790 he accompanied Bishop FRANCIS ASBURY on a tour of the South.

In 1786 John Wesley sent word by Coke that the Conference should elect Whatcoat a General Superintendent or Bishop, as was Asbury, but the preachers in the Conference of 1787 declined to so elect him, probably because they feared it would result in Asbury's recall to England. Also, they did not like to feel that Wesley could control their own elections. However, Whatcoat was elected bishop in 1800, winning over JESSE LEE by one vote; this led to an estrangement between Asbury and Lee, who accused Asbury of influencing the election.

As bishop, Whatcoat traveled over the whole eastern seaboard and inland as far as Kentucky and Tennessee. He usually traveled with Asbury but sometimes went alone. He was sixty-four years old when elected, and the hardships of the office were too much for his rather frail strength. He survived only six years after his election.

Whatcoat preached his last sermon at Milford, Del., on April 8, 1806. In failing health he made his way to the home of RICHARD BASSETT, a prominent Methodist who lived at Dover, Del., where he died on July 5, 1806. He was buried under the altar of Wesley Chapel in Dover. Nearly a year later, on March 30, 1807, Asbury preached his funeral there. Funeral sermons in the nature of memorials were preached at several other places also at the request of the conference. "A man so uniformly good I have not known in Europe or America," was Asbury's tribute to him.

WHEDON, DANIEL DENISON (1808-1885), American preacher, theologian, author and editor, was born March 20, 1808, in Onondaga, N. Y. He graduated from Hamilton College in 1828 and took up the study of law, but abandoned this profession to go into teaching. He taught at Cazenovia Seminary, New York State, in 1830-31; was a tutor at Hamilton College in 1832; and in 1833 was elected Professor of Ancient Languages and Literature at WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY, Middletown, Conn. In 1843, he became a minister of the M.E. Church and served churches at Pittsfield, Mass., and Jamaica, L.I., N. Y. In 1845 he was made Professor of Logic, Rhetoric and History at Michigan University and served there in that capacity until 1852. In 1853 he reentered the pastorate and served once more at Jamaica. The M.E. GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1856 elected him to be editor of The Methodist Quarterly Review—one of the influential magazines of the Church. He served as editor for twenty-eight years. Failing health forced his retirement in 1884.

Whedon was the author of many articles and books dealing with a wide variety of subjects. Some of his books are: Public Addresses (1856); Commentary on Matthew and Mark (1860); Freedom of the Will (1864); Commentary on the New Testament, 5 Vols. (1860-75); Commentary on the Old Testament, 7 Vols. (1880-86); and a posthumous volume, Essays, Review and Discourses (1889).

In the late 1850's, Whedon engaged in the debate going on in the Church over the question of whether or not the General Conference had a right to make any rule against slave holding. He supported the position that the General Conference had such a right. As early as January 1866, however, he wrote an editorial urging the northern Church to accept the overtures of the southern Church to heal the wounds caused by the Civil War, and to work for the reunification of the Church. His voice, and the appeal in re the Southern Church, unfortunately were not heeded.

Whedon's greatest contribution to Methodism, probably, was in the area of developing an indigenous Methodist theology. His book on Freedom of the Will and his article in Bibliotheca Sacra (1862) on "Doctrines of Methodism" are his best known contributions in this area.

ENJORY AND HENRY COLLEGE in VIRGINIA gave him the D.D. degree and Wesleyan University gave him the LL.D.

After his retirement in 1884, Whedon resided at Atlantic Highlands, N. J. He died there on June 8, 1885.

WHEELER, ALFRED (1824-1892), American preacher, physician, and editor, was born in New Haven, Huron County, Ohio, Sept. 14, 1824. He graduated with honors from OHIO WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY, and won the M.D. degree at Jefferson Medical College in 1852. Also, he held the D.D. degree. He married Lydia P. Curtis in 1850.

In 1853, after one year of medical practice, Wheeler joined the NORTH OHIO CONFERENCE and served several charges, including two years, 1866-67, on the Cleveland District. In 1862, he became an army chaplain, and a little later served six months without pay as surgeon to an Ohio battery. Returning to his conference in 1864, he became agent in 1865 for the centenary fund raised in connection with the CENTENNIAL celebration of American Methodism.

In 1869, Wheeler transferred to the ERIE CONFERENCE, and after several pastorates was elected editor in 1876 of the Pittsburgh Christian Advocate, serving two quadrennia. Then followed six years on the New Castle District and nearly two on the Erie District.

In his day Wheeler was regarded as an ecclesiastical statesman and was certainly one of the strongest leaders in the M.E. Church. Six times a delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCE, 1868, 1876-92, he also went to the 1881 ECUMENICAL CONFERENCE. Alert to the interests of his church, a skillful debater, a trusted counselor of Bishops SIMPSON, AMES, and HARRIS, who themselves were church lawmakers, it was claimed that scarcely any important legislation was adopted by the General Conference without Wheeler's guidance or support. He was one of the first churchmen to suggest the idea of a Methodist university in WASHINGTON, D. C. He died July 7, 1892, on Staten Island, N. Y.

WHEELER, JOHN (1815-1881), American clergyman and educator, was born April 7, 1815, in Portsmouth, England. With his family he came to America in 1820, settling at Bellefontaine, Ohio. He was converted in 1824 and joined the M.E. Church. Wheeler studied in Norwalk Seminary of OHIO in 1835 and attended ALLEGHENY COLLEGE, 1837-39. Removing to INDIANA, he entered Indiana Asbury (now DEPAUW) UNIVERSITY, which had MATTHEW SIMPSON as its new president, and graduated in 1840. He was principal of Franklin Institute in INDIANAPOLIS, 1840-42, and, during these two years was married to Mary Yandes. Wheeler was Professor of Latin at Indiana Asbury from 1842-54, and edited Asbury Notes, a literary journal of the University.

In 1855 Wheeler entered the OHIO CONFERENCE ministry and became president of Baldwin Institute (Baldwin University), Berea, Ohio, in 1856. While at Berea he helped establish German Wallace College, the first American German college. He transferred to the IOWA CONFERENCE in 1870 and became President of IOWA WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY, Mt. Pleasant, where he labored for five years. Again, President Wheeler was instrumental in founding a German college (1873).

After retiring as President of Iowa Wesleyan in 1875, Wheeler became pastor of First Church, Keokuk, Iowa. Then, in succession, he became the PRESIDING ELDER of the Keokuk and the Mt. Pleasant districts, in 1876 and in 1877. This eminent Methodist scholar died June 18, 1881, at Mt. Pleasant, Iowa, where he was buried.

WHEELING, WEST VIRGINIA, U.S.A. (population 46,854 in 1970), was founded in 1769 by Colonel Ebenezer Zane. It was then called Fort Henry, the location of the last battle of the Revolutionary War. Wheeling served as the first and third capital of the state.

Methodism was brought to Wheeling in 1785 by WILSON LEE, one of the preachers on the famous REDSTONE CIRCUIT.

A German Methodist Church, an offshoot of Fourth Street, was organized in 1839. It was the first German Methodist church in the world. Other Methodist churches formed in Wheeling prior to 1875 were: Chapline Street and North Street, 1848; Wesley Chapel, 1850; Thomson, 1855; Simpson (colored) and Zane, 1866; Benwood, 1870; and Steinrod, 1874. In 1876 the M.E. Church had seven congregations in the city with 1,336 members, and in 1900 the same seven reported a total of 5,640 members. The WESTERN VIRGINIA CONFERENCE (MES) had no organized work in Wheeling.

The CONFERENCE WOMEN'S SOCIETY OF CHRISTIAN SERVICE established the House of the Carpenter in Wheeling in 1964, an urban missionary project which promotes the work of all Methodist churches in the city.

In 1970 The United Methodist Church reported eleven churches in Wheeling—Aldersgate, Christ, Elm Grove, Fourth Street, Greggsville, Mount Olive, North Street, Simpson, Thomson, Triadelphia, and Warwood. The three largest congregations were: Christ, 1,348; Elm Grove, 907; and Fourth Street, 680. The smallest was Simpson Church with eighty-two members. The eleven churches reported a total of 6,302 members, property valued at $4,509,212, and $169,872 raised for all purposes during the year.

Fourth Street Church was organized by Wilson Lee, one of the preachers on the Redstone Circuit, in 1785. The group met in the home of Colonel Ebenezer Zane, the founder of Wheeling, and his wife Elizabeth became the first member of the society.

In 1819 when the population of the town was 1,200 and the church membership was thirty, a one-room brick church was erected on the fourth street from the Ohio River, the lot being donated by Noah Zane. In 1836 when the church had 273 members and the town 6,000 people, a new church edifice with a seating capacity of 2,000 was dedicated, and thereafter the building was used for secular as well as religious meetings. Jenny Lind sang in the church in 1851, people bidding up to $250 for choice seats for the event. The PITTSBURGH CONFERENCE met in the church, July 5, 1848, and on that occasion it divided to form the Western (later West) Virginia Conference. In 1870 Bishop EDMUND S. JANES dedicated Fourth Street's third church building.

In 1951 the Fourth Street congregation occupied its fourth edifice, the church facilities comprising one-half of the structure called the Methodist Building; the other half is rented for commercial office space.

During its history Fourth Street Church has been associated with some prominent church leaders. Bishop ASBURY preached in Wheeling in 1808, and RICHARD WHATCOAT, later bishop, was presiding elder in 1788. Among the pastors were: THOMAS SCOTT, later chief justice of OHIO; GEORGE BROWN, one of the founders of the M.P. Church; Wesley Smith, father of Bishop C. W. SMITH; GORDON BATTELLE, able educator before West Virginia became a state; and Alexander Martin, first president of West Virginia University.

In 1839 Fourth Street helped to establish a German Methodist Church in Wheeling, the first of its kind in the world. Since that time Fourth Street has assisted in launching several new congregations in the city. Some membership figures for the parent church are: 649 in 1900, 1,183 in 1920, 1,241 in 1939, and 850 in 1942.

In 1970 Fourth Street Church reported 680 members, property valued at $1,655,829, and $28,413 raised for all purposes during the year.

WHITAKER, CLIFTON LAWRENCE (1863-1926), American M.P. clergyman and educator, was born on May 9, 1863, the son of Lawrence B. and Alice P. Whitaker of near Enfield, N. C. Early in life he united with WHITAKER'S CHAPEL, one of the historic Methodist churches in America. He attended OAK RIDGE INSTITUTE and YADKIN COLLEGE, taught school for a while, and in 1888 was ordained as a Methodist Protestant minister in the NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE. While at Yadkin College he met Clara Peebles of Davie County, N. C., and on Nov. 17, 1892, they were married. To this union three children were born.

Whitaker's first pastoral charge was the Albemarle Circuit, Creswell, which was followed by appointments to the North Granville Circuit, Mocksville, Tar River Circuit, Winston Station (Winston-Salem), Granville Circuit, Roanoke Circuit, High Point, Asheboro, Mebane and North Davidson Circuit. He was President of the Annual Conference in 1901-02. He was a staunch supporter of the movement aimed toward the establishment of HIGH POINT COLLEGE, contributing liberally in a financial way, and making many speeches on behalf of the college. When the college opened in 1924 he was assigned to teach in the Preparatory Department, and later taught Bible and served as college librarian. He was given the D.D. degree by WESTERN MARYLAND COLLEGE.

His brother, Cary Hamilton Whitaker (Nov. 30, 1860-Aug. 18, 1935), was also an outstanding member of the North Carolina Conference of the M.P. Church. Clifton L. Whitaker died on Feb. 18, 1926, and was buried in Green Hill Cemetery, Greensboro, N. C.

WHITAKER, JAMES (1861-1940), British and American minister, was born in Cowling, Yorkshire, England, on Dec. 29, 1861, the third of five children of William and Ellen (Stowe) Whitaker. He attended school in Cowling and Skipton and was an active member of the UNITED METHODIST FREE CHURCH of Cowling. On July 10, 1866, he laid a memorial stone at the church and began his study for the ministry. He attended Hulme Cliff College until 1888. After graduation, Whitaker went to serve in the NEVADA Mission Conference, U.S.A. He was admitted to the CALIFORNIA CONFERENCE (ME) on probation in 1888, and into full membership in 1890, while he was serving the Quincy, Calif., church.

On July 19, 1891, James Whitaker and Laura Drew, daughter of pioneer members of the Quincy Church, were married there. From this union there were two daughters and three sons—four became public school teachers and one a physician.

During the next ten years of his ministry, James Whitaker earned five academic degrees—Litt.B., Midland University; A.M. and Ph.D., Allegheny College; S.T.B., DENVER UNIVERSITY; and S.T.D., Taylor University.

While serving Central Church of Sacramento, he was appointed CHAPLAIN of the Assembly of the State of CALIFORNIA during the forty-first session of the State Legislature.

After serving eleven charges a total of thirty-eight years, he was appointed Pastor of Hospitals and Homes, which he served until retirement in 1938. Stricken while returning home from Conference, James Whitaker died in San Jose, Calif., on July 15, 1940, survived by his wife and four children.

WHITAKER, JOSEPH WALDO (1879-1966), American M.P. layman and Methodist benefactor, was born Oct. 18, 1879, the son of John Simmons and Emma Waldo Whitaker of "Strawberry Hill," near Enfield, N. C. In 1965 he personally financed the complete restoration of historic WHITAKER'S CHAPEL, located near his home. In recognition of his services, "Mr. Waldo," as he was called, was given a special "Certificate of Appreciation" by the NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE of The Methodist Church in June 1965.

He was a member of the Halifax County Board of Commissioners for forty years and president of the North Carolina Association of County Commissioners, 1932-33. He was mayor of Enfield, and held many positions of prominence in business and civic affairs. He was noted for his many philanthropic endeavors and interests. He died on April 16, 1966, and was buried at Whitaker's Chapel.

WHITAKER'S CHAPEL, considered by Methodist Protestants prior to 1939 as the historic shrine of democratic Methodism in America, is located on NORTH CAROLINA Route 1001, six miles east of Enfield, Halifax County. The first Whitaker's Chapel, a log structure, was erected by Richard Whitaker soon after he settled on a grant of land in Halifax County in 1740. Originally Anglican, the congregation joined the Methodists in 1776 or 1778. Asbury preached in the chapel at least three times—March 21, 1786; January 17-18, 1789; and March 2, 1804. Presumably Whitaker's Chapel was a preaching point on the North Carolina and Roanoke Circuits when JOHN DICKINS was appointed to them in 1777 and 1779, respectively. Also, it was probably the meetinghouse where Dickins and his family worshiped in 1781-82 when he was located (probably because of poor health) and lived in his own house near Halifax only a few miles from the chapel. In time the log chapel was torn down and an unceiled frame church was erected. In 1850 the latter edifice was moved some 500 yards away, presumably to be used as a dwelling, and a new frame church was erected. In 1880 the third structure was moved across the road to the spot where it now stands.

As the demand for democracy in American Methodism developed, the sentiment was strong in Halifax County, North Carolina. Then in 1828 a call went out to the members of the "Union Societies" in North Carolina, and nine itinerants, five local preachers, and twelve laymen gathered at Whitaker's Chapel on December 19. There in a two-day session they organized what came to be the NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE OF THE METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCH. It was the first M.P. Conference to be formed anywhere, even antedating the organization of the denomination's General Conference. In succeeding years the North Carolina Conference (MP) met at Whitaker's Chapel five more times—in 1830, 1833, 1842, 1845, and 1849—and prior to 1939 the conference held its annual session nine additional times in churches in Halifax County.

Due to dwindling membership, services at Whitaker's Chapel were discontinued about 1948, and the building fell into disrepair. In 1964, J. WALDO WHITAKER, a descendant of Richard Whitaker, paid for restoring the chapel. Then on December 20, 1964, 136 years after the organization of the North Carolina Conference (MP), the North Carolina Conference (MC) Historical Society sponsored a commemorative service in the chapel. Bishop PAUL N. GARBER of the Raleigh Area delivered the sermon. So far as is known, Bishop Garber was the first Methodist bishop since Asbury to preach in Whitaker's Chapel. In 1965 the North Carolina Department of Archives and History erected an appropriate marker at Whitaker's Chapel.

The cemetery beside Whitaker's Chapel dates from the 1850's, and a still earlier one near the site of the first log structure is preserved. During its history Whitaker's Chapel furnished several men for the Methodist Protestant ministry, and a number of Methodist Protestant preachers are buried in its cemetery. An endowment of $5,000 now provides funds for the upkeep of the chapel and the cemetery.

Whitaker's Chapel was officially designated a historic SHRINE OF THE UNITED METHODIST CHURCH at the special session of GENERAL CONFERENCE in 1970.

WHITE, EDWARD (1822-1872), Canadian Methodist minister, was born in PENNSYLVANIA, in November, 1822. With his parents he came to CANADA at an early age, and became a probationer for the Methodist ministry in 1848. Four years later he was ordained in Kingston, Ontario.

In 1858, while serving at Smithville, Ontario, he was one of four young ministers, chosen from several volunteers, to be sent to the far-western coast of Canada to establish Methodism in what was at that time the Crown Colony of British Columbia. Leaving TORONTO on Dec. 31, 1858, the missionary party travelled via New York, Panama, San Francisco, and arrived in Victoria on Feb. 10, 1859. In the evening of Sunday, February 13, White preached in an unfinished room in the court house, in which, earlier in the day, two services had been held by other members of the party. Thus began Methodism in British Columbia. Within a few weeks four missionary charges had been surveyed, one of which, New Westminster, was assigned to White. Soon a little frame chapel, in the midst of the dense forest, was dedicated, the first Methodist Church in the colony.

In 1863 White was stationed in Nanaimo, a busy coal-mining town about seventy-five miles north of Victoria. His pastoral responsibilities extended from the outskirts of Victoria to Comox, another seventy-five miles north of Nanaimo on the east coast of Vancouver Island. Owing to ill health, White returned to Ontario in 1871. Shortly thereafter he was sent to England to recruit ministers for Canadian Methodism. On his return journey he contracted smallpox and died in hospital in Montreal on June 16, 1872.

WHITE, GOODRICH COOK (1889-), American university chancellor and longtime president of EMORY UNIVERSITY, was born Nov. 13, 1889, the son of George Berry and Florence Richards (Cook) White. He was educated at Emory College, at Columbia University, and received a Ph.D. from the University of Chicago in 1927; an LL.D. from the UNIVERSITY OF CHATTANOOGA in 1947; and the same degree from HAMLINE UNIVERSITY, from the University of North Carolina, and from DICKINSON COLLEGE. He was the recipient of other honorary degrees from other institutions of learning in America.

On May 4, 1915, he married Helen Dean Chappell, the daughter of EDWIN B. CHAPPELL. He taught for a time in KENTUCKY WESLEYAN COLLEGE, then at WESLEYAN COLLEGE at Macon, Ga.; became professor of mental and moral science at Emory, 1914-18; associate professor of psychology, 1919-20; professor, 1920-42 at Emory University. He also became dean of the College of Arts and Sciences and dean of the Graduate School in 1929-42. He was elected president of Emory in 1942, and served until 1957, becoming at that time chancellor.

Dr. White held memberships in many important educational commissions of various college associations of the nation. He was a member of the General Board of Education, of the M.E. Church, South, 1934-40 (and then of the same Board in The Methodist Church), and a member of the UNIVERSITY SENATE of The Methodist Church, 1940-60. He was a member of the President's Commission on Higher Education, 1946-47; president of The Southern University Conference, 1949-50; member board of trustees of Wesleyan College and of CLARK COLLEGE; a member of the Georgia Academy of Science (President 1939); president of the United Chapters of Phi Beta Kappa, 1952-55.

WHITE, JAMES HENRY (1855-1948), Canadian minister, was born on March 24, 1855, a son of EDWARD WHITE, who was one of the quartet of pioneer Methodist missionaries who arrived in Victoria, British Columbia, from eastern CANADA on Feb. 10, 1859. In 1871 his parents returned to Ontario. The son, James Henry, was received on probation for the ministry by the London and Niagara Conference in 1876, and was ordained on June 5, 1881. Following two pastorates in Ontario, he accepted an invitation from the congregation in New Westminster in 1887. Five other pastorates followed, namely, Victoria (Centennial), New Westminster, Vancouver (Mount Pleasant), Chilliwack, and Nelson. All of these were strategic congregations in the rapidly developing life of the province.

In 1902 the Methodist Board of Home Missions appointed White superintendent of missions for British Columbia and the Yukon Territory, which post he held until retirement in 1923. Sympathetic, understanding, and wise in counsel, he proved to be a helpful friend to pioneer congregations and their ministers. With a statesman's vision, he helped prepare the Methodists for union, in 1925, with the Congregationalists and Presbyterians.

White was sincere and fervent in his preaching, an advocate of temperance and social justice, and particularly a friend and counselor of young ministers. In 1892 he was President of British Columbia Conference. In 1904 VICTORIA UNIVERSITY, Toronto, conferred on him an honorary D.D. He died on May 26, 1948, and was buried in New Westminster.

WHITE, JOHN (1574-1648), may have been the maternal grandfather of SAMUEL WESLEY, rector of EPWORTH and father of JOHN and CHARLES WESLEY. The maternal grandfather of SUSANNA WESLEY, wife of Samuel, was also named JOHN WHITE.

The subject of this sketch was a contemporary of his namesake, and in several matters of public interest they were associated. From Winchester School White went to New College, Oxford, and became a fellow of that College in 1595. After ordination he preached frequently in and around Oxford and in 1606 became rector of Trinity Church, Dorchester. His sympathy with those being persecuted for their religious views led him and others to secure a patent for the colony of MASSACHUSETTS in New England as a refuge for those who suffered for their faith.

He himself was roughly treated by Archbishop Laud and for a time suffered imprisonment. During the British civil war his house was plundered by Prince Rupert's cavalry, and he lost his library. He fled to London and was appointed minister of the Savoy Chapel.

In 1640 he was made a member of the Committee of Religion appointed by the House of Lords, and in 1643 he was appointed to the Westminster Assembly of Divines. For a short time he was rector of Lambeth and during that period refused the wardenship of New College (1647).

Increasing physical weakness prompted his return to Dorchester, where for many years he had labored. He died at seventy-four years of age, respected and admired by his townsmen who spoke of him as the "Patriarch of Dorchester." John Wesley appears to have believed that White's daughter, Mrs. John Wesley, became the mother of Samuel Wesley, rector of Epworth, but Frances Rose-Troup (John White, the Patriarch of Dorchester, New York, 1930) shows that this is highly unlikely.

WHITE, JOHN (1590-1644), the father of SUSANNA WESLEY's mother, son of Henry White from Pembroke-shire, entered Jesus College, Oxford about 1607 and on completing his studies was admitted to the Middle Temple and became a member of the bar and a bench. As a convinced Puritan he was regularly employed by Puritans in law cases. In 1640 he became a Member of Parliament for the borough of Southwark, and threw himself into the opposition to the established Church. He was appointed chairman of the Committee for Religion and became a member of the Westminster Assembly of Divines. In one of his speeches (1641) he contended, as JOHN WESLEY did later, that bishops and presbyters were the same order, but he pushed matters to an extreme when he argued that the offices of deacons, curates, and vicars were human in origin and had no validity. He was prejudiced against bishops and could see no useful purpose even in that office. In his office as chairman of the Committee for Religion, it is recorded that in 1643 he received a list of a hundred "scandalous clergy," and later he published a book entitled The First Century of Scandalous Malignant Priests. A few months later, before he could publish his second volume, he died. John White may have been a learned lawyer, but he allowed his bitter animus against the Anglican Church to prejudice his mind. Even if one allows some of the cases he cited to be men of evil character, they were only a hundred out of eight thousand who were ejected from their livings during and after the British civil war. His attack lacks weight because he pushed it too far. He was buried in the Temple Church on January 29, 1644, and the inscription on the marble stone reads:

Here lyeth a John, a burning shining light,
His name, life, actions, were all White.

One must comment on the strange fact that the maternal grandfather of SAMUEL WESLEY and the maternal grandfather of Susanna Wesley were both named John White.

WHITE, MOSES CLARK (1819-1900), a pioneer American missionary in Foochow, CHINA, opened what was probably the first dispensary in that nation. He was born in Paris, Oneida County, N. Y., on July 24, 1819, and was educated at WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY at Middletown, Conn., and at Yale Divinity School. He was ordained and joined the Methodist Conference in 1847. That same year he married Jane Isabel Atwater of Homer, N. Y., and together they sailed for China as missionaries. She died at Foochow the following year, but Moses White remained there until 1853. During this period he conducted the dispensary in Foochow. He also translated and published The Gospel of Matthew in the Foochow dialect—the first Christian work in that language. Returning to the United States in 1853, he received his medical degree from Yale, practiced medicine in New Haven, and served on the faculties of Yale and Wesleyan until his retirement. He died on Oct. 24, 1900.

WHITE, THOMAS (1730-1795), was a magistrate who lived near Whitesburg, Kent County, DELAWARE. He is important in the history of American Methodism because he gave sanctuary to FRANCIS ASBURY from the fall of 1778 to the spring of 1780, the period in the Revolutionary War when it was not safe for Asbury as an Englishman who would not take the oath of allegiance to travel and preach at large.

White sheltered and defended Asbury at some risk to himself. As a Methodist he was suspected of being at least lukewarm toward the independence of the colonies, and in the spring of 1778 he was arrested and imprisoned for five weeks. Later he was exonerated.

Asbury and others preached in White's home, and in time a Methodist chapel was built on his estate. Also, it was in White's home on April 28, 1779, that Asbury conducted a conference of the preachers on the northern circuits, and at that time they accepted him as their leader.

Asbury held White in high esteem, referring to him as his "dearest friend in America," and adding that White had shown him more "real affection" than "any man I ever met." After the war Asbury referred to White's abode as "my former home."

On learning of White's death, Asbury wrote (May 21, 1795) that the news was "an awful shock." "I have met with nothing like it in the death of any friend on the continent. . . . I have lived days, weeks, and months in his house. . . . He was a friend to the poor and oppressed; he had been a professed Churchman, and was united to the Methodist connection about seventeen or eighteen years. His house and heart were always open. . . . He was an affectionate friend."

In 1810 JESSE LEE referred in his history to Asbury's time in White's home as a period of inactivity. Asbury replied that except for "about two months of retirement, from the direst necessity, it was the most active" part of his life, a period when 1,800 members were won and the foundation laid for the success of Methodism in Delaware.

WHITE, WILLIAM (1794-?), New Zealand minister, was ordained in 1822, and arrived from England, via SYDNEY, on May 15, 1823 on the St. Michael. Kaeo was fixed upon as the site of the first mission station, and there work was begun under the leadership of SAMUEL LEIGH on June 8, 1823. Later that year, White returned to Sydney hoping to marry, but the lady refused to accompany him to New Zealand, so he came back alone after some six weeks. He left Whangaroa Harbour (on which Kaeo is situated) on Sept. 19, 1825, to go to England, and had not returned when the Wesleydale station was destroyed in 1827.

While in England he married, and returned to New Zealand in January 1830, to resume the Superintendency of the Mission at its new headquarters at Mangungu. He remained there until 1836.

Serious trouble developed between White and his colleagues. Though his sincerity and faithfulness in the early days of the Mission could not be denied, "he suffered from the slow invasion of a worldly spirit, and became increasingly a man of business and affairs. The secular interests of the mission absorbed him until, as one of his brethren said, he became 'a kind of missionary merchant.' (Laws, Toil and Adversity, p. 16). Strong differences with his brethren led to JOHN HOBBS going to TONGA and to JAMES STACK retiring from the mission.

These troubles, as well as certain irregularities of character and administration, led the Sydney authorities of the mission to send NATHANIEL TURNER to New Zealand "to relieve White of his Superintendency of the Mission and to institute a thorough enquiry into the charges against him." (Laws, First Years, p. 32.) This enquiry led to the termination of White's employment by the mission, a sad end to a missionary career which had begun with great promise.

White later entered into business in AUCKLAND as a trader and merchant.

WHITE, WOODIE WALTER (1935-), American minister, was born in New York City, Aug. 27, 1935 to Woodie W. and Elizabeth (Truitt) White. He graduated from PAINE COLLEGE with the B.A. degree, 1958, as valedictorian. The S.T.B. degree was received from BOSTON SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY in 1961. He served appointments in MASSACHUSETTS during his schooling and was married June 3, 1961 to Kim Tolson.

The DETROIT CONFERENCE ordained Mr. White as deacon, 1961, and elder, 1963. He received the first bi-racial appointment in MICHIGAN as associate minister, East Grand Boulevard Church, DETROIT, and served from 1961-63 and pastor of the same church, 1963-67. For a year, 1967-68, he was the urban missioner for the denomination in Metropolitan Detroit. When The United Methodist Church established the Commission on RELIGION AND RACE in 1968, he became its executive secretary.

Woodie White has been the past president, college chapter, National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; past president, East Citizens for Action (Detroit); past president, Churches on the East Side for Social Action; and member of Interfaith ACTION Council, Inc.; Methodists for Church Renewal; and an organizer of Black Methodists for Church Renewal. In 1968 he received the Urban Award from the Office of Economic Opportunity "for outstanding work with the people of the Ghetto."

JOHN H. NESS, JR.

WHITEFIELD, GEORGE (1714-1770), was born in Gloucester, the son of an innkeeper, on Dec. 16, 1714. After an imperfect schooling he entered Pembroke College, Oxford, as a servitor (1734), where he became a member of the HOLY CLUB. His early religious concerns came to a crisis early in 1735 when Scougal's Life of God in the Soul of Man convinced him of the need for a "new birth," which, after a struggle, he experienced.

GEORGE WHITEFIELD

Later that year Puritan literature brought him to a knowledge of "free grace" and justification "by faith only." He was ordained deacon (June, 1736) and shortly after graduated with a B.A. In 1737 Whitefield began to make his mark in churches and religious societies as a preacher of the new birth. He then worked in GEORGIA (May-September, 1738), where he planned an orphanage and did parochial work as well as preaching before returning to England to collect funds for the orphanage and to obtain ordination as priest (he was received through COUNTESS SELINA HUNTINGDON's interest in January, 1739).

Finding the churches in England closed to him as a result both of his criticism of the clergy and the revelations of "enthusiasm" in his preaching and published Journal, Whitefield fell back on preaching to the religious societies and (in Bristol from January, 1739) to field preaching, which became his established custom. He defended his irregularities by claiming that as an Anglican clergyman he needed no further license and was not covered by the Conventicle Act.

He persuaded the Wesleys to join him in field preaching from April 1739, although he saw JOHN WESLEY's main value as one to "confirm those who are awakened" in societies. But in 1739-40 Whitefield's views on grace and predestination became more explicitly Calvinistic, and Wesley's attacks on predestination at this time led to estrangement. For the rest of Whitefield's life there was only occasional cooperation between the two, although they were personally reconciled, and Wesley preached Whitefield's funeral sermon in England. The most violent predestination controversy in England broke out in 1770 in Whitefield's absence and almost at the time of his death.

Whitefield's career as an open-air preacher carried him through the British Isles and also seven times to America. In Wales he was associated with HOWELL HARRIS, and in America with New England revivalists like the Tennents. Whitefield did much to spread and refresh the "Awakening" in America; and he also supported his Georgia orphanage, which he later used to train preachers. Like Wesley, Whitefield had no special plan when he began his evangelistic career. He concentrated largely on preaching tours, though he also worked through the tabernacles which were built for him in London. Unlike Wesley, he did not develop a permanent "connexion" under his own supervision, although some societies and preachers looked to his rather spasmodic oversight, particularly in the west of England; and the tabernacles were organized in CLASSES in the Moravian-Methodist manner.

He was also involved as "Moderator" of Howell Harris' WELSH CALVINISTIC METHODIST Conference, organized from 1743 to cover parts of England as well as Wales with preachers and societies. But Whitefield's real position was recognized when Harris in 1749 formally took over full supervision, and left Whitefield free to "strengthen their hands" as far as his primary preaching activities allowed. He explained to John Wesley that any societies he formed would only be a "Penelope's web" (Letter to J. Wesley, Sept. 1, 1748, in Whitefield's Works, ii. 370), so he rejected Wesley's methods for himself and simply preached.

From 1748 he was more closely connected with the Countess of Huntingdon's plan to revive the Church of England, by awakening the existing clergy and obtaining ordination and chapels for new ones as her domestic chaplains. Through her patronage Whitefield increased his access to aristocratic hearers who listened to him at least as a curiosity. Whitefield remained attached, however loosely, to Anglicanism; and the evolution of Lady Huntingdon's connection into a separate body took place some years after his death. In his lifetime the group was essentially an evangelistic umbrella for evangelicals of all kinds, held up by the countess herself.

Whitefield's theology was as much emotional as rational, and his CALVINISM was not rigidly worked out. He began from a concern to emphasize "vital" as against "formal" religion; and theologically to uphold grace, justification by faith, and regeneration against the "salvation of works" with which he charged the currently popular sermons of the late Archbishop Tillotson. This was the root of the theological antagonism he aroused in the Church at large. Wesley himself maintained that Whitefield's primary doctrines were the new birth and justification by faith; though in fact Whitefield did not omit to teach works following justification, and could at times speak strongly of dominion over inward sin. He moved, however—(and notably in conflict with Wesley)—to a more definitely Calvinistic system, emphasizing the comfort of the doctrines of election and final perseverance. He distrusted both Wesley's Arminianism and his perfectionism, which he saw as destructive of grace and goodness, and as relying on works for salvation. Wesley in return accused Whitefield of the crudest predestinarianism, morally intolerable and ethically disastrous. Whitefield was in fact less doctrinaire than controversy made him appear: he frequently begged Wesley not to dispute but to "offer salvation freely by the blood of Jesus"; and this (whether consistently or not) was how he himself preached salvation as if available to all.

In person, Whitefield seems to have been found attractive (despite the much satirized squint). (A. Lyles, Methodism Mocked, London, 1960, pp. 127-139.) The defects of his background and education combined with his preaching success to cause him mental conflicts over pride, and made him uncertain in his dealings with the aristocracy. However he was not as obsequious to them as is sometimes alleged. Preaching was almost his sole interest, and he was credited with enormous crowds and devastating effect. His methods were passionate, rhetorical, dramatic, and his sermons extemporary and based on little specific preparation. His primary aim was to arouse and convert rather than to consolidate believers. The results are difficult to assess: he mentions large numbers of "inquirers" rather than outright converts; but although he dealt with these by interview and correspondence (the latter giving indefinite and rather generalized advice), the lack of a coherent organization for cultivating their progress meant that others were left to do much of this work. By his own confession and intention, then, Whitefield was an "awakener" and stimulant for the eighteenth-century revival at large; and in this role he provided a certain link between its various branches. His abilities and Wesley's were complementary and in the early days perhaps deliberately so; but theological as well as temperamental differences probably made any systematic cooperation impossible. Worn out with preaching, Whitefield died of asthma at Newburyport, Mass., on Sept. 30, 1770.

WHITEFIELD HOUSE, a point of interest to American Methodism, is located in the town of Nazareth, Pa., near Allentown and Bethlehem. Through the generosity of WILLIAM SEWARD, his traveling companion, GEORGE WHITEFIELD in April 1740, proposed "to erect a free school for Negro children" and "to take up land and to settle a town for the reception of such English friends whose hearts God shall incline to come and settle there." In May of 1740 Seward negotiated with William Allen of Philadelphia for a tract of 5,000 acres "drained by branches of the Menakasy and Lehiatan . . . for 2200 pounds sterling." (See Seward's Journal of a Voyage from Savannah to Philadelphia, and From Philadelphia to England, 1740.)

According to PETER BÖHLER's Historical Account of Nazareth, Whitefield hired newly arrived MORAVIANS from Georgia "to do the woodwork of the [school] building. . . . Indeed, he wanted the Moravians to manage the whole construction . . ." Whitefield named the town Nazareth after the home of Jesus in Galilee.

A quarrel arose between Böhler and Whitefield, partly over theological matters, and Whitefield dismissed his Moravian workmen. Whitefield was unable to continue building, and he returned to England where his financial backer, William Seward, died. Facing a financial crisis, Whitefield sold his Pennsylvania Estate to AUGUSTUS C. SPANGENBERG for the use of the Moravian Brethren. The Moravians completed the building and named it Whitefield House.

The building was never used as a school for Negro children nor for Negro orphans, but was extensively used by the Moravians in their educational work. It housed the Bethlehem girls' boarding school and the Single Sisters Choir during the three and a half years between the middle of 1745 and the end of 1748; a second school for girls from December of 1753 to June of 1756; and a third one between November 1765, and the middle of the nineteenth century. When Bethlehem was too crowded to accommodate the nursery, as was the case during most of the decade between 1749 and 1759, that infant school was also happily quartered in Nazareth's Whitefield House.

In 1746 Whitefield was again on cordial terms with the Moravians and made his one and only visit to the building and land he had once owned. He heartily approved of what the Moravians were doing, and was particularly impressed by the fact that six of the girls in the school were Indians.

In time the house, instead of being used as a school, became a home for retired ministers and missionaries. Today, it is also used for Moravian historical treasures, and the museum part of the House is open to the public. It is said to contain books, paintings, household items of historic interest and some of America's oldest musical instruments.

WHITEHEAD, JOHN (1740-1804), was physician to the old Bethlehem Hospital. For a short time he was one of JOHN WESLEY's itinerant preachers, but soon returned to his profession. He joined the Society of Friends but soon went back to Methodism. He attended both John and CHARLES WESLEY during their last illness. On March 9, 1791, he preached John Wesley's funeral sermon in City Road Chapel. Wesley appointed him, with THOMAS COKE and HENRY MOORE, an executor of his will to examine and dispose of his papers and manuscripts. Whitehead was appointed to write the official life of John Wesley, but a dispute arose about the use and possession of Wesley's papers. Thereupon Coke and Moore collaborated in writing a Life of Wesley and forestalled the publication of Whitehead's in two volumes, 1793-96. He was interred in Wesley's vault in the graveyard behind City Road Chapel.

WHITEHOUSE, WILLIAM WHITCOMB (1891-), American minister and college president, was born Oct. 28, 1891, in Yorkshire, England, the son of John and Elizabeth (Whitcomb) Whitehouse. Emigrating to the United States in 1913, he was educated at Lebanon (Ohio) University (A.B., 1916), GARRETT (B.D., 1917), LAWRENCE COLLEGE (A.M., 1919), DREW (Th.D., 1922), and NORTHWESTERN (Ph.D., 1927). His academic honors included Phi Beta Kappa and the LL.D., L.H.D., and D.D. degrees. He married Grace May Harrison, June 27, 1917, and they had two children. After her death in 1941, he married Adele Ann Dreyer in 1943.

Admitted on trial in the DETROIT CONFERENCE in 1913, Whitehouse was appointed to Brimley and Mission. He was ordained DEACON in 1915 and ELDER in 1916. Transferring to the WISCONSIN CONFERENCE in 1917, he served Asbury, MILWAUKEE, and then became an army chaplain. In 1919 he transferred to the MICHIGAN CONFERENCE and was appointed to Parma. There followed two years in school after which all his appointments were to educational institutions: 1922-29, professor of economics, ALBION COLLEGE; 1929-39, dean at Albion; 1939-45, dean at Wayne State University; 1945-60, president of Albion; and 1960- , president emeritus.

Whitehouse delivered the John Shaffer Foundation Lectures at Northwestern University in 1938, and also lectured at different times at CHICAGO, Ill., Michigan, and Purdue Universities. In 1958 he was president of the American Association of Colleges. He served on President Eisenhower's Commission on Scientists and Engineers, and in addition held through the years more than twenty other offices and board, commission, and committee memberships relating to educational, governmental, church, business, and community affairs. He was a contributor to professional and educational journals. After retirement in 1960, he continued to live in Albion, Mich.

WHITELAMB, JOHN (1710-1769), was born near WROOT, in the Isle of Axholme, Lincolnshire, England, the child of very poor parents. Wroot was near Epworth, and Whitelamb was educated largely at the expense of the Wesley family; he helped to prepare SAMUEL WESLEY'S Dissertations on the Book of Job for the printer. Whitelamb was admitted to Lincoln College, Oxford, in 1731, and became a member of the HOLY CLUB; he did not quite fulfill his early promise, however, and left Oxford without taking a degree; he was accepted for holy orders in 1733. He married MARY WESLEY in January 1734, but she and her first child were buried together on Nov. 1, 1734. Samuel Wesley had resigned the living of Wroot to Whitelamb in 1734, and he remained there as rector for the rest of his life, growing apparently much less certain of his Christian faith. When he died, JOHN WESLEY commented: "Why did he not die forty years ago, when he knew in whom Whitelamb had believed." He was buried on July 29, 1769.

JOHN WHITELEY

WHITELEY, JOHN (1806-1869), NEW ZEALAND minister and missionary martyr, was born at Kneesall, Nottinghamshire, England, on July 20, 1806, and was brought up in nearby Newark. In 1827, he became a LOCAL PREACHER, and, a little later, was accepted for the ministry. With missionary service in view, he was married to Mary Ann Cooke at South Collington on Sept. 4, 1832, and on Sept. 27, was ordained in Lambeth Chapel. Mr. and Mrs. Whiteley left England by the ship "Caroline" on Oct. 23, 1832, and arrived in New Zealand on May 21, 1833, where they took up their first appointment at Mangungu, on the Hokianga River, North AUCKLAND.

Whiteley quickly learned the Maori language and became familiar with native customs. Two years later he was appointed to a new station at Kawhia, but after only thirteen months, was withdrawn because of "boundary disputes" with the Church Missionary Society. The Whiteleys were transferred to Pakane, near Mangungu, which they renamed Newark. They were able to return early in 1839 to Kawhia, where they served until 1855.

Whiteley's work at Kawhia took him on many hazardous journeys, traveling on foot to visit Maoris in their villages, by canoe up rivers, and over long distances on horseback. He became one of the best preachers in the Maori language and gained the confidence of the people. He acted as magistrate in both Maori and European disputes and his judgments were never questioned. Such was his influence with the Maoris that he was able to persuade the confederation of Waikato tribes to release the slaves taken by them on their war expeditions to Taranaki between 1830 and 1835. He was appointed to New Plymouth to take charge of the work in Taranaki in 1856, where at this time, there was grave threat of trouble between Maoris and Europeans. He traveled tirelessly between the encampments of British soldiers and the Maori villages in the district, and was everywhere received with love and esteem.

It was on one of these journeys that he met his death on Feb. 13, 1869, when the Taranaki Wars were nearly over. He was traveling to Pukearuhe, the most northerly outpost of the Taranaki settlement some thirty miles from New Plymouth, hoping to save the lives of Lieutenant Gascoigne and a few soldiers who were manning the blockhouse there, on which attack by hostile Maoris was imminent. He arrived too late. When the Maoris, flushed with victory, saw an unidentified horseman approaching at dusk, they called on him to stop. This challenge Whiteley ignored, probably in the belief that the Maoris would not molest him, but in their excited state, they fired, first shooting his horse and then killing him.

Whiteley was held in such high esteem that when it was realized that it was he who had been killed, the Maori warriors were overwhelmed with grief and shame. When he heard the news, Chief Wahanui immediately retreated with his men to the King Country, where he spoke the memorable words which virtually ended the fighting between the two peoples: "Here let it end; for the death of Whiteley is more than the death of many men."

Whiteley was buried in the Te Henui Cemetery, New Plymouth. There is a monument to him and to the other victims of the White Cliffs (Pukearuhe) tragedy in the cemetery and also a cairn at the spot where he was killed.

WHITEWAY, SOLOMON PARDY (1868-1950), Canadian educator, was born at Musgrave Harbour, Newfoundland. He was educated at the St. John's Methodist College and at Columbia University from which he received the B.S. degree in Education. His teaching career began in 1886; after serving in several smaller Methodist schools, he joined the staff of the Methodist College in St. John's in 1896. When he retired from this post in 1920 he became principal of the Newfoundland Inter-Denominational Normal School, which office he held until 1932.

Throughout his career Whiteway was a member of the Newfoundland Teachers Association. As secretary in 1913-14, he organized the association's participation in tours of the British Isles within the Canadian Hands Across the Seas Movement. He was a member of the Newfoundland Historical Society and secretary of the Newfoundland Nomenclature Board from 1933 to 1950. Moreover, he was an energetic figure on the Methodist College's board and later on the board of Memorial University College. In 1937 he was a delegate at a conference of the Central Advisory Committee on Education in the Maritime Provinces and Newfoundland, held in Halifax.

In his own church he was equally active, as secretary in the late 1930's of the United Church's Board of Evangelism and Social Service, and as archivist for the Newfoundland Conference from 1947 to 1950. He was a member of the Education Council of the United Church in St. John's, Newfoundland and elder in his own congregation, George Street, St. John's.

In 1928 MOUNT ALLISON UNIVERSITY honored him with the LL.D. He refused a cabinet post in Newfoundland and a Canadian senatorship when Confederation took place in 1949.

Whiteway's was a life of service above self, but the quality of his service raised him to a higher place in Newfoundland education than any rewards he might have gained in other aspects of his career. The advancement of education and of his church were the predominant goals of his life. He will never be forgotten by those who came under his influence.

WHITFIELD, GEORGE (1753-1832), Methodist preacher, was stationed in the London Circuit by WESLEY in 1785, and for some years served as his traveling companion as well as BOOK STEWARD. He was named in Wesley's will (1789) as one of a committee to superintend Methodist publishing, but in fact he seems to have exercised a large measure of control both before Wesley's death and (especially) after. At the CONFERENCE of 1804 he was superseded by Robert Lomas, but remained for some time as his assistant. He is to be distinguished from GEORGE WHITEFIELD (1714-1770), to whom he was not related. After a lengthy retirement in London he died Dec. 24, 1832, aged seventy-nine.

FRANK BAKER

WHITING, ETHEL LITITIA (1885-1965), was the central treasurer in INDIA for the WOMAN'S FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY, 1931-39, and then for the Woman's Division of the Board of Missions of The Methodist Church. Previously she had served eighteen years as principal of the Kanpur (Cawnpore) Girl's High School.

She was born on a farm in Harding, Neb., May 11, 1885, and died at Sherman Oaks, Calif., Nov. 9, 1965. Her college was NEBRASKA WESLEYAN, from which she received a B.A. degree in 1907. In 1926, during a furlough, she received from the same college an M.A. degree in education. A year of study in the Chicago Training School preceded her departure for India in 1912.

Miss Whiting accepted numerous responsibilities and performed them all with precision. For many years she was an ex officio member of the executive board and of the Interim Committee of the Methodist Church in Southern Asia. At one time or another her responsibilities extended to Pakistan, Burma, and Nepal, and she visited almost every major institution and work center of her church in each of those countries, as well as in India. Her interdenominational connections were numerous and her contributions to them rich and varied. After retirement she served on the staff of the BOARD OF MISSIONS in NEW YORK for two years, with the All-Nations Foundation in LOS ANGELES for three years, and with First Methodist Church in Van Nuys for four years.

WHITLA, SIR WILLIAM (1851-1933), Irish physician and author of many medical works, was born at Monaghan, IRELAND. For many years he was Professor of Materia Medica and Therapeutics at Queen's University, BELFAST. His pre-eminence in medicine was recognized by a knighthood and the Presidency of the British Medical Association. He represented Queen's University at Westminster as M.P., 1919-24. He was prominently identified with the Methodist Church in Ireland, and supported the philanthropic work of the city missions. In Belfast, the Whitlea Hall of the METHODIST COLLEGE, and the Sir William Whitlea Hall of Queen's University, were erected through bequests made by him.

In 1940 he was elected Publishing Agent of The Methodist Church serving 1940-45, during the important period of reorganization of the former publishing interests of the M.E., M.E. South, and M.P. Churches at and after unification.

From 1946-63 he was vice-president and trust officer of the Third National Bank, NASHVILLE. He was a member of the BOARD OF PUBLICATION (1952-60), The Methodist Church; trustee of the Joint University Library and of SCARRITT COLLEGE. A delegate to several GENERAL and JURISDICTIONAL CONFERENCES, he served for many years as the treasurer of the Southeastern Jurisdiction. He has been prominent in the Nashville Chamber of Commerce.

WHITTIER, CALIFORNIA, U.S.A. The city of Whittier was named for John Greenleaf Whittier, the famous Quaker poet and abolitionist who gave to the CALIFORNIA TOWN his approval in 1887 for such use of his name. The Society of Friends have always been extremely strong in Whittier.

On March 17, 1888, fifteen Methodists drove their buggies over the dusty streets, or walked through the mustard fields, to assemble in a brick building at Greenleaf and Hadley Streets where they organized the M.E. Church of Whittier.

In the first year there came successively three ministers from Fulton-Wells, G. C. Lewis, F. M. Larkin, and B. F. Wolff, to hold services on Sunday afternoons either in the building at Greenleaf and Hadley, the Friends Academy on East Philadelphia or on the second floor of the Jonathan Bailey School.

Thomas Stalker became first resident pastor in September 1889, and with the Methodist congregation growing, he led a drive for a building. A lot was found at Bailey and Friends Avenue. Here a $2,300 frame building was constructed and paid for. In the early part of 1890 the thirty-seven members proudly gathered for services in the new sanctuary.

In 1904 the 366 members under the leadership of W. A. Betts had the frame building moved away and built a new church which was destined to serve for forty-seven years, until it was replaced by a modern sanctuary in 1952.

Whittier has always been a town of strong Bible classes, and in 1921 the SUNDAY SCHOOL had an enrollment of 1,400 with an average attendance of 700.

The present sanctuary and associated four church buildings were developed from 1952 through 1962, mostly under the ministerial leadership of Russell E. Clay. These are on the same Friends and Bailey Street site that the church has occupied since 1890. Whittier College is only two blocks away.

J. Richard Sneed, whose pastorate began in 1963, led the church to the completion of all indebtedness on Dec. 31, 1967.

The Friends Church, one of the most prestigious in the nation, is a neighbor in the same block. The Quakers and the Methodists through the years have been close friends, and work together amicably in every way. In 1970 the membership of First Church, Whittier, was 2,062, and there is a comparable church staff with three ministers.

WHITWORTH, ABRAHAM, was an Englishman who became an early American Methodist itinerant. He was present at the first conference of American Methodism at St. George's in PHILADELPHIA in 1773; he was stationed in Baltimore together with FRANCIS ASBURY, ROBERT STRAWBRIDGE and Joseph Yearbry, and he joined the Conference the following year. He preached with great success along the eastern and western shores of Maryland and in New Jersey where he was instrumental in the conversion of BENJAMIN ABBOTT, a powerful early American Methodist itinerant. Whitworth is mentioned a number of times in Asbury's Journal.

He also has the dubious honor of being the first American Methodist itinerant expelled from Methodism, probably for drunkenness. Stevens, the Methodist historian, says, "While on the Kent Circuit he fell by intemperance, and fell apparently to rise no more." During the Revolution he joined the British forces and seems to have died of wounds received in battle. The dates of his birth and death are not known.

WHYEL, HARRY (1863-1949), American layman, who in 1941 presented the 179 acres and fifteen buildings of the former Soldier's and Sailor's Orphan School at historic Jumonville, Pa., to the PITTSBURGH CONFERENCE of The Methodist Church for use as a Training Center (see JUMONVILLE TRAINING CENTER). Harry Whyel was a pioneer coal and coke operator in Fayette County, Pa. He was a faithful member of Asbury Methodist Church of Uniontown, Pa. His generous gift made possible the development of "Jumonville" as one of the finest Conference Training Centers of Methodism. In giving the property Whyel said, "I am sure that I will never regret this and will be happy in seeing it develop and grow during the remaining few years that may be allotted to me." He reveled in the development of the property until his death in 1949.

WICHITA, KANSAS, U.S.A. (population 274,448 in 1970), named for the Wichita Indians, was settled in 1868, incorporated in 1870, and chartered as a city in 1886.

Methodism began in Wichita in May, 1870, with the organization of what is now First Church in a room over a livery stable. Two months previously, March 24-28, 1870, the KANSAS CONFERENCE had met in TOPEKA, and in its list of appointments was the notation, "Wichita to be supplied." In 1871 the Wichita charge reported 47 members. In 1872 the Wichita District was formed.

In 1876 a German-speaking congregation was organized in the town. By 1890 there were seven Methodist churches in Wichita with a total of 1,581 members, 920 of them in First Church. Between 1906 and 1942 some ten more churches were organized, one of them, St. Mark's which began in 1910, being a Negro congregation. Ten additional churches were started between 1951 and 1966.

In 1970 The United Methodist Church reported twenty-nine churches in Wichita with a total of 24,781 members, property valued at approximately $13,000,000, and some $2,000,000 raised for all purposes during the year.

College Hill Church began Aug. 6, 1907, with a preliminary meeting of forty-five persons in the home of O. J. Taylor. The church was officially organized, Nov. 26, 1907. In December a house under construction on North Chautauqua Street was rented, and the partitions were omitted so as to make one large room which was fitted with 100 chairs. In April 1908, the conference appointed William T. Ward as the first pastor, and on May 1 he received sixty-seven charter members.

In June 1916, a new brick church at 201 North Erie Street was dedicated. At that time the church had 672 members. Later an education building and a temporary structure to be used for the same purpose were added. In 1963 the congregation occupied a new building with a seating capacity of 935 at 2930 East First Street. The sanctuary was dedicated Nov. 26, 1967. College Hill has sent fourteen men into the ministry and six women into full time Christian service.

In 1970 College Hill Church reported 2,474 members, property valued at $1,029,000, and $120,862 raised for all purposes during the year.

East Heights Church was the first Methodist congregation to be organized in Wichita following the second World War. In October 1945, the conference appointed Basil Johnson to "Oliver Street, Wichita." The next year he reported that the "East Heights Church" had 239 members and property valued at $16,000.

Located in a residential section of Wichita, the East Heights Church grew steadily; the membership exceeded 1,000 by 1952. Johnson continued as pastor for nineteen years. He led in building the chapel and educational unit in 1949 and the sanctuary in 1960.

In 1970 East Heights Church reported 2,312 members, property valued at $1,221,827, and $195,420 raised for all purposes during the year.

First Church was organized in May, 1870. During the winter of 1870-71, the congregation with W. H. Zellers as pastor, met in the Presbyterian Church. A Methodist edifice was dedicated about Dec. 1, 1872, and it was enlarged about 1878. In 1884 the building was destroyed by fire. The members believed the fire was of incendiary origin because their pastor had fought liquor and vice in the town. By May 1885, a new structure, considered the most beautiful church in the town, was dedicated free of debt. In April 1923, the congregation occupied a new Gothic structure built of artistically arranged limestone. Due to the economic depression, the entire indebtedness of some $150,000 was not paid in full until May, 1942. In recent years several additions have been built.

Within a few years after it was organized First Church became and still is the strongest church in the conference. Its peak membership was 3,786 in 1969. In 1970 the church reported 2,934 members, property valued at $2,598,660, and $364,990 raised for all purposes during the year.

WICHITA FALLS, TEXAS, U.S.A. (population 94,976 in 1970) was founded in 1882 and became a city in 1889. Organized Methodism came to the area in November 1880, when the NORTH TEXAS CONFERENCE appointed F. O. Miller to the "Wichita Mission." In March 1881, Miller organized what is now First Church with six members. Designated a station in 1889, the church grew to more than 1,000 members by 1915, and in that year a second church, Floral Heights, was organized. The Wichita Falls District was formed in 1915.

In 1921 the WEST TEXAS CONFERENCE (ME) organized a Negro congregation with some twenty-nine members in Wichita Falls. Known as Mount Calvary Church, it became a part of the North Texas Conference in 1970 when the West Texas Conference of the CENTRAL JURISDICTION was merged. In that year Mount Calvary reported 96 members and property valued at $43,000.

In 1970 The United Methodist Church had eleven congregations in Wichita Falls with a total of 8,271 members, property valued at $4,836,763, and $1,062,623 raised for all purposes during the year.

General Minutes, MES, MEC, UMC. ROBBIE H. MCCOY

First Church was organized in March 1881 by F. O. Miller who in the preceding fall had been appointed to the "Wichita Mission" by the North Texas Conference. The congregation had no building of its own until 1885 when a frame structure costing $300 was erected at Scott and Tenth Streets. Later additions lifted its value to $1,000. A new church was erected at the same location in 1910 when there were 584 members. In 1927 when the church had about 2,700 members it erected an impressive new edifice at a cost of $600,000, incurring a debt of some $137,000. The building was dedicated in 1939.

PAUL E. MARTIN was elected bishop in 1944 while serving as pastor of First Church. Following the second World War the church became widely known for three philanthropists in its membership—JOE J. PERKINS, his wife LOIS C. PERKINS, and J. S. Bridwell. Perkins gave some $10,000,000 to the Southern Methodist School of Theology which now bears his name. Bridwell donated the money for the Bridwell Library of the Perkins School of Theology. Both families also gave liberally to other church institutions and causes.

In 1970 First Church reported 2,052 members, property value at $2,185,094, and $653,767 raised for all purposes during the year.

WIGHTMAN, WILLIAM MAY (1808-1882), American bishop, was born in CHARLESTON, S. C., on Jan. 29, 1808. He graduated from the College of Charleston in 1827 and was licensed to preach the same year. He joined the SOUTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE in 1828 and was sent to the Pee Dee Circuit. Year by year his other appointments were Orangeburg, Charleston, Santee, Camden, and Abbeville.

In 1834 he became financial agent for the newly established RANDOLPH-MACON COLLEGE and served five years in that capacity. He then returned to the pastoral ministry and in 1839 became presiding elder of the Cokesbury District. In 1840 he was made editor of the Southern Christian Advocate.

On the organization of the M.E. Church, South—to which he of course adhered—Wightman wrote an editorial in which he urged the Church to establish a mission in CHINA. This so impressed BENJAMIN JENKINS, the printer who set the type for the editorial, that he volunteered to be one of the missionaries. The first GENERAL CONFERENCE (MES) at PETERSBURG, Va., in 1846 organized a Missionary Society and at its first anniversary meeting authorized the China mission, and Jenkins, with CHARLES TAYLOR, M.D., sailed for Shanghai in 1848. Wightman urged through his paper their support and under his leadership the South Carolina Conference became known as "the old missionary conference."

In 1854 Wightman became President of WOFFORD COLLEGE and in 1859 was made Chancellor of Southern University at Greensboro, Ala. He was elected a bishop in 1866. He exercised episcopal supervision over many conferences but made his home at Charleston. He died there on Feb. 15, 1882.

Several of Bishop Wightman's sermons were published in various collections. He was one of the editors of the Standard Hymn Book, and wrote the biography of Bishop WILLIAM CAPERS, who had influenced his decision to enter the ministry.

WIJESINGHA, CORNELIUS (177-1865), was the first Asian Wesleyan Methodist minister. Born about the end of the century, he entered the school which W. M. HARVARD, one of the first missionaries, established in Colombo and became a Christian. In 1819 he became an assistant missionary, the first purely Ceylonese minister. He suffered much persecution throughout his forty-six-year ministry but helped lay the foundations of Methodism in CEYLON. He died on June 3, 1865, after speaking at the Jubilee meetings of CEYLON Methodism in Colombo.

WILBERFORCE, WILLIAM (1759-1833), famous British evangelical Anglican statesman, was born in Hull, in eastern England, in 1759, the son of a wealthy merchant who had made his fortune in the Baltic and Russian trade. His father died in 1768, and he was brought up in London by relations who had close links with GEORGE WHITEFIELD. He went to St. John's College, Cambridge, 1777-80; he did little there, but in 1780 he was elected M.P. for Hull at the cost of about £8,000, and remained in the House of Commons until 1825. He was converted evangelically in 1785-86 under the influence of Anglican Evangelicals like Isaac Milner and John Newton; from then on he combined politics and religion in a way only equaled among Evangelicals by Lord Shaftesbury. Wilberforce was already known in this way when John Wesley wrote him a letter, dated February 24, 1791, and probably the last letter that Wesley wrote, urging him to combat the slave trade: "Go on in the name of God and in the power of his might till even American slavery (the vilest that ever saw the sun) shall vanish away before it."

Wilberforce regarded himself as having a special divine mission to fight the slave trade abroad, and to improve the moral tone of British society. He saw the abolition of the slave trade as far as Britain was concerned in 1807; the emancipation of slaves in the British Empire was going through Parliament as Wilberforce lay dying. The chief criticism that can be made of him, and that was made of him in his own lifetime, was that despite his enthusiasm for Negro emancipation he remained largely indifferent to the sufferings of the poorer part of the British population itself. He died on July 29, 1833, and was buried in Westminster Abbey as an act of public recognition of his philanthropic character.

WILBERFORCE UNIVERSITY, the oldest A.M.E. school, is located in Xenia, Ohio. It comprises a four-year accredited liberal arts college and theological school. It was established by the Ohio Annual Conference in 1847, was named Union Seminary and was located near Columbus, Ohio. In 1856 the CINCINNATI CONFERENCE of the M.E. Church opened Wilberforce University at Xenia. Union and Wilberforce were closed at the outbreak of the Civil War (1861). In 1863 Bishop DANIEL A. PAYNE negotiated the purchase of Wilberforce for the A.M.E. CHURCH. Union Seminary near Columbus was discontinued and merged with Wilberforce at Xenia. In 1871 it graduated its first class. In 1887 the Ohio State Legislature established the combined Normal and Industrial Department. The Daniel A. Payne Theological Seminary was established in 1895. In 1899 the Federal Government established a Department of Military Science and Tactics. When in 1947 the State of Ohio withdrew its support from the College of Education and Industrial Arts, Wilberforce organized a College of Education and Business Administration which subsequently (1949) merged with the College of Liberal Arts and Sciences to form a single administrative unit.

Wilberforce is the first institution of higher education in the world founded by Negroes. In 1970 it had 1,066 students and fifty-six teachers. Rembert E. Stokes is President of the college and Charles S. Spivey is Dean of the Seminary.

WILBRAHAM, MASSACHUSETTS, U.S.A., is located eight miles east of Springfield in western MASSACHUSETTS; it was first settled in 1730. The community is best known as the home of WILBRAHAM ACADEMY. This academy, successor to a school established by a Methodist minister in New Market, N. H. in 1818, became an incorporated body in Massachusetts in 1824; it opened with eight students in September 1825. WILBUR FISK, first principal, served from 1825 until 1831. Originally a co-educational school affiliated with the Methodist Church, the academy became a boys' school in 1912; it is now non-denominational and strictly college preparatory. In a 350-acre rural setting the school occupies nineteen buildings one of which is the 1825 "Old Academy."

Methodist itinerant JESSE LEE preached his first "Massachusetts sermon" in Wilbraham, May 3, 1790. In 1793 a Methodist church was erected; here ASBURY conducted a conference in 1794 and preached in 1795 and 1805. Here also was conducted not only the first official session of the NEW ENGLAND CONFERENCE in 1797, but also the Conference of 1826. This historic building at 450 Main Street, the oldest existing structure in New England raised by Methodists, and the only Methodist-erected edifice still standing in Massachusetts dating from the eighteenth century, was discontinued as a Methodist meetinghouse in 1835.

Methodism continues in Wilbraham through a small segment of the United Church which adheres to the Wesleyan evangelical tradition.

WILBRAHAM ACADEMY, Wilbraham, Massachusetts, a secondary school for boys, is the oldest institution of The Methodist Church of autonomous existence and dates back to 1815 when plans were laid for its founding. Among its founders were JOSHUA SOULE and Martin Ruter, the first president. From 1817 until 1823 the school was located at New Market, N. H., and from 1824 to the present at Wilbraham, Mass. WILBUR FISK became president in 1825 and continued until he was elected president of WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY in 1831. While rich in Methodist tradition it has received only limited support from the church during the past few years. The governing board, a self-perpetuating body, has two elected on nomination of the NEW YORK EAST and NEW ENGLAND ANNUAL CONFERENCES.

WILBUR, JAMES HARVEY ("Father Wilbur," 1811-1887), American circuit rider, missionary, educator and for two decades, outstanding Indian Agent at Fort Simcoe in Washington Territory, was born in New York State on Sept. 11, 1811.

A few months before reaching twenty, he married Lucretia Ann Stephens. Both joined the M.E. Church and in 1842 James became a Methodist minister in the BLACK RIVER CONFERENCE, as a circuit rider in northern New York.

September 1846 saw the Wilburs with a Methodist party bound for the OREGON Territory. They spent nine months sailing around the tip of South America, and thence north to and into the Columbia River as far as Portland.

Wilbur was a huge man in every way. He stood six feet, four inches tall and weighed over 300 pounds, with wide shoulders, powerful muscles and a bull neck, which supported a massive head. His muscled legs and long arms with "ham" fists were his only weapons. He wore a mop of near-black hair and his "hedge-row" eyebrows were above compassionate eyes of understanding, friendliness and promised justice.

He traveled the wild and trackless Oregon Territory on foot, or astride a mule (finding no Indian cayuse able to carry his weight at his demanded pace), teaching, preaching Methodism to red and white indiscriminately, and organizing churches for both.

In 1860 he organized a school at the new Army Post at Fort Simcoe, Washington Territory. He received an appointment as Indian Agent for the Yakima Nation in 1864, and this directly from President Lincoln. This position he held with high honor and great accomplishment until his retirement in 1882. Both Wilbur and his wife continued to teach the children of the Indians and those of the white employees of the Agency that "the Bible and the plow must go hand in hand." He never asked any man to do anything he would not do, but worked beside his pupils to demonstrate his teachings. No man could do as much or as heavy work as Wilbur.

The Indians' love for him inspired the name "Father," a spontaneous work that came naturally, for to the Indians he was a protecting, instructing and providing father. This name became by continued use a lasting monument to him.

"Father" Wilbur penned his final report on his charges and Fort Simcoe on Aug. 15, 1882, attaching thereto his resignation. The aging Wilburs then retired to Walla Walla, Washington Territory. Lucretia died in October 1887. "Father" Wilbur followed in less than a month. The Old Mission in Salem claimed the remains, since this had been their first station upon the Wilburs' arrival in the far West. Their accomplishments can never be confined in any tomb.

WILDMAN, CLYDE EVERETT (1889-1955), American educator, was born March 8, 1889, in Greensburg, Ind. After graduation from the Greensburg High School in 1907 and two years of teaching in the public schools, he enrolled at DEPAUW UNIVERSITY to major in philosophy. While an undergraduate he slept for a year in one of the old college buildings in order to sound an alarm in case the structure caught fire. He graduated in 1913 with Phi Beta Kappa honors and then studied at LLIFF SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY and BOSTON UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY, from which latter school he received the S.T.B. in 1916. He was married in 1917, did graduate study in SCOTLAND and SWITZERLAND, became professor of Bible and Religion at CORNELL COLLEGE, Iowa, and in 1924 became the Dean of Cornell College. In 1926 he received a Ph.D. from BOSTON UNIVERSITY and in 1927 a D.D. from Cornell College. Subsequently he received a number of other honorary degrees.

In 1930 he became a professor of Old Testament History and Religion in Boston University School of Theology and in 1936 succeeded President G. BROMLEY OXNAM as President of DePauw University. He was president there for fifteen years, the longest presidency of this institution. Failing health caused him to retire but his health improved and he returned to teaching. He served as visiting professor at SOUTHERN METHODIST, GARRETT SEMINARY, and DICKINSON COLLEGE. He died in Carlisle, Pa., on Nov. 1, 1955.

WILEY, ALLEN (1789-1848), American preacher, was born in Fredrick County, Va., on Jan. 15, 1789. He joined the M.E. Church in April 1810, was licensed to exhort Sept. 10, 1811, licensed to preach on July 10, 1813, and in 1816 began as a traveling preacher. He traveled for eleven years and then was appointed a PRESIDING ELDER. He served four successive times as a delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCE.

The first session of the INDIANA CONFERENCE was held in New Albany, Oct. 17, 1832. On the first day of its session Allen Wiley, CALVIN RUTER, and JAMES ARMSTRONG were appointed a committee to consider and report on the propriety of establishing a college or conference seminary. From this effort came Indiana Asbury, later to be known as DEPAUW UNIVERSITY. Allen Wiley superannuated and went with his family to live in Vevay. He died July 23, 1848.

WILEY, EPHRAIM EMMERSON (1814-1893), American minister and educator, was born in BOSTON, Mass., on Oct. 6, 1814. His family was unable to provide for his education, but a loan from ELIJAH HEDDING, a long-time family friend, enabled him to go to WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY, Middletown, Conn. After his graduation in 1837 he repaid his benefactor completely. In 1839 he became Professor of Ancient Languages at EMORY and HENRY COLLEGE, Emory, Va. The college was then only three years old. He was elected President of Emory and Henry in 1852 and served that institution for forty years. He also served for five years as President of Martha Washington College, Abingdon, Va.

Wiley was first admitted to the HOLSTON CONFERENCE in 1840. He was called the Conference's most eminent member during his fifty year career. Indicative of the high esteem his colleagues had for him, he was a delegate to several successive GENERAL CONFERENCES, leading his delegation once or twice. He received large votes for the episcopacy several times, but it is believed that he discouraged his friends from considering him for that office.

As a teacher Wiley was remembered by his students as a man who could make the classics serve in teaching the most direct truths of Christianity. As a preacher he was distinguished for his clarity and beauty of style in speaking. Emory and Henry College students had the opportunity of hearing their President preach once or twice a month at the college chapel.

Although a New Englander by birth, he became intensely Southern and supported the South during the Civil War and afterward.

Ephraim Wiley was married twice, first to Elizabeth

Eammond, Middletown, Conn., and later to Elizabeth Reeves, Washington County, Tenn. He had three children by this second marriage.

He died March 13, 1893, and is buried in the cemetery on the hillside overlooking the campus of Emory and Henry College.

WILEY, ISAAC WILLIAM (1825-1884), American bishop, was born in Lewiston, Pa., March 29, 1825, of Protestant Episcopal parents. He was a successful medical practitioner, and early in his practice he felt the call to preach, but when he offered himself to the PITTSBURGH CONFERENCE he was told that there was no room for married men. He continued to serve as physician and local preacher until, in 1850, he was asked to go to China as a medical missionary. He accepted, joined the EAST GENESSEE CONFERENCE and with his wife went to China to begin a ministry there, which was limited because of the death of Mrs. Wiley and his own severe illness.

Upon his return in 1854 he was transferred to the NEW JERSEY CONFERENCE, where he made a name for himself as preacher and educator. From 1858 to 1864 he served as Principal of Pennington Seminary (now PENNINGTON SCHOOL). Elected as head of the GENERAL CONFERENCE delegation in 1864, he was appointed by that Conference to be Editor of the Ladies Repository, which office he held until 1872, when again he was elected head of the NEWARK CONFERENCE delegation to the General Conference, and was this time elected a bishop.

Bishop Wiley served in the episcopacy for twelve years. On an episcopal visitation to China in 1884, he was taken ill at Foochow and died there Nov. 22, 1884. He was buried in the Mission Cemetery at Foochow.

WILKES-BARRE, PENNSYLVANIA, U.S.A., prior to 1770 was so called in honor of John Wilkes and Isaac Barre, two members of the British Parliament who had shown friendliness to the American cause. The name was confirmed when Wilkes-Barre was made a borough in 1806, and when incorporated a city in 1871.

About 1770 settlers from New England erected five forts in the region, one of which was Fort Wyoming, adjoining Wilkes-Barre. This fort appears on maps used by General Sullivan when he camped here with his army on their march against the Indians in 1779. Near here occurred the Wyoming "massacre," July 3 and 4, 1778.

The fact that "Wyoming" had a wide connotation in this section prior to the naming of Wilkes-Barre must be borne in mind when reading the journals of FRANCIS ASBURY and WILLIAM COLBERT, who rarely mentioned Wilkes-Barre even though they may have had that place in mind when mentioning Wyoming. This name to them sometimes meant Wilkes-Barre, and sometimes a circuit or a region. When Wyoming became a circuit it included preaching places in Wilkes-Barre.

Wilkes-Barre's first class leader was Azel Dana. Within the perimeter of Wilkes-Barre the first CLASS LEADER at Hanover was Ashbel Waller who was succeeded by Abram Adams when Waller became a LOCAL PREACHER. Joseph Waller and John How were in the class. Richard Inman at Buttonwood and Comfort Carey and Huldah, his wife, at Careytown, were in this period. Other Wilkes-Barreans mentioned by the journalists were: Putnam, Catlin, Bingham, Satterthwaite, and "mother" Johnson. Their homes were preaching places for Asbury and Colbert as well as other itinerants. So also were the court house and the "meeting house" at Hanover Green, all in greater Wilkes-Barre.

Early in the 1790's Colbert found Wilkes-Barre a hot bed of Deists. However, in 1793 the evangelistic presiding elder, VALENTINE COOK, conducted a revival that brought many into the church here and elsewhere.

"Old Ship Zion," erected in 1800 on Wilkes-Barre's public square, was its first church, supposedly a union project. Misunderstandings having arisen, the Methodists for a time met in the court house. In 1831 they paid $1,000 to the Presbyterians for complete ownership of the building, which they later sold for $600 in 1849. In that year they built Franklin Street, now First, Church. In 1826 GEORGE PECK was appointed to Wyoming circuit. However, Wilkes-Barre soon separated from the circuit with the exception of three other preaching places, retaining Peck as pastor. For a few years Wilkes-Barre fluctuated between membership in the Wyoming circuit and a separate status, the separate status finally prevailing. Wilkes-Barre gave its name to one of the districts of the WYOMING CONFERENCE.

The ONEIDA CONFERENCE met in Wilkes-Barre in 1837, and, since its organization, the Wyoming Conference has met there several times. There were in 1970 six United Methodist churches in this city, with a total membership of 3,186.

WILKINS, J. ERNEST (1895-1959), American attorney, Assistant Secretary of Labor in the Eisenhower administration, and member and president of the JUDICIAL COUNCIL of The Methodist Church, was born in Farmington, Mo., the son of Henry B. and Susie Olivia (Douthitt) Wilkins. His wife was Lucile B. Robinson, whom he married on Nov. 23, 1922. He was educated at the University of Illinois, A.B., 1918; and the University of Chicago Law School, 1921. Lincoln University in MISSOURI gave him the LL.D. in 1941, as did SOUTHWESTERN COLLEGE in KANSAS.

He was a veteran of the first World War, and after that studied law and was a practicing attorney in Cook County (CHICAGO) for thirty-two years. He served a term as president of the Cook County Bar Association. He was elected a member of the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1944 (TMC) and that Conference elected him to the Commission on WORLD SERVICE and FINANCE. He was thereafter elected to the Judicial Council in 1948, becoming the first Negro elected to the Council. He was elected for an eight-year term in 1948 and was reelected by the General Conference of 1956 to serve an eight-year term. However, he died before his term was completed. Meanwhile, President Eisenhower appointed him as Assistant Secretary of Labor for International Affairs. He became the second member of his race to hold a sub-cabinet post, and the first to take part officially in cabinet sessions. He was chairman of the United States delegation to the International Labor Organization Conference at GENEVA; was made vice-chairman of the President's Committee on Government Contracts, and of other important committees; and in 1957 the President appointed him a member of the Civil Rights Commission.

For most of his life Wilkins was a member of St. Mark's Methodist Church in Chicago, serving there as Sunday school teacher and trustee. He became the Lay Leader of the LEXINGTON ANNUAL CONFERENCE, and as a member of the Council on World Service and Finance served on its executive committee.

He served as president of the Judicial Council following his election to a second term in 1956. He died rather suddenly on Jan. 19, 1959. On January 21 his body lay in state in Foundry Methodist Church in WASHINGTON, and on January 23 a funeral service was held in the St. Mark's Church in Chicago. He was survived by his wife and three sons. The General Conference of 1960 included a tribute to him in its Daily Advocate of May 7, 1960.

WILKINSBURG, PENNSYLVANIA, U.S.A. South Avenue Church was started about 1831 by Charles A. Holmes and Ezra Hingeley, LOCAL PREACHERS, who regularly walked the sixteen-mile round trip from PITTSBURGH to conduct services. In August 1832 Wilkinsburg became a preaching point on the Braddocksfield Circuit, and for the next eleven years services were held in homes and in a school. In 1843 when there were twenty-four members, a brick church forty by fifty feet, the first church building of any denomination in the town, was erected on Wallace Avenue. Wilkinsburg was incorporated in 1887, and its first burgess, CHARLES W. SMITH, was elected bishop by the 1908 GENERAL CONFERENCE.

In 1892 a new church building was erected on South Avenue. Destroyed by fire in 1907, it was replaced the next year at a cost of $127,000. An education building costing $80,000 was constructed in 1923; it was renovated in 1965 at a cost of $425,000. The church is known for its Young Adult Fellowship of more than 300 which was started over fifty years ago, and for its "Fossils" organization (retired men) which has over 200 members.

In 1970 South Avenue Church reported 1,876 members, property valued at $1,499,742, and $176,446 raised for all purposes during the year.

The institution came out of the statesmanlike missionary program begun by JASON LEE in OREGON in 1834. He is said to have preached the first Protestant sermon west of the Rocky Mountains. The college is the oldest on the Pacific slope and the first institution of higher education in Oregon. The charter was granted by the Oregon Territorial Legislature.

JOHN O. GROSS

WILLARD, FRANCES ELIZABETH (1839-1898), American temperance reformer and advocate of woman's suffrage, was born at Churchville, N. Y., Sept. 28, 1839, the daughter of Josiah F. and Mary T. (Hill) Willard. Her parents taught school in New England, studied four years at Oberlin College, and then when Frances was seven, moved to a farm near Janesville, Wis., where she lived for ten years. She was taught by her mother and early became an omnivorous reader. At seventeen she entered Milwaukee Female College and a year later Northwestern Female College, EVANSTON, Ill., where as valedictorian of her class she graduated in 1859. OHIO WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY awarded her the LL.D. degree in 1894. Her family moved to Evanston with her and it became her permanent home.

Not conventionally religious, in her youth she had periods of doubt, but during a siege of typhoid fever she vowed that if she recovered she would be a Christian, and she joined the M.E. Church at twenty-one. Religion to her was largely action; she had a concern to make the world good. The ROCK RIVER CONFERENCE elected her a lay delegate to the 1888 GENERAL CONFERENCE, but that body refused to seat any women as delegates.

If the church of her day had been willing to ordain women, she might have entered the ministry.

Following graduation she set herself a stiff course of reading for the purpose of self-improvement. Influenced by the writings of Charlotte Brontë and Margaret Fuller, she adopted their ideal of independence for women. Briefly she was engaged to but did not marry a young preacher who later became a bishop. Following that experience she returned to her ideal with renewed zeal. She had an ambition to be "widely known, widely helpful and beloved."

Beginning in 1860, she was a successful teacher for most of the next fourteen years, first in country schools and then at Pittsburgh Female College, Genesee Wesleyan Seminary, and Evanston College for Ladies. During that time, spurred by literary ambitions, she wrote articles for papers and magazines, and in 1864 published Nineteen Beautiful Years, a biography of her younger sister who had died. There was a two-year tour of Europe with a wealthy woman friend, beginning in 1868. On her return she was asked to deliver a lecture for pay, and the successful venture launched her career as a public speaker. In 1871 she became president of Evanston College for Ladies, the first woman in the world to head a college. In 1874, over her objection, the college was integrated with NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY and she was designated as dean of women. Displeased, she resigned, but later she admitted that meshing the two schools was proper.

Other schools immediately offered her attractive positions at good pay, but she hesitated. The temperance movement which was sweeping the country at that time appealed to her idealistic, crusading spirit. Moved by an ambition to make the world good, she saw an opportunity in the temperance crusade. She had a profound trust in woman, and she had not forgotten that as a girl she heard her mother say that prohibition would come when women could vote. She believed the temperance movement would protect the home, lift up the Christian life, and spur people to personal sacrifice.

Turning aside offers in the educational field, she journeyed east to talk to several temperance leaders who impressed her as practical reformers. On the return trip she stopped in PITTSBURGH to see friends who were surprised at her enthusiasm for the temperance crusade. While there she accompanied a group of temperance workers to a saloon where they sang a hymn and called on her to pray. Kneeling on the sawdust floor, she offered her first prayer in public. It was her baptism of fire. She returned to Evanston and within a week was elected president of the Chicago Woman's Christian Temperance Union. Deliberately she gave up professional advancement, economic security, and social position for isolation, poverty, ridicule, and social ostracism.

So complete was her dedication to the temperance movement that for several years she would not take or at least would not ask for a salary, and as a result she sometimes went hungry. Her only income was a little money received from lectures. In time her society provided a salary. But regardless of the sacrifices and the hard work involved, she found happiness in the crusade. Endowed with a remarkable capacity for winning and inspiring followers, she quickly became an outstanding leader in the cause. In 1879 she was elected president of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union, and in 1891 president of the World's Woman's Christian Temperance Union. In 1882 she helped to organize the Prohibition Party. As time passed, she persuaded her society, over some opposition, to support woman's suffrage, and she was elected president of the National Council of Women.

The temperance movement gave scope for her oratorical talent, her interest in politics, and her love of travel. In one year she visited all the states and territories. She was welcomed as a temperance speaker in Britain. The greatest orators of the day paid high tribute to her ability as a platform speaker. Her penchant for writing found ample expression in editing the publications of her society and compiling its books. Among her volumes were: Woman and Temperance, 1883; Glimpses of Fifty Years (autobiography), 1889; and A Classic Town; The Story of Evanston, 1892. She was co-editor of A Woman of the Century, 1892.

An indefatigable worker, she used up her energies by the time she was a little past fifty. Her mother who had been a great source of inspiration and energy through the years, died in 1892. Soon afterward her own health gave way, and though she made trips and took periods of rest, her old vigor did not return. She died in New York City, Feb. 18, 1898, and after cremation her ashes were interred in her mother's grave in Evanston.

The General Conference that refused to seat Frances Willard as a delegate in 1889, nevertheless adopted a resolution saying she was "an able champion of the rights of women and the cause of total abstinence" and was "recognized as one of the world's greatest leaders." In 1905 the State of ILLINOIS placed her statue in the Rotunda of the Capitol at Washington, and at the dedication Senator Albert J. Beveridge referred to her as "the most beloved character of her time." In 1910 she was elected to the Hall of Fame for Great Americans.

WILLERUP, CHRISTIAN EDVARD BALTOR (1815-1886), Scandinavian Methodist pioneer and leader, was born at COPENHAGEN, Denmark, on Oct. 16, 1815. His parents were A. J. Willerup, a customs officer, and his wife, Lovise. He had a good schooling and a solid training in commerce. It is uncertain when he left for America, but the first place at which we can locate him is Strassbourg, Ohio, in 1847, where he had established himself in business. When he came into touch with the Methodist Church is unknown, but he heard a minister by the name of Evans preaching, was converted to God and surrendered to his Savior, and then joined the Church. He became a local preacher, and then in 1850 was asked by the M.E. BOARD OF MISSIONS whether he would be willing to enter into the service of the church as a full-time minister, to go to New York, and to become an assistant to the Swedish minister, O. G. HEDSTROM, who was working hard in the well-known BETHEL SHIP. During those years there was a stream of thousands of Scandinavians to America, and good and pious men were wanted.

CHRISTIAN WILLERUP

Willerup was ordained an elder in the Bethel Ship on Oct. 20, 1850, by Bishop EDMUND S. JAMES. Yet he did not stay long at the Bethel Ship. Before Christmas the same year he had to go to the Scandinavian colonists on the prairie in WISCONSIN, and here a revival broke out, and he succeeded greatly as a minister. He built the very first Scandinavian Methodist Church in the world at Cambridge, Wis., in 1852.

After six years' work among the Scandinavians in America, he was asked to go to Norway, where Ole P. Petersen (see NORWAY), a Norwegian-American, had started activities. Petersen had succeeded so well that he could not manage alone, and he therefore asked that Willerup might be sent to Norway as a superintendent. The appointment was made on Feb. 25, 1856, by Bishop THOMAS A. MORRIS.

After two years in Norway, where he built the first Methodist Church in Scandinavia, Willerup was allowed to go to Denmark, and one fine day in July, 1856, he arrived at his native city, Copenhagen. After well over seven years' work there he dedicated the large Jerusalem Church. As early as 1859 he had organized the first Danish congregation. In Copenhagen also his work bore fine fruit.

Gradually the superintendent had obtained the supervision of all Scandinavia. But after a time, as administration increased, he could not stand the work and the tiring travels, and he urgently asked the Board of Missions to release him from his overall responsible task. This was effected in the case of Sweden in 1868, Norway in 1869, and Denmark in 1872.

Willerup returned to America, where for a short time he was in work at Evanston, Illinois, and also attached to the Norwegian-Danish theological college there. Then for a short time he stayed at Fredrikstad in Norway, but his strength was spent. He died in Copenhagen on May 18, 1886. Scandinavian Christianity owes much to Christian Edvard Baltor Willerup.

WILLEY, WAITMAN THOMAS (1811-1900), American layman and one of the founders of the State of WEST VIRGINIA, was born in Monongalia County, (West) Va., Oct. 18, 1811. He graduated from MADISON COLLEGE in 1831 and later received the M.A. degree from both AUGUSTA COLLEGE and Madison College.

In 1833 he was admitted to the bar. He was clerk of the courts for Monongalia County for eleven years, starting in 1841, and was active in the Whig Party. In the VIRGINIA Constitutional Convention of 1861 he opposed secession and withdrew from that body when secession carried.

The Restored Government of Virginia elected him U. S. senator in 1861. As senator, he is credited with having exerted much influence which led to the admission of West Virginia as a state in 1863. After the State of West Virginia was formed, Willey served as senator from the new state from 1863 to 1871.

An active churchman, his influence was felt not only in his home church in Morgantown, W. Va., and in the WEST VIRGINIA CONFERENCE, but also in the Church at large. Although many of his relatives and friends joined the M.P. Church, Willey stayed with the M.E. Church. He used every opportunity to urge greater democracy in his own denomination. At the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1864 he made an address in support of a proposal to include lay representation. He did much work in support of the 1868 action of the General Conference which resulted in lay representation. In 1872 he was elected the first lay delegate of the West Virginia Conference to the General Conference.

Willey died May 2, 1900.

WILLIAMS, FRANK EARL CRANSTON (1883-1962), American missionary to KOREA and INDIA, was born in New Windsor, Colo., Aug. 4, 1883. He graduated from the UNIVERSITY OF DENVER in 1906, and as a student volunteer set sail with his classmate and bride for Korea that summer.

He was assigned to the newly opened station of Kongju where he remained until 1940, this being the longest continued residence in one area for any member of his mission.

He established a school from which many of Korea's church leaders graduated. In addition to his continued work in the school, he also acted as district superintendent or district missionary, and was known to every church in the area. He was an outstanding leader in the rural church movement. As a pioneer in education he reorganized his school to give a more practical training for rural high school youth.

In 1940 he transferred to Ghaziabad, India Agricultural Institute. In 1945 he was returned to Korea by the U.S. Army to act as agricultural adviser to General John R. Hodge. At the outbreak of the Korean War he returned to mission work and was assigned by the BOARD OF MISSIONS to Nagasaki, JAPAN, to assist in restoring the new junior-senior high school destroyed by the bombing of the second World War. He retired in CALIFORNIA in 1954 and died in SAN DIEGO on June 9, 1962. He was a member of the Korea and Delhi Annual Conferences.

CHARLES A. SAUER

WILLIAMS, FRED (1898-), American missionary in the BENGAL (INDIA) CONFERENCE of the Methodist Church in Southern Asia, 1921-44. As director of the Ushagram Educational Colony in Ansol, he was recognized throughout India as a pioneer in introducing educational reforms, especially by encouraging initiative and character development. Government officials and representatives of many churches and missions came to study his work.

Williams was born in Marion, Ind., July 31, 1898. He attended ASBURY COLLEGE, and then KANSAS WESLEYAN at Salina. He earned the A.B. degree in 1920; the M.A. from Teacher's College, Columbia University, in 1927; and there also the doctorate in education, 1938. He first came to India in August, 1921, and in December 1922, his fiancée, Irene Hayes, of Stockton, Kan., arrived, and they were married. He began his work in the Methodist Boys School in Ansol in 1922, and in 1927 succeeded in bringing the boys' and girls' schools together into a coeducational high school. His work stimulated hundreds of teachers and gave to thousands of parents new hope for the future of their children.

After resigning from the BOARD OF MISSIONS in 1944, Dr. Williams served as principal of the Hindman County High School in Kentucky, and then joined the educational service of the Bureau of Indian Affairs in the United States. He served as principal successively in three important schools for American Indian children in ARIZONA and NEW MEXICO.

Irene Hayes Williams died May 23, 1953. On Oct. 27, 1954, Williams married Miss Josephine Lucero.

WILLIAMS, JAMES SAMUEL (1865-1946), American M.P. minister, who served from 1911 to 1941 as the CHAPLAIN to the Mission of the Good Samaritan in ASHEVILLE, N. C., was born near Oak Ridge, N. C., and was educated at OAK RIDGE MILITARY INSTITUTE, WESTERN MARYLAND COLLEGE, and was graduated from WESTMINSTER THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY in 1893. Western Maryland College conferred the D.D. degree upon him in 1922. He served Grace Church, GREENSBORO; Halifax Circuit; First Church, Henderson; and First Church, HIGH POINT, prior to December 1904, when he was assigned to the Asheville Mission, later to become the Merrimon Avenue M.P. Church. In 1911 the Asheville Ministers' Association organized the Mission of the Good Samaritan "to render aid to the health-seekers who were coming to Asheville at the rate of about three thousand a month." Many of these people were tubercular patients. Williams was selected by the Association to serve as the Chaplain at the Mission, and the North Carolina Conference (MP) was asked to assign him to the project. At the height of his work, he was ministering to more than 1,000 patients in the sanitarium, and to many more in homes and hovels. "No one was too poor or too rich to be beyond his reach; Jew, Catholic, Protestant and pagan alike were blessed by his kindly ministry. From the churches, fraternal orders and other sources . . . [he] collected funds to help them in their distress." As a recognition of his ministry, the educational building of the St. Paul's Methodist Church in Asheville was named the "J. S. Williams Memorial Building." He was buried in Green Hill Cemetery in Greensboro, N. C.

WILLIAMS, NOAH W. (1876-1954), American bishop of the A.M.E. CHURCH, was born in Springfield, Ill., on Dec. 25, 1876. He received his education at WILBERFORCE UNIVERSITY in Ohio, DEPAUW UNIVERSITY in Indiana, and Earlham College also in Indiana. He was converted in 1892 and licensed to preach in 1894. The Illinois Conference (A.M.E.) admitted him in 1899. He held pastorates in ILLINOIS, INDIANA, MISSOURI, TENNESSEE and KENTUCKY. He was elected bishop in 1932, and served in the south, the southwest and the far west of the United States. He retired in 1948 and died in St. Louis, Feb. 12, 1954. He was a commanding and inspiring churchman and episcopal leader.

WILLIAMS, PETER (1752?-1823), American Negro sexton of the original JOHN STREET CHURCH, New York City. His parents, natives of Africa, had been brought to America in the slave-trade. Born in the cow-barn back of his owner's house on Beekman Street, Peter often declared what it meant to him to realize the similarity of his birthplace to that of the Saviour.

Converted under Captain THOMAS WEBB's preaching at the Rigging Loft on William Street, Peter became an active member of the Methodist Society led by Webb and PHILIP EMBURY. There Peter met Mary (Molly) Durham, a slave in a family that had come from St. Christopher in the WEST INDIES. They married, as was settled in a joint-relationship of their owners. Peter became sexton of Wesley Chapel on John Street in the early 1770's, serving for many years in that capacity, while Molly kept the small parsonage used by Wesley's preachers as they came and went. Peter and Molly Williams are frequently mentioned in John Street Church Records (Vol. 1, "The Old Book").

On June 10, 1783, the trustees of John Street Church "paid Mr. Aymar for his negro Peter—40 pounds." This entry in the records indicates the transaction whereby the trustees protected Peter's Christian dignity and faith by preventing his public auction, and making possible his freedom at their hands when the legal requirements would permit. Mid-December 1785, a formal Paper of Emancipation was enacted at the Court by the trustees, recorded in Lib. 53 of Conveyances, p. 220, of the city's official records. Thus Peter became free.

Skilled under his former master in handling tobacco, Peter established himself in that business, becoming one of the most prosperous of his race in New York City. He aided largely in the financing and building of the first Methodist Church for his people in New York, at Leonard and Church Streets, later known as Zion Church, personally laying the cornerstone. This was a frequent preaching place of FRANCIS ASBURY.

Peter and Molly provided excellent education for their two children—Peter, Jr., who under the patronage of Bishop Hobart became one of the first ordained Negro clergymen of the Protestant Episcopal Church; Mary (adopted), who kept the accounts and handled all the correspondence of Peter's business. Molly died in 1821, and was buried at Forsyth Street Methodist Church. Her epitaph—"Words cannot express her worth." William Phoebus conducted the service for Peter (1823), John Street Church being crowded to capacity, with many standing in the street. Phoebus said, "Although a black man, he has risen to honor, highly respected, greatly beloved. It was his vital religion that elevated him." In Joseph B. Smith's notable painting of the first church on John Street, Peter may be seen on duty at the door. His portrait is preserved in the archives of the church.

WILLIAMS, ROBERT (c1745-1775), was the first traveling Methodist preacher to come to the new world. He came in 1769 and was at work in New York before the arrival of BOARDMAN and PILMORE, the first two regularly appointed by JOHN WESLEY to serve in America.

Prior to coming to America, Williams served as an itinerant in the Irish Conference from 1766-69. Hearing of the need for assistance in New York, Williams applied to John Wesley for permission to preach in America. Wesley hesitated to give him permission since Williams had been critical of the Anglican clergy and lacked, Wesley thought, a teachable spirit. Wesley finally agreed to let Williams go at his own expense, and on condition that he would work under the direction of Boardman and Pilmore, the official missionaries Wesley had appointed for the colonies. Williams agreed to the conditions and was granted a local preacher's license.

Accounts differ as to where Williams first landed in the new world. Historians like Lee, Stevens, Simpson and others, report that Williams took passage on a boat with Thomas Ashton, an Irish Methodist who paid his way, and that they both landed at New York. The History of American Methodism (1964) and others, have Williams traveling with Ashton but landing first at NORFOLK, Va., and then working his way up the coast to New York.

The latter account is based apparently upon a letter written by William H. Dallam of Harford County, Md., on Oct. 29, 1839, to EZEKIEL COOPER. In the letter, which is now in the GARRETT THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY collection of Cooper material, Dallam sets forth some reminiscences about Williams told him by his father. One of these is that Williams' boat was bound for BALTIMORE, but was blown off course by a storm, forcing Williams to land at Norfolk.

At any rate, wherever he first landed, Williams was at work in New York before Richard Boardman arrived. The records of Wesley Chapel (now John Street) indicate that Williams was hard at work there prior to October 1769. A collection of original LOVE FEAST Tickets, now in the Library of DREW UNIVERSITY, Madison, N. J., includes a handwritten ticket signed by Robert Williams and dated Oct. 1, 1769. This is the first known Love Feast Ticket issued in America.

When Boardman arrived in New York in late October 1769, Williams started south. He visited Pilmore in PHILADELPHIA on November 1, and went on to MARYLAND, where he joined ROBERT STRAWBRIDGE in the work there.

In 1770, Williams' name is listed with Boardman's and Pilmore's in the appointments for America. In 1771 he was stationed at Wesley Chapel in New York. In 1772 he worked with Pilmore in Maryland and VIRGINIA. In June 1773, at the first Conference held in America, Williams was received into the traveling ministry and appointed to PETERSBURG, Va., where he formed the first Circuit in Virginia.

Soon thereafter, Williams met DEVEREUX JARRETT, an Episcopalian clergyman who was sympathetic to the Methodists and who, himself, was of an evangelical spirit. Williams convinced Jarrett "that the Methodists were true members of the Church of England—that their design was to build up and not divide the Church." (The Life of the Rev. Devereux Jarrett, Rector of Bath Parish, Baltimore 1806, pp. 107ff.).

Jarrett cooperated with Williams and other Methodist preachers in furthering the evangelical movement. Under Jarrett's preaching, the parents of JESSE LEE were converted. Lee always thought of Williams as his spiritual father. Under Williams' guidance also, WILLIAM WATERS entered the Methodist ministry, the first native born Methodist itinerant. Williams became known as a rousing evangelist with many conversions, even during the Revolutionary War.

In 1774 Williams organized the Brunswick Circuit which extended from Petersburg, Va., into NORTH CAROLINA. Soon thereafter, he married and retired from the traveling ministry. He established a home on the road halfway between Portsmouth and Suffolk. His married life and retirement were brief, for he died on Sept. 26, 1775. Asbury preached his funeral sermon and said of him, in part: "He has been a very useful, laborious man, and the Lord gave him many seals to his ministry. Perhaps no one in America has been an instrument of awakening so many souls, as God has awakened by him."

In addition to his pioneer labors in the colonies, Williams was the first Methodist preacher to publish Wesley's books, tracts and sermons, and to distribute them to the people. He did this without permission from John Wesley in order to meet the needs of people for Christian literature and instruction. His actions came under criticism from Wesley, Asbury and others. Wesley did not like Williams' printing and selling his writings without his permission. Some preachers feared Williams was profiting from the sale of the literature. Wesley reprimanded Williams in a letter, while the Conference of 1773 adopted six rules, two of which read:

4. None of the preachers in America to reprint any of Mr. Wesley's books without his authority (when it can be gotten) and the consent of their brethren.

5. Robert Williams to sell the books he has already printed, but to print no more, unless under the above restrictions.

Williams agreed to stop printing books. However, the need for books, tracts, and sermons which this adventure-some, independent preacher tried to meet, grew as the Methodist movement expanded and after his death the new Church in 1789 established the Methodist Book CONCERN.

In addition to being the first publisher of Methodist books in America, Robert Williams has the distinction also of being the first Methodist minister in America to marry, the first to locate, and the first to die.

WILLIAMS, THOMAS, eighteenth-century British Methodist, was one of Wesley's early assistants, sometimes confused with a preacher of the same name among the CALVINISTIC METHODISTS of South Wales. In the summer of 1747 he became the first Methodist preacher to visit Ireland. He formed a society in DUBLIN and persuaded JOHN WESLEY to pay it a visit. He also pioneered the work in Cork, Limerick, and Londonderry, but later left the connection and obtained Anglican orders.

WILLIAMS, WILLIAM (1717-1791), Welsh Calvinistic Methodist hymnwriter, was born into a Presbyterian family. After hearing HOWELL HARRIS preach in 1738, Williams resolved to devote himself to the ministry, and in 1740 was ordained deacon in the Church of England.

From his mountain curacy he became a leading preacher among the WELSH CALVINISTIC METHODISTS, and at their second "association" in 1743 he agreed to resign his Anglican charge in order to assist DANIEL ROWLANDS. He continued to call himself a minister of the Church of England, but was never priested. His greatest contribution to Welsh religion was in his hymns, stimulated by a challenge issued by Howell Harris. His first book of Welsh hymns, entitled Alleluia, was published in 1744, to be followed by many more. His best known is "Arglwydd, arwain trwy'r anialwch," translated into English as "Guide me, O thou great Jehovah." This translation (an adaptation by Williams himself of one by PETER WILLIAMS) first appeared about 1772 as "a favourite hymn sung by Lady Huntingdon's young collegians," and was soon widely adopted. Williams died Jan. 11, 1791 at Pantycelyn, near Llandoverly.

WILLS, WILLIAM HENRY (1809-1899), American M.P. minister, educator and administrator, was three times President of the NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE of the M.P.

Church, and in 1866 was President of the GENERAL CONFERENCE of that denomination. He was born in Tarboro, N. C., on Aug. 4, 1809, and joined WHITAKER'S CHAPEL in 1830. They built a permanent home, "Rocky Hill," near Brinkleyville, Halifax County, from which Wills traveled to preach over a wide area of the state, and where his nine children were born and reared. In 1853 Wills became one of the founders of and principal contributors to Bethesda Church which was built at Brinkleyville. As a result of his influence, the Annual Conference met at Bethesda Church in 1862. In 1855 he and JESSE HAYES PAGE, later his son-in-law, opened the HALIFAX MALE ACADEMY at Brinkleyville and shortly afterward the ELBA FEMALE SEMINARY. Wills also served as a trustee of LYNCHBURG COLLEGE during the period of its existence, 1855-61. The D.D. degree was conferred upon him by WESTERN MARYLAND COLLEGE in 1872.

Wills served as Secretary of the North Carolina Conference in 1832, 1833, 1853, 1856, 1857 and as President in 1848, 1849 and 1868. The General Conference of 1866, of which he was president, met in GEORGETOWN, D.C., and during its sessions the members went as a body to call on President Andrew Johnson in the White House. Wills made a short address after which the President spoke.

At a General Convention of the M.P. Church held in Baltimore in May 1877, Wills was a member of a Joint Committee which recommended the adoption of the Basis of Union between the northern and southern branches of the denomination. On May 16, 1877, when the two branches were officially reunited, Wills and his neighbor, L. W. Batchelor from Brinkleyville, were among those who presented voluntary five-minute speeches.

William Henry Wills was said to have been a preacher of "almost pentecostal power" and at a protracted meeting at Double Springs, Guilford County, N. C., a thousand hearers "seemed to have been swayed as by a strong wind." He was well versed in the economy of his church, clearly comprehended its principles, and was a parliamentarian of decided ability.

WILLSON, WILLIAM HOLDEN (1801-1856), American layman, was born in NEW HAMPSHIRE. He came to OREGON as a carpenter with the first reinforcements to the Methodist Mission founded by JASON LEE, arriving May 18, 1837. He learned the fundamentals of the practice of medicine from Dr. Elijah White, and thenceforth was known as "Dr. Willson."

He was sent to Nisqually in Washington by Jason Lee in 1839, in anticipation of the coming of JOHN P. RICHMOND, who arrived there in 1840. On Aug. 16, 1840 Willson was united in marriage to Chloe Aurelia Clark, a Mission teacher from CONNECTICUT, who had come out with the second reinforcement to the Mission on the ship Lausanne, and was assigned to teach at Nisqually. This was the first white marriage in the state of Washington, and Richmond officiated.

When the Nisqually Mission was abandoned in 1842, Willson returned to SALEM, and was elected to the board of the Oregon Institute, predecessor of WILLAMETTE UNIVERSITY. Mrs. Willson was the first teacher in the school. Later Willson became secretary of the institution and agent for the sale of the mission property which comprised the entire townsit of Salem.

Willson was one of the secretaries of the Champoege Meeting, held May 2, 1843. He was one of the managers of the Oregon and California Missionary Society, organized in 1849. He was active in civic and political life of Oregon, once running for congress. He had much to do with the attempt to coin money before and after Oregon became a territory in 1859.

Willson and his wife had three daughters, later prominent citizens of Oregon. They were Frances Aurelia (Mrs.

J. K. Gill); Belle (Mrs. William Wythe); and Katherine (Mrs. William G. Dillingham). A great-grandson, Richard G. Montgomery, became author of several books dealing with the history of Oregon.

Willson died in 1856 and is buried in Salem.

WILMINGTON, DELAWARE, U.S.A., was founded and located on the west bank of the Delaware River. The city is the location of the world's largest chemical manufacturing companies and their research laboratories.

In 1639 the first Swedish expedition to the new world under the leadership of Peter Minuit, sailed up the Delaware River and into the Christian River to a point then called "The Rocks." Here they established a colony and built Fort Christina. Both the fort and the village surrounding it were named in honor of Queen Christina, the daughter of Gustavus Adolphus, King of SWEDEN. In 1655 the Dutch took Fort Christina ending Swedish rule in Delaware.

The English took control of the colony in 1664 under William Penn. It acquired under his leadership a Quaker character which has never been lost. The area which was to become the City of Wilmington was laid out in 1731.

Methodism traces its origin in Wilmington back to 1766 or 1767 and the coming of Captain THOMAS WEBB. PILMORE in his Journal gives a positive date of Nov. 4, 1769 for Captain Webb's second visit. Webb preached his first sermon under some trees near the corner of King and Kent Streets, now 8th and King. John Thelwell, a well-known school teacher, officiated as clerk for the service and led the singing. Subsequently, Thelwell offered his school house as a place of worship. Thelwell was also a bellman, market master and clerk, and was one of the founders of Asbury Church.

Methodism in Wilmington had very humble and precarious beginnings. The first society formed consisted of about fourteen members and was connected with Chester Circuit. ASBURY complained that he could not use the court house, but that the dancing crowd had free access to it at anytime. THOMAS WARE under the date of 1791 tells us of the conditions he faced in the pastorate in Wilmington, "I commenced my labors in Wilmington. This was my first station; but I signed for the backwoods, which were a paradise to me, compared with this suffocating borough infected with mystical miasm, which had a deleterious effect, especially on the youth. They had imbibed this moral poison until it broke out in supercilious contempt of all who were by one class denounced as hirelings and will-worshippers, and by another as free-willers and perfectionists. Our church was surrounded by hundreds of these sons of Beliah, night after night, while there were scarcely fifty worshippers; such was their conduct, that females were afraid to attend our meetings at night; and we had to commence services in time to dismiss the congregation before it was dark." EZEKIEL COOPER was appointed to Wilmington in 1797. He found the church to be in disorder and confusion. "Scarcely any regularity at all, and rather a general anarchy in the affairs of the Society, and a disunity and murmuring, one with another prevails."

In 1789 a lot was purchased at the southeast corner of Walnut and Third Streets and a house of worship was erected fronting Walnut. It was a building about thirty-five feet square with a gallery, and Bishop Asbury dedicated it on Oct. 16, 1789. Asbury wrote concerning it, "Thus far have we come after more than twenty years of labor in this place." This society then consisted of forty-three white and nineteen colored members. The church building was enlarged in 1811 by an addition of twenty feet, and in 1828 there was another addition so that the building thus much enlarged became known as Asbury Church. There was also a small cemetery in connection with the church and in it many of the first members were laid to rest.

Wilmington became a station in 1789 with J. Jessop as pastor, but in 1795 it reverted again to a circuit and alternated between a circuit status and a station until 1806 when JOSHUA WELLS came and it became a permanent station. Growth was slow. In the year 1800, it numbered about 200. In 1805 the black people secured a lot and built a house for separate worship about thirty-five feet square. In 1844 another charge was established which was dedicated on Feb. 23, 1845, known as St. Paul's Church. In 1848, a charge was formed called Union mission, and this in time moved to a more eligible site, and what was known as Union Church was erected under J. D. Curtis. What became known as Scott Church came from the move of a few members from Asbury and Union who had organized a Sabbath school and in time put up a building in 1852.

Grace Church which has long been known as the cathedral church of Wilmington was erected at a cost of over $200,000 on the northwest corner of Ninth and West Streets. In time other churches were started until twenty-seven were reported in 1970 with a total membership of 17,582. Suburban development has given rise to several new parishes—Asbury, Wilmington Manor, Kingswood and Brookside, Aldersgate and more recently Skyline.

Wilmington gave its name to the WILMINGTON CONFERENCE of the M.E. Church which was organized by the authority of the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1868. This held its first session in Wilmington on March 17, 1869. At the union of Methodism in 1939, the Wilmington Conference became the PENINSULA CONFERENCE, though Wilmington is still the metropolis both of the conference and the state of DELAWARE. The A.M.E. CHURCH and the A.M.E. ZION CHURCH both have had churches in Wilmington for the past 100 years.

Aldersgate Church is the largest church in the Peninsula Conference with a membership of 3,265 in 1970. It is a suburban church which was started by a small group of sixty-five persons in 1948. The Aldersgate Church stands beside Concord Pike, one of the busiest highways in Delaware, and serves a rapidly expanding suburban area. The church is staffed by three ministers, as well as by a Director of Christian Education and a Director of Music.

Aldersgate has become a community center. It operates an accredited kindergarten, employing twelve teachers and accommodating 250 children. It maintains three church services, and two complete church schools every Sunday. The operation of two weekly canteens, one for Junior High and one for Senior High, is part of its youth program. There are three youth choirs. The church is growing at the rate of nearly 300 members per year.

Grace Church is one of the early examples of the architectural shift in America from plain chapels to large and ornate edifices. Certain civil provisions have made the State of Delaware advantageous for a great many large business corporations to establish Wilmington as the legal location of their "home offices," so Wilmington has become the center of very considerable wealth. In the middle of the nineteenth century a group of very affluent Methodist laymen incorporated themselves under a Delaware charter and erected Grace Church, commemorating the first 100 years of American Methodism. Newspaper headlines on the day Grace Church was opened, Jan. 23, 1865, called it "the finest Methodist Church in America." Bishop MATTHEW SIMPSON in nearby PHILADELPHIA, refused to appoint a Methodist minister to serve Grace Church after its erection until the trustees, despite their independence as a civil corporation, agreed to execute the Methodist Trust Clause (see DEEDS OF TRUST) as a corollary to their civil charter. Grace Church remains one of the largest and strongest congregations along America's eastern seaboard. In 1970 it reported 1,726 members.

WILMOT, GEORGE WILLIAM (1878-1946), a minister of the Belgian Conference of The Methodist Church, was born in Boulogne, FRANCE, of British parents. He married Edith Rugby and they had three children. He studied for the ministry and became a preacher of the Wesleyan Church in France. During the First World War, he served as interpreter and liaison officer with the French army. He came to BRUSSELS in 1920 to take part in post-war relief work of the newly organized Methodist Mission. He organized the first Methodist congregation in BELGIUM, the Brussels Central Church, and became its pastor, 1922-30, and again from 1933-40. Because of his British nationality, he was sent into exile by the German invasion of 1940. His health broke, and he died in Witney, Oxon, England, in October 1946.

ALPHEUS W. WILSON

WILSON, ALPHEUS WATERS (1834-1916), American bishop, was born in Baltimore, Md., Feb. 5, 1834, the son of Norval and Cornelia (Howland) Wilson. NORVAL WILSON was a conference leader in his day, an M.E. GENERAL CONFERENCE delegate, 1832-40, and a delegate to the Southern Church General Conference in 1866. Also, he wrote the resolution adopted by the BALTIMORE CONFERENCE (ME) at Staunton, Va., in March, 1861, by which that conference declared itself independent of General Conference authority because of the chapter on slavery placed in the Discipline by that body in 1860.

Alpheus Wilson was educated at George Washington University, graduating at eighteen. He studied medicine and later law. RANDOLPH-MACON COLLEGE and VICTORIA UNIVERSITY awarded him the D.D. degree, and the LL.D. was conferred on him by CENTRAL METHODIST COLLEGE and Washington and Lee University. He married Susan B. Lipscomb, March 4, 1857, and they had three sons who died in childhood, and three daughters.

Wilson was admitted on trial in the Baltimore Conference (ME) in 1853, and was ordained DEACON in 1855 and ELDER in 1857. After four years as a junior preacher on different charges, his appointments were: 1857, Warm Springs, Va.; 1858, Blue Sulphur, W. Va.; 1859, supernumerary; 1860-61, Eutaw Street, Baltimore; 1870-72, WASHINGTON, D. C., District (MES); 1873-76, Mount Vernon Place, Washington; 1877, Calvary, Baltimore; and 1878-81, General Missionary Secretary. He was a delegate to the General Conference, 1874-82, and was elected bishop at the 1882 session.

Because Wilson's sympathies were with the South, he would not attend the session of the Baltimore Conference (ME) at Light Street Church, Baltimore, in March, 1862, and which was composed of the minority of preachers who had opposed the action of the majority at Staunton, Va., in March, 1861. The group meeting at Light Street Church declared that the preachers who did not attend had withdrawn, and Wilson and sixty-five others were dropped. Wilson's biographer says the stand he took in 1862 meant the loss of all he possessed. Wilson then began the practice of law in Baltimore and continued at it until five years after the Civil War in order to meet his financial obligations, though he was enrolled as a member of the Baltimore Conference (MES) which convened at Alexandria, Va., in March, 1866. Wilson was carried on the roll as a supernummate the first year and then as supernumerary the next three years.

When Wilson became Missionary Secretary he was soon recognized throughout the connection as an able church leader. Coming on the scene just after the period of Reconstruction, he stirred the Southern Church to action on behalf of missions. He quickly became known as a great preacher; profoundly impressed with his pulpit ability, the preachers in the conferences sat on the edge of their pews when Wilson stood up to preach. Bishop LUTHER B. WILSON (ME), a fellow Baltimorean, declared that A. W. Wilson was the mightiest preacher he personally ever heard. Wilson was a close student of the Bible; during the last thirteen years of his life he read his Greek New Testament through seventy-five times.

Bishop Wilson visited the church's missions in BRAZIL twice and those in the Orient six times, helping to organize the mission in JAPAN on one trip. He was a member of four ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCES, 1881-1911, delivering important addresses at the first three. In addition to several addresses, he published two books: The Witnesses to Christ, the Savior of the World, 1894; and The Life and Mind of St. Paul, 1912. In 1924 Bishop W. A. CANDLER edited a volume of Wilson's Sermons, Lectures, and Addresses.

After thirty-two years as a bishop, Wilson was superannuated at the 1914 General Conference. He died in Baltimore, Nov. 21, 1916, and was buried there.

WILSON, CLARENCE TRUE (1872-1939), American minister, secretary of the Board of Temperance, Prohibition and Public Morals of the M.E. Church and leader of American Methodism's temperance and prohibition movement for over a generation, was born in Milton, Del., April 24, 1872. His higher education was received at St. John's College, Annapolis, Md., the University of Southern California, and McClay College of Theology. He was ordained DEACON at the age of eighteen, an elder at twenty—the youngest man ever to be so ordained according to Who's Who in American Methodism (1916).

Between 1892 and 1905, Wilson served pastorates in various states, and between 1905 and 1910 was pastor of Centenary Methodist Church in PORTLAND, Ore. From 1910 to 1936 he was the general secretary of the Board of Temperance, Prohibition, and Public Morals of the M.E. Church. Under his leadership Methodism waged a great battle to win national prohibition. One of his strategic moves was the building of an impressive office building to house his and other Methodist activities on Capitol Hill, WASHINGTON, D. C., practically in the shadow of the Capitol dome—a building which yet serves as Methodist headquarters in the capital city. Wilson retired at the age of sixty-five to live in Oregon, where he died on Feb. 16, 1939.

The Christian Advocate in its Pacific edition just after his death said: "Clarence True Wilson was one of the most colorful characters produced by modern Methodism . . . Other men of genius will emerge, but the peculiar combination of circumstances which gave him scope for expression will not be duplicated. Dr. Wilson will be especially remembered for his street-corner advocacy of prohibition, for his joint debates with Clarence Darrow and others on the subject, and for the nerve and pertinacity which he displayed in erecting the Methodist Building at Washington."

WILSON, HENRY RAYNOR (1898-), is a third-generation Methodist in North India. He was born in Budaun, Dec. 28, 1898. His grandfather was a noncommissioned officer in the army of the East India Company. After retiring he was converted and was baptized by the pioneer missionary, Peachey T. Wilson, whose surname he adopted. A son, baptized at the same time and named Dhappan, was educated in Methodist schools and became a Methodist minister. Henry married Virginia Haqq, a granddaughter of the early convert and first Indian presiding elder, ZAHUR-UL-HAQQ.

Henry Wilson was educated in Parker High School, Moradabad, and in LUCKNOW CHRISTIAN COLLEGE. He joined the North India Conference educational service, and while principal of the Methodist High School in Dwarahat, he was invited to serve also as pastor of the church there. Later he was ordained DEACON and ELDER, but he did not become an Annual Conference member until 1950. From 1931 to 1946, he was principal of the Parker High School at Moradabad, leaving that post to become agent of the LUCKNOW PUBLISHING HOUSE. He was editor of The Indian Witness, 1947-50. In 1947 he became the treasurer of the All-India Methodist Provident Fund.

He edited the Hindi-Urdu weekly Kaukab-i-Hind (Star of India) for several short periods. He was also editor of a book of daily devotional lessons in Hindustani. In 1951 he returned to Moradabad as district superintendent and gave leadership to more than 20,000 Methodists in that district for six years. He retired and lives in Moradabad. He was delegate to two GENERAL CONFERENCES and was often elected to the CENTRAL CONFERENCE, and the executive board, and to membership on boards of governors of educational and medical institutions.

WILSON, JOHN (1837-1915), British Methodist, was one of those PRIMITIVE METHODIST LOCAL PREACHERS who left a deep mark upon the character of trade unionism in the Northeast, and especially the Durham coal mines. Beginning to work in the pit at the age of twelve, he became general secretary of his union, the Durham Miners' Association; thence he went into local politics as a county councillor and alderman, and for the last twenty-five years of his life he sat as Liberal M.P. for mid-Durham.

WILSON, LUTHER BARTON (1856-1928), American bishop, was born at Baltimore, Md., Nov. 14, 1856, the son of Henry M. and Eliza K. (Hollingsworth) Wilson. One of his ancestors was among ROBERT STRAWBRIDGE's first converts and became a member of that preacher's first society.

Wilson was educated at DICKINSON COLLEGE (A.B., 1875; A.M., 1878); and the University of Maryland (M.D., 1877). His honorary degrees were: D.D. in 1892, and LL.D. in 1904 from Dickinson; L.H.D. from SYRACUSE in 1912; and LL.D. from WESLEYAN in 1913. He married Louisa J. Turner, Feb. 17, 1881, and they had two sons and a daughter.

No sooner had Wilson graduated in medicine than he felt called to preach. He joined the BALTIMORE CONFERENCE (ME) in 1878, was ordained DEACON in 1880 and ELDER in 1882. For twenty-six years he was a pastor and presiding elder. He served five charges in or near BALTIMORE, 1878-90. Other appointments were: Wesley, WASHINGTON, 1891-93; Washington District, 1894-99; Foundry, Washington, 1900-02; and West Baltimore District 1903-04. He was a GENERAL CONFERENCE delegate, 1896-1904, leading his delegation and being elected bishop in the latter year. He was the resident bishop in CHATTANOOGA, 1904-08; PHILADELPHIA, 1908-12; and NEW YORK, 1912-28.

Wilson was his denomination's fraternal delegate to the Methodist Church of CANADA in 1902. In 1895 he was chairman of the committee which called the first convention of the National Anti-Saloon League, and was elected first vice-president of that body in 1901. He was a member of the Church Peace Union, and served as a trustee of AMERICAN UNIVERSITY, Dickinson and MORGAN COLLEGES, and DREW SEMINARY.

Bishop EDWIN H. HUGHES rated Wilson as one of the three greatest "ecclesiastical lawyers" in the history of the M.E. Church. Though he and Bishop ALPHEUS W. WILSON (MES) were not related, they as native Baltimoreans were good friends and they worked for better relations between the two churches. Hughes and others credited L. B. Wilson with making a significant contribution toward the unification of American Methodism.

Though Wilson had been in frail health for several years due to a severe illness contracted while on an episcopal tour in Africa, he undertook the presentation of the episcopal address at the 1928 General Conference. By reason of age he was retired at that conference. He died shortly afterward, June 4, in Baltimore, and was buried there.

WILSON, NORVAL (1802-1876), American minister and Southern church leader, the father of Bishop ALPHEUS W. WILSON, was born at or near Lewisburg, W. Va. His ancestors were of sturdy Scotch-Irish Presbyterian stock. His education was liberal, a broad and deep basis for the subsequent love of letters which marked the whole course of his life. He was student of and an authority on the life and writings of JOHN WESLEY. He could never endure any depreciation of Wesley or Wesley's writings.

Norval Wilson's work as a preacher covered thirty-nine years. This began in the rugged mountains of his own state, but very soon he was transferred to the tide-water counties of the Northern Neck of VIRGINIA, and from there he was sent to BALTIMORE City, Md. He served in various capacities in the BALTIMORE CONFERENCE of the M.E. Church, South. It is said that Norval Wilson, who cast his lot with the Southern Church in 1846, left Baltimore at the outbreak of the war between the States, and managed to take the records of the Old Baltimore Conference back to Virginia with him. He was accused of "stealing the records," by those Baltimoreans who adhered to the North.

The story is that in the attempt to secure the old conference records, the Northern Methodists in Baltimore got a provost guard from the Federal Army then occupying Baltimore to search for them. Wilson, assisted by certain Southern sympathizers, got the records concealed under bales of hay and taken to a ship in the harbor and thence shipped to NORFOLK and from that point they were transported by the old canal along the James River up to Lexington, Va. The Southern Church thus saved the records and they were kept by the Old Baltimore Conference (MES) until that conference was dissolved at union in 1939, when the records were put back in the Lovely Lane Museum in Baltimore.

In 1860, because of failing health, Norval Wilson retired and chose Winchester, Va., as his home. For sixteen years he never ceased working among the churches, as vacancies gave opportunity for Presbyterian, Lutheran, and Reformed congregations to invite him to occupy their pulpits.

Norval Wilson, in his personal appearance, was most striking. He was a man of unbending will and steadfast resolve. However, it was not until one heard him speak that the full measure of his personality could be felt. He was considered, by all who heard him, an excellent preacher—"a man of God." He died Aug. 9, 1876. His son, Bishop Alpheus W. Wilson, survived him many years and was one of the notable bishops in the Southern Church.

WILSON, OLIVER G. (1891-1959), American Wesleyan Methodist minister, was born on July 21, 1891 and spent his early years in Minersville, Kan. In 1917 he was ordained by the Kansas Conference (Wesleyan Methodist) and served as pastor in that as well as in the Oklahoma Conference. He was president of the Oklahoma Conference until he was called to Miltonvale Wesleyan College (1929-42) where he served as instructor in theology and Bible, vice-president, and dean of men at various times. In 1943 he was chosen by the denomination to be the Sunday School Secretary and Editor. In 1947 he was named editor of The Wesleyan Methodist where he became widely and favorably known for his forceful literary style. He served in this capacity until his death in 1959. Houghton College conferred the D.D. degree on him in 1949. Wilson was in demand as a speaker in camp meetings, conferences of all ages, and filled positions on many boards of the denomination.

GEORGE E. FAILING

WINANS, WILLIAM (1788-1857), pioneer American preacher and leader, was born Nov. 3, 1788, at Chestnut Ridge, Pa. As a youth he moved with his family to Clermont County, Ohio, where in 1807 he had a heart-warming experience. He received license to preach and was admitted on trial into the Western Conference in October 1808. After one year on the Limestone Circuit in KENTUCKY, he was appointed to Vincennes, Ind. At the session of the Western Conference in 1810, Winans was received in full connection and volunteered to take an appointment in the MISSISSIPPI District. He arrived in Mississippi on Dec. 5, 1810, to begin an outstanding ministry in that state which was destined to last until his death forty-seven years later. At the first session of the MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE in 1813, he was elected secretary and served ten years in that capacity. He was appointed a missionary to NEW ORLEANS, and while there he bought the lot on which the first Methodist church in that city was built.

After marrying Martha Dubose in 1814, he located for five years, living at Centreville, Miss., in a home he built himself. Three daughters and one son were born of the marriage.

Although Winans had almost no formal education, he became an avid reader and accumulated one of the largest private libraries in the Southwest. He spoke and wrote with freedom, correctness, and force. RANDOLPH-MACON COLLEGE later conferred upon him the D.D. degree.

ELDER's orders were conferred in 1816. After returning to active service in 1820, he served for several years as a presiding elder in addition to those as a pastor. During his active ministry he traveled 140,000 miles.

Winans went to the GENERAL CONFERENCE in Baltimore in 1824, an unknown preacher, and came away well recognized as a powerful church legislator, and well-nigh irresistible in debate. From that year until his death he was a delegate to every General Conference. In 1832, he delivered the Pastoral Address as it was called, to the General Conference. In the years immediately preceding the division of the M.E. Church he was the principal spokesman for the southern group. Bishop MCINTYRE thus describes Winans in the great debate that ensued in 1844:

Dr. Winans (of Mississippi) was the first speaker on the Southern side; a striking figure—tall and raw-boned. The veins of his stringy neck might be seen, swollen with earnestness, for he spoke in Italics and wore no cravat. His limp shirt-collar lay around, his clothes were baggy, and his shoes tied with strings; but his eyes were bloodshot with intensity, and his head a magnificent dome of thought. Exact, logical, forceful, he had become known in the radical controversy of 1824, as unsurpassed in debate. Other elements besides ecclesiastical entered into this question, and he spoke in "the calmness of despair":

"Well, [Bishop Andrew] was a slave-holder in 1840, exposed to the malediction of the North, and just as unfit for the general superintendency as in January, 1844. . . . What evil had he done by becoming a slave-holder further by marriage, when he was already a slave-holder beyond control?"

When, however, the decision went against the South, Winans was put on the Committee of Nine appointed to draw up the PLAN OF SEPARATION of the Church. He was chairman of the southern group of delegates the next year at the LOUISVILLE CONVENTION of 1845, called for the purpose of organizing the M.E. Church, South. He made the speech at that convention which inspired and stimulated the action that was taken. He called to order the first General Conference of the M.E. Church, South, at PETERSBURG, Va., in 1846. More than any other one man, he was the champion of Southern Methodism.

He died on Aug. 31, 1857, and was buried the following day in the family burial plot in Wilkinson County, Miss.

WINCHELL, ALEXANDER (1824-1891), American educator and scientist, whose teachings in regard to evolution caused his dismissal from VANDERBILT UNIVERSITY. He was born on Dec. 31, 1824, in the town of North-East, Dutchess County, N. Y., the son of Horace and Caroline (McAllister) Winchell. He first began to prepare himself for a career in medicine, but eventually graduated from WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY, Middletown, Conn., in 1847, and began an active career in teaching, lecturing and writing.

He taught in the natural history department at Amenia Seminary in 1849; was president of the Masonic University at Selma, Ala. in 1853; chairman of the physics and civil engineering department at the University of Michigan in 1853; and chairman of the geology, zoology, and botany department of the same institution, 1855-73. He became the chancellor of SYRACUSE UNIVERSITY from 1872 to 1874, resigning to teach in the University's department of geology. He then went as professor of geology and zoology to the newly founded VANDERBILT UNIVERSITY, Nashville, Tenn., where he was from 1875 to 1878.

Winchell wrote nearly 250 articles and books, attempting to reconcile the supposed conflict between science and religion. Many critics had objected to evolution because it seemed to be inconsistent with theism. Winchell argued that evolution was rather the best proof of theism; that studies of environment and natural selection were simply attempts to describe God's "instrumental means of accomplishing a certain premeditated result."

Winchell held that matters of science pertained to the intellect, and matters of religion to faith. Faith and intellect were seen as two diverse aspects of man's nature. He believed that the veracity of Scripture was being confirmed by science, archeology, history and ethnology; but he also believed that if Scripture were "utterances of God's truth" they must harmonize with truth in other dimensions.

Many Methodists along with other critics felt such thought might rule out supernatural intervention by relying on a mechanistic interpretation of scientific facts.

Controversy centered upon Winchell's ambiguity in his commitment to natural selection and the genetic descent of man from the anthropoids.

The climax to the problem came in 1878 when the Northern Christian Advocate (Syracuse) carried a series of articles on a study by Winchell, "Adamites and Pre-Adamites or a Popular Discussion Concerning the Remote Representatives of the Human Species and their Relations to the Biblical Adam." In this study, Winchell stressed his belief that there was Biblical evidence of pre-Adamites (Romans 5:12-14) and that the black races were pre-Adamite and inferior Adamites. Such thought combined with his belief in derivative evolution eventually effected his expulsion from Vanderbilt University.

Thomas O. Summers, editor of the Nashville Christian Advocate, and holder of the chair of systematic theology at Vanderbilt, attacked his fellow professor, as did many other Methodists. Finally Bishop HOLLAND MCTYEIRE, the dominant figure at Vanderbilt, yielded to demands to dismiss Winchell after first requesting Winchell to refuse reappointment, which Winchell declined to do as he claimed he had not been given a chance to defend himself against false charges. He was informed by the University that his chair was abolished for "financial reasons." Winchell was incensed, saying this was a blatant violation of academic freedom. The Methodist supported the action of the University with an editorial later published in the Nashville Christian Advocate.

Winchell returned to Ann Arbor, Mich., and in 1879 was unanimously recalled to the chair of geology and paleontology at the University of Michigan, where he remained until his death. While at Michigan, he was the chairman of the committee to organize the Geological Society of America, and served as president in 1891. He is credited with having discovered seven new genera and over 300 new species in fossil form.

His best known books are: Sketches of Creation (1870), Geological Chart (1870), The Doctrine of Evolution (1874), Science and Religion (1877), Preadamites (1880), Sparks from a Geologist's Hammer (1881), World Life (1883), his textbook, Geological Studies (1886), and Walks and Talks in the Geological Field (1886).

STEPHEN C. COBB

WINCHESTER, VIRGINIA, U.S.A. Just when the first itinerant Methodist preacher visited Winchester is not known. Some claim that RICHARD WRIGHT and WILLIAM WATERS preached there in the summer of 1772. Wright came to America with FRANCIS ASBURY in September 1771 and returned to England in 1774. It is known that he did preach in PENNSYLVANIA, DELAWARE, and MARYLAND, but there is no record of his work in Virginia. William Watters was the first native American to become a regular itinerant. In 1783 he purchased a farm near McLean, Va., where he lived until his death in 1827. There is good reason to believe that he preached in Winchester as early as 1772. The journal of FREEBORN GARRETTSON clearly states that he preached in Winchester in February 1777.

The leadership and enthusiasm of Francis Asbury played a major part in the establishment and growth of Methodism in Winchester. His first visit to Winchester occurred on June 21, 1783. He was not impressed by the religious climate he found, asserting in his Journal of that date that "religion is greatly wanting in these parts. The inhabitants are much divided. . . . They agree in scarcely anything, except it be to sin against God." In all Asbury made twelve visits to Winchester, extending from 1783 to 1809.

On April 6, 1791, John Steed, Samuel Calvert, and Richard Holliday, trustees of the Methodist Church in Winchester, purchased for the congregation a lot on the east side of Cameron Street just south of the Town Run, and by 1793 the first Methodist church in town had been built on that lot. W. C. Russell describes this structure as a large, frame building which stood high and close to the street pavement. He added, "The whole house presents a rude and unsightly appearance, but many a good lesson was taught from the rickety old desk and the rude 'kirk,' and many a one has learned precepts there which have served as stepping stones to a home in heaven."

This first church served the local congregation until 1818, when a new brick church was built at what is now 112 South Cameron Street, a structure which, with many alterations and additions since that date, is known today as the Fairfax Hotel. For thirty-seven years this was to be the sanctuary of Winchester Methodists. Among early Methodist leaders were the brothers Christopher and George Michael Frye, both of whom were lay preachers; and at their home on the northeast corner of Cork and Cameron Streets frequent meetings of the Methodist congregation were held. Another vigorous leader was George Reed (1766-1849), a coppersmith by trade and at one time mayor of the town. Records indicate that the business meetings of the BALTIMORE CONFERENCE for the year 1805 were held in an upper room in his home at the southeast corner of Braddock and Piccadilly Streets. Another of the fathers of Winchester Methodism was James Wall (1767-1852), a carpenter and a local preacher, who in the words of one who knew him, "spent his energies trying to do all the good he could . . . and labored for forty years as a minister of the gospel and was a zealous and good man."

By 1844 the Winchester Methodist Church was able to record some substantial achievements: a SUNDAY SCHOOL of forty-two teachers and 300 scholars; also "a house of worship, which is in good repair; a brick parsonage building purchased in 1840 at a cost of $1,500; a graveyard which has been enclosed with a good fence." (Quarles, p. 40.) The church records of this year also report that there was "a house of worship for our colored people, in good order and free of debt." In 1843 the pastor's salary was $249.70; in 1850 it was $400.

By 1853 a new and larger church was needed and a lot was purchased at the northwest corner of Cameron and Cork Streets. This church was completed and dedicated on May 20, 1855. It was to be called Market Street Church. The old church building was sold to become a female school, sponsored by the church and known as the Valley Female Institute. During the Civil War this building was used almost continuously as a hospital, known as the York Hospital from the name of Sidney P. York, a Methodist preacher who had been the head of the school. After the War the building was purchased by Silas Billings, a Presbyterian minister, who operated there for many years a girls' school known as Fairfax Hall.

The new church had scarcely been completed before a dispute arose among its members over the seating in the church of the young ladies attending the Valley Female Institute. This trivial disagreement caused thirty members of the congregation to withdraw and to organize a separate church. This splinter movement was led by William R. Denny, the father of Bishop COLLINS DENNY. The separatist congregation purchased a lot at the southwest corner of Braddock and Wolfe Streets in October 1855, and in July 1859 the new Braddock Street Church was dedicated.

A more serious division in Winchester came with the coming of the Civil War. The old Baltimore Conference of the M.E. Church had its boundaries cut by the battle lines of the War. The local churches south of the line formed a Conference at ALEXANDRIA, which was later to go into the VIRGINIA CONFERENCE of the M.E. Church, South. As a result of the tensions and strong feelings of the time, many additional members of the Market Street Church moved to the Braddock Street Church, so that by 1865 the membership of the former church had been reduced by two thirds.

Both churches, but especially the Braddock Street Church, suffered severe damages during the War. The Braddock Street Church was used by Union forces as a hospital and for other purposes whenever the Union Army was in possession of the town. As a result, the church had practically to be rebuilt after the War. In 1904 the Federal Government acknowledged a claim for damages done to this church by Union troops, amounting to $2,650. The Market Street Church was also paid the sum of $1,750 by the Federal Government for similar damages.

The two Winchester churches mentioned above have been served by many distinguished ministers. Winchester, sometimes called the "Capital of the Valley" (Shenandoah), has always been a strong preaching point. Among those serving Winchester Circuit as it first was, were JACOB GRUBER (1805); Seely Bunn (1811-12); James Reed (1823-24); and after it became a station, NORVAL WILSON, the father of Bishop A. W. WILSON, served it from 1838-39; JOHN S. MARTIN, 1852-53; and in later years many prominent ministers of the Old Baltimore Conference of the M.E. Church, South.

In 1970 the membership of Braddock Street was 1,808, and that of Market Street was 733, Montague Avenue, 661, and Wesley, 201. These last two churches are comparatively new as compared with older churches.

Winchester has long been the seat of a presiding elder's district. The SHENANDOAH COLLEGE and Shenandoah Conservatory of Music which had been brought to Winchester from Dayton, Va., in 1960, and which had been related to the E.U.B. CHURCH up to that time, became related to The United Methodist Church after the E.U.B.-Methodist Union in 1968.

WINDSOR, New South Wales, Australia. In 1815 this was a growing settlement where the Governor had a residence. A class formed by Edward Eagar had been meeting before SAMUEL LEIGH paid his first visit to the township. In 1820 it was divided from Sydney with BENJAMIN CARVOSSO as resident minister. A chapel had been built in 1818 to be replaced by a new church in 1838. The circuit included Castlereagh, Penrith and the Lower Hawkesbury until the Penrith Circuit was formed in 1860, and the Lower Hawkesbury Circuit in 1866. (The latter had been independent of Windsor previously for a short period, 1838-42.) The town of Richmond has always been part of the Windsor Circuit. From descendants of Methodist pioneers in the Hawkesbury River Circuit have come a number of noted ministers of the Australasian Church.

WINFIELD, AUGUSTUS R. (1822-1887), American minister and a leader in ARKANSAS Methodism, was born in Sussex County, Va., Oct. 27, 1822. He studied and practiced law before entering the ministry. He joined the MEMPHIS CONFERENCE (MES), in 1846, but transferred to Arkansas in 1849. His first appointment in Arkansas was Batesville, and his last appointment, except for the editorship of the Arkansas Methodist, was the church in LITTLE ROCK which now bears his name. The church was named Winfield Memorial Church in 1888, but since 1946 it has been known simply as the Winfield Methodist Church. It has been for many years one of the great churches of Arkansas Methodism.

Winfield was also pastor of what is now First Church, Little Rock; First Church, Fort Smith, and First Church, Hot Springs and Camden; he was twice PRESIDING ELDER of the Little Rock District, and of the Camden District, and once of the Arkadelphia District. During the War between the States he was CHAPLAIN in the Confederate States Army, and was active in some of Arkansas Methodism's early efforts in the field of education.

He was six times a delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCE of the M.E. Church, South—1858, 1866, 1870, 1874, 1878, and 1886; in 1858 he was one of the youngest men ever to represent Arkansas Methodism in the General Conference.

He died Dec. 26, 1887, after forty-one years of service in the Methodist ministry. He is buried in Little Rock.

WINIATA, MAHARAIA (1912-1960), New Zealand Methodist and prominent Maori leader from Tauranga, was trained for the ministry at Trinity College (1937-39), but withdrew before ordination to enter the teaching profession. However, his interest in the Methodist Church did not slacken, and for the rest of his life he held the status of "honorary home missionary." While on the staff of Wesley College, Paerata, he influenced three young Maoris to enter the ministry. Later he became a Maori tutor with the Adult Education Service of the University of AUCKLAND.

In 1952, he was granted a Nuffield Fellowship, which enabled him to visit Great Britain. He gained a Ph.D. of Edinburgh University—the first Maori ever to gain this degree from a British university. His thesis, The Role of the Leader in Maori Society, was published by the University of Edinburgh in 1966. His wide interests led him to visit both the world headquarters of Moral Rearmament at Mackinac Island in the United States, and the People's Republic of CHINA. His death at the early age of forty-eight years robbed the Maoris of a vital and trusted leader.

WINNIPEG, Manitoba, Canada. Grace Church. Methodism reached the Canadian Northwest as early as 1840, but it was not until 1868 that GEORGE YOUNG began Methodist services in a log building in Fort Garry. This settlement, soon to merge with Winnipeg, the capital of the province of Manitoba created in 1870, was at that time a collection of about fifty houses and a few hundred citizens. As a result of Young's vigorous efforts, Wesley Hall was opened in December 1868, and in September 1871, the first Grace Church was put in use. Five years later it was enlarged; and was reopened in 1877.

In 1883, as the city grew in size, a new Grace Church was built, and was dedicated by Young on September 30. By this date, the Grace Church congregation had become the center of Methodism in Winnipeg, in Manitoba, and in the Northwest generally. Through its efforts, Zion, Wesley, McDougall Memorial, Young and Broadway churches were established between 1874 and 1906. Under its auspices, the first regular Methodist conference in the West was held, and from it would come much of the inspiration for the development of Methodism in the western provinces. From its membership, too, would come the founders of Wesley (UNITED) COLLEGE. In the Church the first significant move towards church union in the west was made. Grace and the other Winnipeg churches learned to deal effectively, too, with the complex challenges presented by the multi-racial society of twentieth-century Winnipeg.

Since 1925, Grace Church has continued as Grace United Church, embodying in its life and tradition the historic strands of Methodism and Presbyterianism in Manitoba.

WINSTON, W. RIPLEY (1847-1918), British Methodist missionary pioneer in BURMA, was born at Preston, England, June 18, 1847, and entered the Wesleyan ministry in 1872. He went to CEYLON in 1876 and began a girls' high school at Point Pedro in 1878, an experience which confirmed his belief in the value of education as a missionary agency. In 1886 Burma was annexed by Britain, and in 1887 he went with J. M. Brown of CALCUTTA to report on missionary possibilities. He remained in Burma, 1887-1904, beginning work first at Mandalay, 1887. Evangelists from Ceylon, trained to work among Buddhists, were introduced as agents, and almost immediately at Mandalay and Pokokku Winston opened girls' boarding schools with effective results. Work has always been slow in Burma, but Winston is noteworthy as beginning work among lepers. Believing that people must be treated as if they had bodies as well as souls, he opened, with sharp criticism from the missionary secretaries, the first ward of the Leper Asylum at Mandalay, 1890. He returned to work in England in 1904 and died Nov. 26, 1918.

WINSTON-SALEM, NORTH CAROLINA, U.S.A., an industrial and manufacturing city is situated in the north-west section of the Carolina Piedmont.

Salem (the old town) was settled by the MORAVIANS from PENNSYLVANIA in 1766. Salem College for young women, established by these people, is one of the oldest institutions for girls in the United States. Old Salem, now being restored, is one of the show places in the Southeast. Following the Civil War, the town of Winston grew up just north of Salem, and in 1913 the two towns were united, thus the name Winston-Salem.

FRANCIS ASBURY came into this general area in the later years of the eighteenth century, preaching at near-by settlements and establishing missions. Love's Chapel, eight miles away at Walkertown, is a flourishing church of his labors. One of the original Methodist congregations of Forsyth County was formed at the home of John Doub a few miles west of Winston-Salem, and is still called Doub's Chapel. The first known congregation within the present limits of the city was called Old Jerusalem Church. From this group grew city-wide Methodism as we know it today. The first large society of Methodists was called Centenary, being formed 100 years after the CHRISTMAS CONFERENCE at BALTIMORE.

There are twenty-three other Methodist churches in the city. Among them are Ardmore, Burkhead, Central Terrace, Green Street, St. Paul's, Wesley Memorial, Mt. Tabor, Trinity, Ogburn Memorial, and Maple Springs, at the gate of Wake Forest College (a Baptist institution). Many Methodist Conferences have been held in the various churches in Winston-Salem, and various bishops and church leaders have spoken from these pulpits, both white and colored. LEE F. TUTTLE, now executive secretary of World Methodism, was formerly superintendent of the Winston-Salem District.

Winston-Salem is the location of the Children's Home, a flourishing Methodist orphanage caring for 400 children. Wake Forest University, a Baptist institution of higher education, is also an important part of Winston-Salem. Winston-Salem College, operated by the state of North Carolina for Negroes, is also located there, to say nothing of a number of other schools of arts and sciences.

Centenary Methodist Church had its beginning in the year 1834 under a mulberry tree where a few people met for worship until they erected the first frame building and called it "Old Jerusalem Church." The little society grew until in the year 1886 a large brick church was erected on Liberty Street near the heart of the growing town. This was named Centenary after the first 100 years of Methodism dating from the Christmas Conference at Baltimore. In 1930 the cornerstone for the present building was laid on West Fifth Street, uniting old Centenary and a younger church called West End. The new structure, cathedral-like in appointments and costing in the range of $2,500,000, is now one of the noteworthy churches in American Methodism. The membership has grown through the years into a congregation of 3,272 in 1970, among whom are some of the leading business and professional men of the growing city.

Centenary Church has given of its resources to every religious, charitable, and humanitarian cause, its annual budget at this writing exceeds $400,000. It was instrumental in establishing Ardmore Church, next in size, as well as a dozen other congregations in and around Winston-Salem. The Children's Home with its 400 orphans in the city is a direct benefaction of Centenary. The Goodwill Industry was brought to the city by the support of this church, now one of the finest in the South. Wake Forest University, a Baptist institution, was relocated in the city by the strong support of Centenary men and women. Salem College, a Moravian institution for young women, has greatly benefitted by Centenary people.

James A. Gray, leading industrialist and official of Centenary Church, donated $2,000,000 to various Methodist colleges in North Carolina, as well as to the state university. ALASKA METHODIST COLLEGE and the International Christian University of JAPAN have received generous gifts from members of this congregation. Centenary's support of missions would make a story in itself, and today the church is represented in various parts of the world by its own missionaries.

A staff of twenty-eight paid workers carries on the services of this congregation. Among the pastors who have served modern Centenary have been GILBERT T. ROWE, CHARLES CLINTON WEAVER (who led in the building of the present gothic structure), G. Ray Jordan, Walter A. Stansbury, Mark Depp, who served sixteen years as pastor, W. KENNETH GOODSON, elected a bishop in 1964 when pastor of Centenary, Charles P. Bowles, and Ernest A. Fitzgerald.

Children's Home, Inc., is an institution founded and operated by the Western North Carolina Conference of The United Methodist Church. At its annual session held in Salisbury, N. C., in 1907, the Conference decided to build such an institution—a Children's Home—and elected a board of trustees. The certificate of incorporation was filed in Raleigh, N. C., on June 12, 1908. On Sept. 1, 1909, the Children's Home was formally opened, admitting as the first child an eleven-year-old girl.

According to its charter the Home "shall have for its object the support, care, and training of indigent and orphan children of the white race." In a meeting in Winston-Salem on Oct. 7, 1913, the Board of Trustees amended the by-laws, and the following statement was included: "Destitute children who are deprived of support and protection by death of their parents, or otherwise, not above the age of fourteen years, and who are sound in mind and body may be admitted into the Home by the superintendent with the approval of the committee on admissions." In 1958 the age limitation was removed and any child who has not reached high school graduation may be admitted; and in 1964 the constitution and by-laws were amended by eliminating any reference to race.

The major phase of the work is that carried in the institutional setting. Schooling in grades one through nine is provided by a school located on the Home campus, but operated under the supervision of the Winston-Salem-Forsyth County Schools. Children's Home students in grades ten, eleven, and twelve attend the Richard J. Reynolds High School.

While it has been generally accepted that all young people leave the Home on graduation from high school, the institution feels strongly that its guidance and assistance should extend beyond that time. A growing percentage of the graduates are continuing their training beyond high school. Careful attention is given to planning for this with the young people before their separation from the Home. Persons qualified to guide them are assigned the responsibility for such planning. This applies also to those going immediately into jobs. Financial assistance is given, always with an attempt to develop on the part of the young person a feeling of responsibility and obligation.

There are presently sixteen cottages housing the children. The plant assets are listed at an evaluation of near $5,000,000 and total assets are over $8,000,000.

WISCONSIN, U.S.A., estimated 1967 population 4,188,000 is a north central state which is bounded on the north by Lake Superior and the upper peninsula of MICHIGAN, on the east by Lake Michigan, on the south by ILLINOIS, and on the west by the Mississippi River and MINNESOTA. The first European to visit the Wisconsin area was Jean Nicolet in 1634. French explorers and missionaries followed, and the land became a part of New France. France surrendered the territory to Britain in 1760, and that country ceded it to the United States in 1783, though the British were not completely dislodged until 1815. A part of the Northwest Territory, Wisconsin became a territory in 1836 and was admitted to the Union in 1848.

Known as America's Dairyland, Wisconsin leads in the production of milk and cheese; eighty per cent of its farms are dairy farms. Farm receipts exceed one billion dollars annually. However, the amount added by manufacturing is now over six billion per year. The state produces machinery, food products, transportation equipment, and, since one-half the land is in forests, much pulp and paper. There are forty institutions of higher learning in Wisconsin.

Some Methodist services were held in Wisconsin as early as 1826 by Samuel Ryan, commander at Fort Howard, Green Bay, but the M.E. Church did not officially begin work in the region until 1832. Some civilized Indians had moved from New York state and settled at Green Bay. Consequently the committee on missions in the 1832 General Conference recommended "the extension of the aboriginal missions in the Western and Northwestern frontiers." JOHN CLARK, a delegate from the New York Conference, then offered himself as a missionary to Green Bay and was accepted, and the appointments of his conference for that year read, "John Clark, appointed missionary to Green Bay." Clark arrived at Green Bay on July 21, 1832, soon organized the first Methodist class in Wisconsin, and proceeded to establish missions among the Indians. Within two months he had erected a log building 30 by 24 feet which served as both a church and a school.

Three months after Clark's arrival in Wisconsin, the ILLINOIS CONFERENCE appointed John T. Mitchell to the Galena Mission. From Galena Mitchell extended his work into Platteville and several other points in Wisconsin. In December 1833, Mitchell organized a Methodist society with six members at Platteville and dedicated a meeting-house there.

Immigration in the vicinity of what is now Milwaukee began in the spring of 1835. That fall the Milwaukee and Fox River Missions appeared in the appointments of the Chicago District of the Illinois Conference. In 1836 there were three Wisconsin appointments in the Galena District—Mineral Point, Platteville, and Prairie du Chien Mission—and two in the Chicago District—Milwaukee Station and Green Bay Mission. In 1837 the Milwaukee District was created with seven appointments, while the work in west Wisconsin continued in the Galena District.

In 1840 the ROCK RIVER CONFERENCE was organized to include northern Illinois, Wisconsin and Iowa. The conference met in August, continued the Milwaukee District, and organized a Platteville District with nine charges. The next year the two districts reported 1,491 members.

The 1848 GENERAL CONFERENCE created the WISCONSIN CONFERENCE to include Wisconsin and most of Minnesota. The conference met at Kenosha, Wis., in July, organized four districts, and made appointments to fifty-seven charges with 6,943 members. Also, the conference appointed William H. Sampson as principal of the preparatory department of Lawrence Institute. The school, started in 1847, proved a landmark of progress for Wisconsin Methodism. In 1849 the conference formed a Minnesota Mission District with four charges.

In 1856 both the Minnesota and WEST WISCONSIN CONFERENCES were carved out of the Wisconsin Conference. The MINNESOTA CONFERENCE included the state of Minnesota and northwest Wisconsin, while the southwest part of Wisconsin became the West Wisconsin Conference. In 1855 the Wisconsin Conference had eight districts, 133 charges, and 14,482 white and 185 Indian members. The division of the territory into three conferences in 1856 placed about 1,800 members in the Minnesota Conference, 6,000 in the West Wisconsin Conference, and 8,000 in the Wisconsin Conference.

In 1860 the Northwest Wisconsin Conference was formed by merging part of the West Wisconsin Conference with most of that part of the Minnesota Conference which was in the state of Wisconsin. The part of Wisconsin along Lake Superior was placed in the Detroit Conference for the next eight years. Never large, the Northwest Wisconsin Conference continued for only eight years. It began with two districts, twenty-seven charges, 1,771 members. At its last session in 1867 it reported three districts, thirty-nine charges, and 2,796 members. In 1868 it was absorbed by the West Wisconsin Conference.

There was some foreign language work in Wisconsin

Methodism. At different times both the Wisconsin and West Wisconsin Conferences had a Norwegian District. In 1880 the Norwegian churches became a part of the Northwest Norwegian (later Norwegian-Danish) Conference. The first German churches in Wisconsin were attached to the Chicago German District of the ROCK RIVER CONFERENCE. Later they were in the Northern German Conference. Swedish churches in Wisconsin became a part of the Northwest Swedish Conference.

After the absorption of the Northwest-Wisconsin Conference, the Wisconsin and West Wisconsin Conferences continued intact. In 1961 the name of the Wisconsin Conference was changed to the EAST WISCONSIN CONFERENCE.

From the beginning Methodism grew steadily in Wisconsin. The two conferences reported 23,655 members in 1870, some 41,467 in 1900, and 83,268 in 1939. Other marks of growth were the continued progress of LAWRENCE UNIVERSITY and the establishment of a number of service institutions in the state, such as: the MILWAUKEE Deaconess Home in 1893, the Bellin Memorial Hospital at Green Bay in 1908, Methodist Hospital at Madison, Lakeside Methodist Hospital at Sparta, Morrow Memorial Home for the Aged at Sparta, Schmitt Methodist Home at Richland Center, the Elmore Home for the Aged at Milwaukee which in 1956 was succeeded by Methodist Manor, Incorporated, GOODWILL INDUSTRIES and Northcott Neighborhood House in Milwaukee, four camps for youth, and WESLEY FOUNDATIONS at the state institutions of higher learning.

Since 1944 Wisconsin Methodism has constituted an episcopal area with the bishop's residence in Madison. In 1968 the two Wisconsin Conferences reported six districts, 292 charges, 387 ministers, 134,650 members, property valued at $71,417,136, and some $10,255,136 raised for all purposes during the year.

WISCONSIN CONFERENCE (ME), was organized at Kenosha, Wis., July 12, 1848 with Bishop THOMAS A. MORRIS presiding. The conference was formed by dividing the ROCK RIVER Conference. At the outset its territory included Wisconsin and most of Minnesota. The conference began with four districts, fifty-seven charges, and 6,943 members. (See WISCONSIN for beginnings of Methodism in the state.)

In 1856 the territory of the Wisconsin Conference was limited to about the eastern half of the state by the formation of both the MINNESOTA and WEST WISCONSIN CONFERENCES and there was little if any change in its boundaries thereafter. The name was changed to the EAST WISCONSIN CONFERENCE at the session held in West Allis, May 25-28, 1961, Bishop RALPH T. ALTON presiding.

From the beginning the Wisconsin Conference was interested in reform. In 1850 it heartily approved a stringent liquor law, and the members pledged themselves against the use of tobacco by precept and example. In 1851 a committee report which mildly condemned SLAVERY did not reach the floor because some opposed conference discussion of the subject. The next year, however, the conference adopted a resolution condemning slavery, protesting the fugitive slave law, and calling for alteration of the Discipline so as to prevent slaveholders from becoming members of the church, and also to require those holding slaves to free them if the law allowed. The resolutions against slavery became stronger each year. The conference favored the so-called "new chapter" on slavery which was adopted by the 1860 M.E. GENERAL CONFERENCE. Long afterward the conference journal for 1968 included a long report from its boards of Christian social concerns and social action making strong pronouncements on the subjects of peace and world order, alcohol and the general welfare, and human relations and economic affairs.

The Wisconsin Conference stood for education. Lawrence Institute was established at Appleton in 1847, one year before the conference was organized. At its first session the conference appointed William H. Sampson as principal of the preparatory department at Lawrence. In its 1853 session the conference, after a progress report on Lawrence College, adopted a resolution pledging each minister in charge of a circuit or station to preach or cause to be preached a sermon on education at each principal appointment at least once a year. In 1860 the conference promised to raise money for GARRETT BIBLICAL INSTITUTE. In 1910 Lawrence College was commended, and it was noted that thirty of its 700 students were preparing for the ministry. Garrett, BOSTON, and DREW seminaries were praised, and the report of the conference board of education insisted that more must be done for the denomination's schools for white youths in the mountains and other parts of the South. Also, in 1910 the board asked that an apportionment of $800 be laid on the churches to assist the Methodist pastor at the state university in Madison. Today LAWRENCE UNIVERSITY has an endowment of $21,000,000, a plant valued at $17,000,000, and a student body of 1,300. While no longer the sole property of the conference, the institution is closely related to the church.

Through the years other institutions related to the Wisconsin Conference were developed. In 1893 the Milwaukee Deaconess Home was established in Milwaukee by Methodist women, aided by generous gifts from Mrs. R. P. Elmore. Some 135 deaconesses trained in the home have served as parish workers, visiting nurses, evangelists, and matrons in homes for young and elderly women. The Deaconess Home sponsored the development of the Asbury Girls' Club, the Traveler's Aid of Milwaukee, the Elmore Home for the Aged, Grant Hall for young business women, and Methodist Manor (incorporated in 1956). Some activities of the Deaconess Home have been discontinued as time has passed, but the corporation itself is still intact.

Bellin Memorial Hospital was established at Green Bay in 1908 through the work of two Methodist deaconess nurses who came from CINCINNATI. Title to the hospital was transferred to the conference in 1929, since which time important additions to the institution have been made. In 1919 the Summerfield Church, Milwaukee, helped to establish Goodwill Industries in the state.

In 1968 the East Wisconsin Conference had two additional homes for the aged: Cedar Rest at Janesville, and Evergreen Manor at West Allis. There were two camps: Asbury Acres at Almond, and Camp Byron at Brownsville.

The conference gave almost $140,000 for higher education in 1968, some $20,000 of it going to Garrett Theological Seminary. Also, contributions were made to KENDALL COLLEGE in Chicago and to WILEY COLLEGE, Marshall, Texas. The conference maintains five Wesley Foundations in Wisconsin.

In 1968 the East Wisconsin Conference reported four districts—Fond Du Lac, Green Bay, Janesville, and Milwaukee—164 charges, 244 ministers, 81,478 members, property valued at $50,550,561, and a total raised for all purposes during the year of $7,246,714.

WISCONSIN CONFERENCE (EUB) traced its origin to the time when UNITED BRETHREN missionaries, representing the Wabash Conference, came from ILLINOIS to WISCONSIN as early as 1842. Work progressed so that on May 12, 1857, the GENERAL CONFERENCE of the Church of the United Brethren in Christ, in session at CINCINNATI, Ohio, authorized the formation of the Wisconsin Conference. This organization was effected Sept. 16, 1858, in the Rutland Church in Dane County. Bishop LEWIS DAVIS was the chairman. Thirteen of the fifteen ministers were present. Conference membership was 609. After the first year the membership had increased to 1,447. From 1861 to 1885, the state was divided into two conferences. One part, called the Fox River Mission Conference, was north of a line running from Sheboygan west to the Mississippi River. The territory south of this line was called the Wisconsin Conference. At its highest church membership, the Fox River Conference numbered 639 persons in 1877. In 1885 the two conferences were reunited and the Wisconsin Conference again covered the entire state.

John Lutz, a missionary of the EVANGELICAL ASSOCIATION from the Ohio Conference, came to Wisconsin in 1840. Others followed him. It was not, however, until the General Conference of 1855 that authorization was given for the formation of the Wisconsin Conference. Acting on this decision, the Illinois Conference in session at Freeport, Ill., April 19, 1856, under the chairmanship of Bishop JOHN SEYBERT created the Wisconsin Conference. Twenty-one ministers were assigned to eight missions, seven circuits, and one station with a combined membership of 1,490. The Conference was divided into two districts with two presiding elders. The first regular session of the Wisconsin Conference was held in Zion Church, Helenville, May 6-11, 1857 with Bishop John Seybert presiding. C. A. Schnacke was Secretary. By this time there were twenty-nine ministers with a membership of 2,004. The entire state of Wisconsin has been the geographical boundary of the conference through the years.

Following the union of The EVANGELICAL CHURCH and the Church of the United Brethren in Christ in 1946, the Wisconsin Conference, (EV) and Wisconsin Conference, (UB) united to form the Wisconsin Conference of The E.U.B. Church at Monroe, Wis., May 17, 1951. The German language was used in some churches until 1947, when English became universal. In 1967 there were three districts and three conference superintendents with a membership of 25,951 and a Sunday school enrollment of 17,404.

At the Dallas Uniting Conference, April 1968, the conference became a part of The United Methodist Church. The three Wisconsin Conferences (East Wisconsin and West Wisconsin of the former Methodist Church, and the Wisconsin Conference of The E.U.B. Church) were united Jan. 1, 1970, to form the Wisconsin Conference of The United Methodist Church.

WISEMAN, FREDERICK LUKE (1858-1944), son of LUKE H. WISEMAN, was born at York in 1858, and entered the Wesleyan Methodist ministry in 1881, training at DIDS-BURY COLLEGE, Manchester. He was best remembered as a robust evangelistic preacher. Most of his lengthy ministry was spent in the service of the HOME MISSIONS DEPARTMENT, of which he was secretary 1913-39, after over twenty years in the BIRMINGHAM Mission. He was elected president of the Wesleyan conference in 1912, of the National Free Church Council in 1914, and of the newly united Methodist Church in 1933. Wiseman was a keen musician, and was chairman of the committee which prepared the Methodist Hymn Book of 1933, in which eleven of his tunes appear. He died Feb. 12, 1944.

LUKE H. WISEMAN

WISEMAN, LUKE HORT (1822-1875), British Methodist, was born at Norwich on Jan. 19, 1822, the son of Samuel Wiseman, an agent of the BRITISH AND FOREIGN BIBLE SOCIETY. He entered the Wesleyan Methodist ministry in 1840 and was trained at RICHMOND Theological College, London. He served in many circuits, and in 1868 he was appointed to the Wesleyan Mission House as one of the secretaries of the society. He brought with him a passionate love of the missionary cause which had been fostered by early connection with the Bible Society and the Anti-Slavery Association. He served at the Mission House until 1874; in 1872 he was elected as president of the Wesleyan Methodist Conference. His writings included Thoughts on Class Meetings and their Improve- ment (1854); Christ in the Wilderness (1857); Men of Faith (1870). He died in London on Feb. 3, 1875.

JOHN KENT

WITHROW, WILLIAM HENRY (1839-1908), Canadian Methodist minister and writer, was born in TORONTO, Aug. 6, 1839. He was educated in Toronto schools and took his undergraduate training at VICTORIA COLLEGE and the University of Toronto. He was ordained by the New Connexion Conference in 1865 and spent five years in its ministry before transferring in 1866 to the Wesleyan Methodist Church.

When the Methodist Church was formed in 1874, he became editor of the Canadian Methodist Magazine and of the Sunday school periodicals, a post which he held for thirty-four years. The Magazine appeared as a monthly from 1875 to 1906. In its time it was one of Canada's most noteworthy periodicals. In its pages one could always find a balanced mixture of religious information, general comment on events, pen portraits of prominent Methodists, essays, and tolerant reviews. Withrow had a keen interest in literature and archaeology, both of which were well illustrated in the Magazine.

As religious editor for the church, Withrow prepared twenty-seven periodicals on a quarterly basis. During his years in office, the circulation rose from 46,000 to 400,000. These publications were characterized by a strong interest in temperance, social reform, and missions, and by the same concern for literary standards as in the Methodist Magazine.

Apart from his regular periodical contributions, Withrow published The Catacombs of Rome (1874), an important study of the early church; A Popular History of the Dominion of Canada (1877), marked by "high patriotism and intelligent piety"; a novel entitled The King's Messenger (1879); and Barbara Heck: A Tale of Early Methodism (1895).

Despite his heavy editorial responsibilities, Withrow was for many years a CLASS LEADER. In this, as in other activities, he gained the enduring respect and affection of his associates for his kindness, generosity, and deep interest in others. He was honored in many ways, including the award of a D.D. by Victoria (1882), and a fellowship in the Royal Society of Canada, but undoubtedly he was most delighted with the joys of his work, and his friendships. Withrow died in Toronto, Nov. 12, 1908.

WITNESS OF THE SPIRIT is a Christian doctrine traditionally emphasized by Methodist teaching that, by direct experience and practical evidence, God the Holy Spirit enables the Christian to know that he is rightly related to God in Christ. He is assured of his forgiveness and acceptance with God, and consciously enjoys a sense of divine fellowship. His present experience is a foretaste and guarantee of his ultimate destiny.

Natural Bases for Assurance. A sense of assurance and security seem to be essential for wholesome human life. Education and experience develop the natural abilities of man to cope with his environment and thus support his feeling of self-reliance. Various forms of social acceptance and approval give a sense of the meaning and worth of life. But when these or other witnesses to our worth are lacking, life can become intolerable.

Above all, man must have assurance in the ultimate dimension of life, his relationship to God. The happy pagan may accept the natural witnesses noted above as adequate evidence of his acceptance with whatever gods may be. He may give a token of his good will toward God through observing some form of religion. Thus for a time he may have few fears, for he lives in a fool's paradise of ignorance of God and thus of his own true situation.

The Witness of Conscience and the Law. Probably no one can long remain in such a state of pseudosecurity. The inescapable testimony of conscience points to a moral obligation beyond us. Failure to avoid a sense of disapproval from within, especially when reinforced by sanctions of law, inevitably leads to a sense of guilt and fear, i.e., the loss of assurance. The natural witnesses to well-being are inadequate to support a feeling of security. The more clearly man's obligation is seen to be toward his Creator, and the more seriously he undertakes to achieve right relationship to him through obedience to the moral law, the more do guilty fear and remorse destroy his false peace. Strong determination, noble devotion to high ideals and heroic efforts to do the right simply enhance the infinite obligation. Thus man's struggle to secure himself before God issues in defeat, bondage, and despair. Legalism, the attempt to gain assurance through the witness of the law, is probably the greatest single source of insecurity in religion.

The classic account of the struggle of a sincere man to achieve the consciousness of right standing before God through obedience to law is vividly portrayed by Paul in Romans 7. Knowledge of moral responsibility revealed by God's law destroyed his dreaming innocence, convicted him as a sinner, and imposed upon him a holy, but infinite demand which he found impossible to fulfill. Peace was turned into inner conflict, frustration, and defeat. In despair he cried, "Wretched man that I am! Who will deliver me from this body of death?" (vs. 24).

Wesley's Experience. John Wesley, the father of Methodism, tried to follow this path of legalism in the footsteps of men like Paul, Augustine, and Luther. His early life may be described as an intensive search for assurance before God. He was morally upright, at least "not being so bad as other people." He was favorable toward religion and observed its forms, e.g., reading the Bible, attending church and saying his prayers. He became a clergyman, and devoted himself intensively to inward and outward holiness, including sacrificial service to others. Yet all this gave him no "comfort or any assurance of acceptance with God." (Journal, May 24, 1738.)

Finally Wesley undertook an arduous mission to America in the hope of "saving his soul" and finding peace with God. This effort also failed. However, on the voyage, he came into contact with some Moravian Christians who manifested the very assurance he lacked. Back in England he was amazed at the "new gospel" of the Moravian, Peter Böhler, that the fruits of faith are "dominion over sin, and constant peace from a sense of forgiveness." (Ibid.) He concluded that he had no faith, yet he continued seeking, although "with strange indifference, dullness, and coldness, and unusually frequent lapses into sin." (Ibid.)

In the light of this account, the focus of Wesley's famous Aldersgate experience is clearly on the crucial change from the bondage and fear of legalism to the peace and assurance of faith. He wrote,

In the evening I went very unwillingly to a society in Aldersgate street, where one was reading Luther's preface to the Epistle to the Romans. About a quarter before nine, while he was describing the change which God works in the heart through faith in Christ, I felt my heart strangely warned. I felt I did trust in Christ, Christ alone for my salvation: and an assurance was given me, (italics added) that he had taken away my sins, even mine, and saved me from the law of sin and death. (Ibid.)

Methodist Emphasis. It is not strange then that Wesley made central in his preaching the assurance of salvation through faith, and held the witness of the Spirit to be a distinguishing doctrine of his movement. Probably no single aspect of the Christian faith has been more distinctively the genius of Methodism. The emphasis in early Methodist preaching on present experience and personal knowledge of God's grace doubtless goes far to explain the enormous popularity of this revival movement. In contrast to the vague, formal worship of the absentee God of Deism, the common people heard gladly the proclamation of the privilege of every believer to realize a personal, vital fellowship with the living God, immanent in the Holy Spirit. Even the doctrine of predestination, which provides some comfort and hope of future salvation through the divine decrees, falls short of the Methodist emphasis on the assurance of forgiveness now. (See: PERSEVERANCE, FINAL.)

We turn now to an exposition of the doctrine of the witness of the Spirit. The scriptural statement of it is found in Romans 8:14-16, which is set in significant contrast to the despair of chapter seven. "For all who are led by the Spirit of God are sons of God. For you did not receive the spirit of slavery to fall back into fear, but you have received the spirit of sonship. When we cry, 'Abba! Father!' it is the Spirit himself bearing witness with our spirit that we are the children of God."

Spirit and Holy Spirit. The term "spirit" requires some careful definition. In his sermon on "The Witness of our Own Spirit" (XI), Wesley seems to identify the human spirit with conscience. This he defines broadly as man's consciousness of himself in his present experience and reflection on the past, with the special faculty of evaluating and judging his behavior, motives, and all things as they relate to him. While Wesley's analysis is not complete, his suggestion is important. The dimension of purpose, volition and destiny is surely characteristic of man as a spiritual being. Thus the spirit of man is not some part of man, even the highest part, in contrast to some supposed "lower nature," but rather the total man in his ultimate and noblest aspects of meaning and relationship.

From this definition it follows that any true witness of the human spirit must be more than an emotional reaction or rational conclusion, for these are partial. Also the human spirit is not an independent faculty. Since man as spirit is concerned with the total meaning of life, especially in regard to his relationship to God, his knowledge is necessarily evoked by that relationship. As the sundial indicates the hour only when it is properly oriented and when the sun shines upon it, so the spirit of man bears witness to his true status only when rightly related to God, and when the Spirit of God enlightens him (Sermon X, ii, 3-9). Man is the creature of God, and his knowledge of his significance, relationship and destiny is possible only in the light of the revelation of the Creator.

Who or what then is the Spirit of God or the Holy Spirit who witnesses with our spirit? Any adequate answer to this question would require a detailed study of Biblical and other sources. However, for our present purpose, a few suggestions may suffice.

Perhaps the best hint is found in Paul's letter, I Corinthians 2:9-16. Here he suggests that man's own experience as spirit points to the nature of God as Spirit. Man is spiritual because he is able to know himself and realize the divine significance of his life in his supreme relationship to God. Perhaps the term, conscious personal meaning, comes nearest to a description of spirit. Thus we may venture to suggest that God the Spirit is God acting creatively in the consciousness of his own significance. In traditional terms, the Holy Spirit is the transcendent God who is immanent and immediate to human experience. With regard to the historical Christ, the New Testament seems often to identify the Holy Spirit with the risen, living Lord, present with his people.

With these suggested definitions of divine and human spirits in mind, let us summarize by way of a paraphrase of Romans 8:14-16.

(14) All whose lives are humbly and obediently yielded to God as he manifests himself directly to their consciousness are the ones who are vitally and personally related to him, and show by their lives that they belong to him. (15) You, whose lives are so guided and related, have not been dragged back into slavery, the life-orientation of legalism with its inevitable attitude of guilty fear through the bondage of an endless obligation. Rather the total meaning and relationship of your lives is that of those who have been established as free, responsible sons of God (υιοθεσίας). That glad, lilting cry, "Father!" which rises spontaneously in our consciousness, is the natural expression of a child of God. (16) The entire atmosphere of our lives is expressed in that joyous utterance inspired in us by God himself. God's personal presence, his meaning and purpose for us, his creatures, calls forth a personal identification with him in the total significance and relationship of our lives. Our highest consciousness seems infused with the divine consciousness, which gives us the assurance that we are accepted by God and vitally related to him as a child to his father.

How is the Witness Confirmed? While this consciousness of assurance may seem clear and self-authenticating to the one experiencing it, the question arises, How can one be certain he is not mistaken? We are notoriously inclined to deceive ourselves, accepting favorable witnesses and ignoring contrary evidence. In this regard also the total nature of spirit is important. The largest possible perspective provides a criterion which avoids the errors of a partial view. Thus the life of love as the fruit of faith is as surely essential for any true sense of peace with God as a feeling of security or a reasoned conclusion.

Wesley insisted that the inner experience must be corroborated by the outer life of practical ethics. The first he called the direct witness of the Holy Spirit, "an inward impression on the soul, whereby the Spirit of God directly witnesses to my spirit, that I am a child of God." The confirming, indirect witness of the spirit of man "is nearly, if not exactly, the same with the testimony of a good conscience towards God; and is the result of reason, or reflection on what we feel in our own souls. Strictly speaking it is a conclusion drawn partly from the word of God and partly from our own experience." He analyzed a good conscience, "void of offense," as necessarily including a right understanding of God's will, a true knowledge of the self, the agreement of heart and life with the rule of Scripture, and an inward perception of this agreement. We have seen that these elements are characteristics of spirit as defined above.

True, Christian confidence is always to be tested in the light of the objective revelation of the Spirit of God in the life of Christ, conveyed to us both through the record of Scripture and the immediate communication of "the mind of Christ." The believer who receives "the spirit of sonship" will manifest the ethical qualities and behavior which distinguishes a son of God under the criterion of the historical revelation of God the Son. He to whom the Spirit of God gives witness will surely bear "the fruit of the Spirit . . . love, joy, peace, patience, kindness, goodness, faithfulness, gentleness, self-control" (Gal. 5:22, 23). No one can remain in the assurance of righteousness while living in knowable unrighteousness.

Is the Witness Essential for Saving Faith? Another question remains to be considered. Is the witness of the Spirit an essential element of saving faith? Is it possible to be in right relation to God in Christ without the conscious realization of our standing?

Wesley was strongly inclined in the early days of his evangelical experience to insist that there can be no true faith in Christ without the clear testimony of the Spirit. During the return voyage from Georgia to England, he analyzed his own need, "I want that faith which none can have without knowing that he hath it." (Journal, Feb. 29, 1738.) A faith which is unconscious of the Spirit's witness seemed to him a contradiction in terms. He wrote, ". . . Every Christian believer hath a perceptible testimony of the Spirit, that he is a child of God." Yet a sharper examination of experience led him to conclude that saving faith and the Spirit's witness are not to be so closely identified. In a later letter to his brother Charles, he wrote,

Is justifying faith a sense of pardon? Negatur . . . I cannot allow that justifying faith necessarily implies such an explicit assurance of pardon, then every one who has it not, and every one so long as he has it not is under the wrath and curse of God. But this is a supposition contrary to Scripture, as well as to experience . . . How can a sense of our having received pardon be the condition of our receiving it? (Letters, VI, 660.)

He concluded that the Spirit's gift of assurance is "the ordinary privilege of every Christian believer." However, some live below their privileges. "Possibly some may be in favor with God, and yet go mourning all the day long" due to ignorance or illness. Such may have some degree of peace with God, yet fall short of a "full assurance of faith," which "excludes all doubt and fear." The seasoned view of his old age, gained by long study and experience, was stated in a letter, "The Methodists . . . preach assurance as we always did, as a common privilege of the children of God; but we do not enforce it, under the pain of damnation, denounced on all who do not enjoy it." (Southey, I, 295.)

Conclusion. The doctrine of the witness of the Spirit may be considered a part of the vital heart of the Christian Gospel. Man's redemption from the guilt and power of sin is thus presented, not as some abstract, legal fiction or cosmic transaction, but rather as the personal experience of reconciliation with God and the present acceptance into the fellowship of the family of God. Man's basic need for assurance and security is met by the loving word of God himself, speaking within man's highest consciousness. The realization of God's gift of eternal life is not merely in some future, heavenly existence, but is actually begun here and now. The gracious presence of God makes real in the believer's spirit and life the witness of the Spirit, the "pledge and foretaste (arrabon) of our inheritance." (Eph. 1:14, Weymouth.) Yet the believer is not allowed to presume upon this experience with a false confidence, for he is "saved from the fear, though not from the possibility, of falling away from the grace of God." WITTENMEYER, ANNIE TURNER (no dates), American reformer and social worker who was the first president of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, which was organized in Cleveland, Ohio, in 1874. During her leadership the organization was extended to all the states and membership reached 600,000 in 10,000 local unions. The insignia was the wearing of the white ribbon. The reform organization grew out of the Women's Crusade against the liquor traffic in the Middle states. In this Mrs. Wittenmeyer had a leading role. She was president of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union from 1874 until 1883, when FRANCES E. WILLARD became president.

Mrs. Wittenmeyer was born in Ohio, grew up in KENTUCKY, moved to Iowa and became the Sanitary Agent of Iowa, an appointment by the legislature. During the later years of the Civil War, she left politics to join church women in the Christian Commission. She had charge of 200 women who opened diet kitchens and prepared food for some 1,800 wounded and sick soldiers. They were cited by General ULYSSES S. GRANT for their outstanding work in alleviating suffering. After the war

Mrs. Wittenmeyer started a home for five hundred orphans of soldiers in the barracks at DAVENPORT, Iowa, which was a gift of Congress.

She then went to Philadelphia and started the Ladies' and Pastors' Union, which was approved by the General Conference (M.E.) of 1872. These ladies, with their pastors, visited 50,000 needy families and gave religious instruction as well as looking after physical needs.

It was an outgrowth of this work that Mrs. Wittenmeyer became interested in eradicating the liquor traffic, and joined the Women's national association, of which she became president. She visited many annual conferences speaking on the evils of liquor and urging temperance. She took two petitions to Congress on behalf of prohibition in 1875 and 1878. She wrote two books, Woman's Work in The Church and History of the Woman's Crusade.

WITTON, WILLIAM (1811-1886), Australian pioneer and leader. At the date of his death at Warragul on Sept. 5, 1886, William Witton had long been known and honored throughout the colony as having been one of the truest pioneer leaders of Victorian Methodism, particularly in the Southern districts.

The grandson of Joseph Witton, sometime Chaplain of the Tower of London, he was born in 1811 in the city of LONDON. His father was a merchant engaged in the West India trade and his mother was a daughter of the Rev. Mr. Lambert, a clergyman of the Church of England. Both his parents died during his childhood and he was brought up by an uncle, in whose office he began to work.

As a youth of eighteen he migrated to Hobart and a little later moved to Launceston. There he married into a Methodist family, and in 1834 was converted under the preaching of a Mr. Leach. He became a local preacher, and thereafter spent his life in devoted and outstanding Christian service. In March 1937, he and his wife went to Port Phillip where he found a handful of earnest Methodists. He became their first recognized class leader, and in his house in Lonsdale Street, regular Sunday morning services were held.

He took an active part in all matters relating to the society in the settlement, and in February 1839, with J. W. Dredge, signed the vitally important letter urging upon JOSEPH ORTON, "the appointment of an accredited Wesleyan minister for this township." Joseph Orton himself was appointed temporarily for twelve months before returning to England. During this period with the help of Witton and others, he firmly laid the foundation for future development of the Methodist Society in Victoria.

From MELBOURNE Witton went to Belfast (Port Fairy), where for three years he was employed as a missionary by the District Meeting, the whole of the Western District near the seashore being his station. He was the first Wesleyan to preach in Warrnambool and helped to establish Methodism in Port Fairy and Portland.

As his family increased, and provision had to be made for them, he became a pastoralist (that is, a station holder who raises live stock), purchasing the Hartley Station, some ten miles from Port Fairy. For thirteen years he acted as curate to the Port Fairy congregation. After leaving Hartley he was engaged in business in Port Fairy, Caramut and Kirkstall. Later in life he moved to Gippsland, and pioneered the cause at Brandy Creek, Longwarry South, Drouin and Warragul. All his days he was a pioneer, blazing trails for the Kingdom. He tramped roads, with staff in hand, preaching where and whenever opportunity was given.

He lived to take part in the Jubilee meeting in the Exhibition Building and died at Warragul in 1886. He saw the little society of seven grow into a church of more than 16,000 members and 100,000 adherents.

WITWER, SAMUEL W. (See JUDICIAL COUNCIL.)

WOFFORD, BENJAMIN (1780-1850), American preacher and philanthropist, was born in Spartanburg County, S. C., on Oct. 19, 1780. He was licensed to preach in 1804, did missionary work in KENTUCKY, served as a local DEACON, and in 1816 entered the SOUTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE. In 1820, at the conference in CHARLESTON, he located. Following his location he devoted himself to farming and later had extensive business dealings in real estate and investments. Throughout his life he maintained an active relation to the church, preaching on occasions, attending CAMP MEETINGS, and giving his time and money to causes of the church.

Wofford was an astute businessman, who by keen conception of economic values and rigid economy accumulated a fortune of $150,000, which was considered enormous in those days. His tendency toward frugality gave him the reputation in his home community of being a miser. One said of him, "He would stop to pick up a stray pin at a time when he could have tendered a check to pay for a ship's cargo of pins." However a Spartanburg Methodist layman who had been asked for a donation to RANDOLPH-MACON COLLEGE is said to have counted on Wofford's reputation for penury and so replied, "I will give as much as brother Wofford." The next day he was informed that he would have to match a gift of $1,000 which Benjamin Wofford had just subscribed.

As Wofford neared the end of his life he sought advice from a number of ministerial friends on how his money could best be used to advance the cause of Methodism. After a conference with H. A. C. Walker, he included in his will a gift of $100,000 for "the establishing and endowing a college for literary, classical, and scientific education, to be located in my native district, Spartanburg, and to be under the control and management of the conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church of my native state, South Carolina." Shortly after making this will, Benjamin Wofford died in Spartanburg, on Dec. 2, 1850. (See WOFFORD COLLEGE.)

CLARENCE CLIFFORD NORTON

WOFFORD COLLEGE, Spartanburg, South Carolina, was established by the SOUTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE pursuant to a legacy of $100,000 given by BENJAMIN WOFFORD, a local preacher of the M.E. Church, South. In 1850, the legacy represented the largest gift made by an American Methodist for religious or educational purposes. One half of this amount, which had been placed in endowment, was lost after being invested in Confederate bonds during the Civil War.

MAIN BUILDING, WOFFORD COLLEGE,
SPARTANBURG, SOUTH CAROLINA

The college was organized by the Methodist conference of SOUTH CAROLINA in 1853, and the first session began on August 1, 1854. Since that date the college has continued in growth and usefulness as a church-related institution.

Wofford is a college for men, with a strong tradition of emphasis on sound scholarship. The college has a chapter of Phi Beta Kappa, and a large number of students continue in graduate and professional schools after graduation. Ministerial education has always been a strong feature at Wofford, and the majority of the members of the South Carolina Conference are graduates of the college. It offers the B.A. and B.S. degrees. The governing board has twenty-one members: ten ministers and eleven laymen elected to two-year terms by the South CAROLINA ANNUAL CONFERENCE, on nomination of the conference Board of Education.

WOLFF, GEORGE (1736-1828), British Methodist, had the following obituary notice in the Wesleyan Methodist Magazine for 1828:

March 8th.—At Balham, in Surrey, George Wolff, Esq., formerly Consul General to the Court of Denmark, in which country he was born, in 1736. For many years he enjoyed the confidence and esteem of Mr. Wesley, of whose Will he was the last surviving executor. He was a man of great humility and ardent piety, and one of the most liberal contributors to the funds of the Methodist charities in London. He died happy in God, at the advanced aged of ninety-two years.

Wolff married the widow of Capt. John Cheesement, of Mile End Green, one of the City Road trustees, whom WESLEY buried in February 1783. Wesley described this lady as "that lovely woman" in a letter to his niece, Sally. Wolff was himself a worshipper at City Road, traveling in his carriage from Balham, a journey as the crow flies of about six miles. Wolff's main claim to fame is, as his obituary notes, being one of Wesley's executors. It was doubtless in this connection that Wesley visited him regularly in the closing years of his life. John Wesley's Diary records visits in February, June and December 1783; February, 1784; January, 1786; January, 1787; December, 1789 (with the significant comment, "I then retired to the lovely family at Balham"); January, October, November (the occasion of a christening), and December, 1790; and the last visit, Feb. 23-24, 1791. It was from Balham that Wesley was taken home to die at City Road. The house at Balham was demolished in 1912, but a photograph is contained in Wesley's published Journal (viii).

WOLLING, JAMES WILLIAM (1850-1928), American preacher and missionary to BRAZIL, was born in CHARLESTON, S. C. on Dec. 27, 1850. Feeling called to preach, he gave up his work to get an education and through the generosity of F. J. Pelzer, he was able to graduate from WOFFORD COLLEGE. After being ordained and serving several churches in SOUTH CAROLINA, he applied for missionary work and was appointed to the Brazilian Mission Conference by Bishop J. C. GRANBERY in 1886.

James Wolling remained in Brazil for twenty years, during which time he held various positions of importance both in Central and in South Brazil Conferences. He was president of the Legal Association, editor for six years of the Methodist weekly, treasurer for seven years of the mission, and was on the first committee of three named to plan for a publishing house (Imprensa Metodista), becoming its manager for many years. When JOHN M. LANDER was sent to Juiz de Fora to found GRANBERY COLLEGE (now INSTITUTO GRANBERY), Wolling went with him to help, as he already knew Portuguese.

In 1896, Wofford College conferred on him the D.D. degree. Wolling was first married in May 1878, to Lizzie McDonald Green who went with him to Brazil; but she died of yellow fever in Piracicaba, on December 27, of that same year. On Jan. 3, 1889, he married Lizzie M. Rice, in Union, S. C., by whom he had four children—Marcia, Meredith, William (who died in São Paulo), and James Spencer. Her health also failed in Brazil, so in 1907, they returned definitely to the United States. Here Wolling rejoined the South Carolina Conference in which he worked until superannuation. Mrs. Wolling died in July 1921, and Wolling married Mrs. Fannie Hilton, who survived him.

Wolling had a laborious life, performing many hard tasks in difficult places. He was brave, industrious, and a good and scholarly preacher. He died in Spartanburg County, on March 15, 1928.

WOMACK, ARTHUR WALTER (1890-1961), twenty-sixth bishop of the C.M.E. CHURCH, was born on July 10, 1890, in Halifax County, Va. He received a B.A. degree from PAINE COLLEGE and a B.D. degree from Howard University in WASHINGTON, D. C. He served churches in Washington, D. C., DETROIT, Mich; ST. LOUIS, Mo.; and INDIANAPOLIS, Ind. At the General Conference in 1950, he was elected to the office of bishop. He presided over the episcopal areas of GEORGIA, MISSISSIPPI, and LOUISIANA. Bishop Womack displayed great interest in foreign missions and made trips to Africa on behalf of his denomination.

WOMAN'S FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY (ME). The decade immediately following the close of the War Between the States saw the rise of a new interest in "foreign missions" in the M.E. Church, and the sending of missionary forces to South America, CHINA, and INDIA especially. In earlier decades, Methodist overseas missions—the concern of only a few persons in the church—had been confined to AFRICA where some freed slaves from America had been repatriated to what is now LIBERIA.

These were also years of struggle for "women's rights" in the U.S.A., years when higher education was opening to women, and years when educated women, especially, were entering the professions and taking place in social-religious-educational "movements."

It was in this atmosphere that in 1869 leading women in the M.E. Church began to consider organizing to "extend the Gospel to women by women"—somewhat paralleling the general Church's ministry to men in lands just opening to missionary efforts.

In 1870 this movement, springing up spontaneously among women of the Church, was formally organized as the "Woman's Foreign Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church." The first president was Mrs. David Patten, and the first secretary, Mrs. WILLIAM FAIRFIELD WARREN. Through seven decades the Society flourished in membership in missionaries and in funds sent abroad, and in the widening scope of its ministry. As it grew in the concern of Methodist women, "branches" of the Society were established for these areas: New England, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Cincinnati, Northwestern, Des Moines, Minneapolis, Topeka, Pacific, Columbia River. All these "branches"—conducted by women who volunteered their services because of missionary concern—were centers for the recruitment of young women for overseas careers, for education in surrounding churches, and for the securing of funds for missionary support, overseas institutions, etc. It is reported that from 1870 (when receipts were $4,546) through 1939, the total receipts of the W.F.M.S. in all its branches were $61,229,889.

With the unification of the three Methodist Churches to form The Methodist Church in 1940, the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society was one of seven agencies that coalesced to comprise the Woman's Division of Christian Service of the BOARD OF MISSIONS. From 1940 to 1965, the various services and ministries of the W.F.M.S. were kept relatively intact in the Foreign Department of the Woman's Division of Christian Service—though there was constant consultation with the Division of World Missions in order to coordinate plans and prevent overlapping of activities. In 1965 the overseas work of the Woman's Division and that of the Division of World Missions were further consolidated and are now operated under one administrative department for each major field.

On Dec. 31, 1939, the active Woman's Foreign Missionary Society missionaries numbered 498. From the date of organization to 1939, the Society had recruited, trained, and maintained on the fields a grand total of 1,572 women missionaries.

From the beginning, the ministry of the Woman's Missionary Society was intended for women and girls—a ministry to supplement that of male missionaries, a ministry that in many areas could not be given by men because of social custom. In most countries it began with schools for young girls—usually where education for girls and women was unknown or frowned upon. And from these beginnings grew high schools and colleges for girls, and in some places co-education. The compassion of the early missionaries led them to give simple medical help, and to teach some methods of sanitation in tribes and villages suffering from the sicknesses brought on by ignorance and lack of cleanliness: and soon there came to American women calls for nurses, women doctors, clinics, and hospitals in needy areas. While in the beginning preaching and the organization of churches were the realm of the male missionaries, "women of light" could not keep from telling the Gospel story where darkness was all around them: so some women missionaries were set aside as evangelists, and led many thousands of women and children to Christ. From this "necessary ministry" there grew the training of choice national women as evangelists, as Bible women, and some few missionary women as pastors. In times and areas where male reinforcements were lacking, some bishops even named W.F.M.S. missionaries as district evangelists or district superintendents. Necessity sometimes overruled the Book of Discipline!

India was the first, and for a long time the principal, field to which the W.F.M.S. gave service and personnel. Dr. CLARA SWAIN went out from America in January 1870, the first woman physician sent out by any women's missionary group. ISABELLA THOBURN, with the blessing and support of the same group, went to India to pioneer in education for women. Clara Swain organized a hospital in BAREILLY—first of a group of healing institutions established by the W.F.M.S. Isabella Thoburn began school with a few outcaste girls—and during a lifetime of service saw the development of what is now ISABELLA THOBURN COLLEGE, one of the great educational institutions of all Asia. Through the decades, the work grew in extent and in its influence upon a whole continent.

At the time of Methodist unification in the United States, the W.F.M.S. had missionaries and missionary institutions (hospitals, schools, homes, orphanages) in Africa (Angola, Southern Rhodesia, Portuguese East Africa, Algiers); in Burma; in China (Central, Foochow, West, Hinghwa, Kiangsi, North, and Yenping conferences); in India (Bengal, Bombay, Central Provinces, Gujarat, Hyderabad, Indus River, Lucknow, North India, Northwest India, and South India conferences); in Japan; in Korea; in Malaya; in Sumatra; in the Philippine Islands; in Bulgaria; in Latin America (Mexico, Argentina, Uruguay, and Peru).

WOMAN'S FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY (MP) was organized in PITTSBURGH, Pa., on Feb. 14, 1879, to promote support for the overseas mission program of the METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCH. At the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1880 the organization was recognized as a permanent agency of the church. The Society agreed to pay the salary of Miss Harriet G. Brittain, an Episcopalian who, as the first missionary to serve the M.P. Church, opened a school in Yokohama, JAPAN, in October 1880. Three years later, Dr. and Mrs. FREDERICK C. KLEIN, the first M.P. missionaries in the non-Christian world, arrived in Japan and on July 11, 1886, the first Japanese church of the denomination was organized with twelve members. Through the work of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society and the Board of Foreign Missions of the M.P. Church, Japan had, by 1928, become a well-organized Mission Conference of nineteen charges and nine missions. Nagoya College for men and boys had been founded, as well as a primary and high school for girls, six kindergartens and the Tokyo School for the Blind. The Klein-Coulborn Memorial Church, costing $20,000, was dedicated on June 26, 1927.

The Woman's Foreign Missionary Society began its work in Kalgan, CHINA, when C. S. Heininger accepted the position of missionary under the auspices of the Society on Oct. 5, 1909. Five years later the Society purchased the Kalgan property from the American Board of Foreign Missions for $9,000. This property consisted of three and one-half acres of ground, two dwelling houses, a dispensary, one school each for boys and girls, a chapel and servant's quarters. By joint agreement with the Board of Foreign Missions, the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society accepted the responsibility for all the work of the women and girls at Kalgan. The China Mission Conference was organized on Dec. 12, 1919, with one American minister, one Chinese minister, nine native preachers and delegates. Dr. Roberta Fleagle, the first medical missionary of the M.P. Church, was sent to China by the Society in June 1920. Miss Theresa Frank was in charge of the Society's evangelistic work in China during the 1920's.

The Society worked with the Board of Foreign Missions in the denominational work in INDIA, assisting with the care and instruction of the women and girls and with the medical department.

At the General Conference of 1924, a Constitution for a Union Board of Foreign Missionary Administration aimed toward the unification of missionary organizations was approved. This plan called for the establishment of a board with five members each from the Board of Foreign Missions and the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society, the two executive secretaries of the organizations and the President of the General Conference. In 1928 the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society merged with the Woman's Home Missionary Society and became known as the "Woman's Work of the Methodist Protestant Church." Individual organizations were known as "auxiliaries" or "the ladies aid."

WOMAN'S HOME MISSIONARY SOCIETY. (ME). In response to a growing concern of socially minded groups of Methodist women in all parts of the United States for the welfare of their sisters and young children—especially in the rapidly growing urban areas and among the less privileged people of the nation—the Woman's Home Missionary Society of the M.E. Church came into existence in 1882 in a convention held in Cincinnati, Ohio. The first president was Mrs. RUTHERFORD B. HAYES, whose husband had just completed a term as president of the United States; she served for seven years, and large credit for the rapid growth and influence of the Society is due to her planning and devotion to the cause.

The varied needs of women and children in the "old cities" and their slums in the 1880's claimed major attention of these Methodist women. One of their first pioneering efforts was in the establishment of "settlement houses" or "neighborhood houses" that endeavored to give working young women "a home away from home." Wesley Houses and Bethlehem Centers were but other names for residential houses for working girls and women—often the more poorly-paid workers of their day. While the needs of each community differ—and "houses" and "homes" must vary to meet changing needs, what all needed was a community and life where a family atmosphere might be experienced and shared, where recreational facilities would be provided, and where feelings of loneliness in the crowds might be dissipated. The so-called institutional church, endeavoring to minister to the varied needs of women and girls for recreation, worship, and study, grew in part from the Woman's Home Missionary Society's endeavor to meet the needs of these strangers in a strange city.

From such beginnings, in the next half century, Methodist women, led by national W.H.M.S. pioneers, and with the support furnished by thousands of auxiliary societies established in as many local churches and communities, pioneered in many forms of Christian service in the homeland. They developed also a chain of young women's auxiliaries (to the W.H.M.S.), the WESLEYAN SERVICE GUILD, the young people's department, and the junior department. In these small but significant "service arms" of the W.H.M.S., were trained many who today are in places of leadership in The United Methodist Church.

Branching out from initial attention to human needs in the cities, and the Church's attempt to meet them, the W.H.M.S. pioneered in phases of a vast social-service program, forerunner of much that Methodism and other Christian churches are doing in these areas today. It early saw the potentials in ALASKA—and the peculiar needs of the rugged people there: established the Seward General Hospital, the Jesse Lee Home and Orphanage, a hospital in Nome. In CALIFORNIA, ministry to the Chinese included a service to immigrants in SAN FRANCISCO, and a residence hall for Chinese girls in the same city; and a center and home in Los Angeles. Out in Honolulu, the Susannah Wesley Home ministered to women of many nationalities; and in CHICAGO, Marcy Center became a model of service to Jew and Christian alike. Hospitals and dispensaries were established in WASHINGTON, D.C.; JACKSONVILLE, Fla.; BOSTON, Mass. Work among the American Indians—and especially among their long-neglected women—reached into areas assigned to the Navajos, the Yumas, the Poncas. Schools, settlement houses, and clinics ministered to the Mexicans in the U.S. southwest. WOOD JUNIOR COLLEGE and a group of secondary schools served boys as well as girls in the mountain regions of GEORGIA, TENNESSEE, KENTUCKY, and rural MISSISSIPPI. Schools, community centers, and women's and girls' homes were established for work and workers among Negroes in various communities in TEXAS, MISSISSIPPI, LOUISIANA, and in the Carolinas; BENNETT COLLEGE, in GREENSBORO, N.C., became a pioneer in the education of Negro young women. And the George O. Robinson School in PUERTO RICO, and the Alma Mathews House in NEW YORK (the latter originally to care for immigrant girls) became models for like institutions established by other agencies.

Esther Halls, Friendship Homes, Mother's Jewels Homes, Neighborhood Houses, and other-named centers for residential care of girls and young working women became nationwide symbols of the Methodist Church's care for its womanhood. That ministry, begun by the Woman's Home Missionary Society, is continued today in The United Methodist Church through the Woman's Division of Christian Service of the BOARD OF MISSIONS.

When, in 1940, the activities of the Woman's Home Missionary Society was merged with other groups in the formation of the Woman's Division of Christian Service, the W.H.M.S. had a total membership of 263,000 women and girls, enrolled in 11,608 units—auxiliaries, young woman's auxiliaries, Wesleyan Service Guilds, young people, and juniors. Each annual conference had an active Conference W.H.M.S. The annual receipts and disbursements for home missionary enterprises through the W.H.M.S. were about $1,250,000.

WOMAN'S HOME MISSIONARY SOCIETY (MP) was organized at Bridgeton, N. J., at the conclusion of the annual meeting of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society in 1893. Mrs. S. A. Lipscomb was the first president and national headquarters were located at ADRIAN, Mich., and later at KANSAS CITY, Kan., then at WASHINGTON, D.C., and after 1916 in BALTIMORE, Md. During its early years the organization sponsored missionary projects in the Upper Peninsula of MICHIGAN and in the OKLAHOMA Territory. In 1907 two young women were sent by the Society to the Schauffler Missionary Training School and one of them, Elizabeth Potachnak, later worked for several years among the Slavic people of Baltimore. Miss Constante Field went as a missionary from the Society to the Navajo Indians in 1907. Mrs. M. O. Everett of Washington, D.C., began work the same year among the mountain people of TENNESSEE and KENTUCKY, and as a result the ALVAN DREW SCHOOL at Pine Ridge, Ky., was opened in 1912. Dr. and Mrs. Thomas A. Woodford headed this school for a number of years after 1919. The school had 125 acres and a number of buildings. At one time there were sixty students including eight boarders.

The Woman's Home Missionary Society was incorporated in 1916 with a central committee which, along with the president, had authority to transact business between regular board meetings. In 1922, S. W. Rosenberger, President of the OHIO M.P. Annual CONFERENCE, urged the Society to establish missionary work among the foreign-speaking people in the Ohio Valley, and subsequently Emily Grace Brown worked in that area for four years. Bessie M. Eiss began a mission project at Dillonville, Ohio, in 1927 and within a year had reached 150 children. Other special projects which were supported by the Woman's Home Missionary Society included the Children's Home, founded by Mrs. Minnie Lee Hammer in Denton, N. C., in 1910 and later moved to HIGH POINT; Bethel Tubercular Home, operated by Homer Casto at Weaverville, N. C.; the Pittsburgh Mission, founded in 1925 by Mrs. Jane A. Gordon; and a Business Girl's Home in Baltimore, Md. Mrs. A. C. (Margaret M. Kuhns) Dixon, who in 1908 became the first President of the NORTH CAROLINA Branch of the Woman's Home Missionary Society, became National President in 1909, a position she held for many years.

The Society worked with the Board of Home Missions of the M.P. Church, which was established by the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1888.

In 1928 the Woman's Home Missionary Society merged with the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society into the United Branch of Missions of the M.P. Church and became known as "The Woman's Work of the Methodist Protestant Church." Mrs. Hammer was elected to serve as the first President. Individual organizations were known as "auxiliaries" or "the Ladies' Aid."

WOMEN ITINERANT PREACHERS. British. When SARAH CROSBY approached JOHN WESLEY in 1761 for advice about the 200 people who flocked to her class meeting, he told her to tell them, "The Methodists do not allow of women preachers. . . . But I will just nakedly tell you what is in my heart." (Letters, iv, 133, Feb. 14, 1761) In 1771 writing to MARY BOSANQUET and referring to 1 Corinthians 14:34-35, he said that this might admit of exception where there was "an extraordinary call" (Letters, v, 257, June 13, 1771). As in other matters where he believed there was a clear call of God, he was ready to lay aside his own prejudices.

The Wesleyan Conference rule of 1803, which only allowed women to preach who had an extraordinary call and then only to female congregations, remained in force until 1910, but Mrs. MARY TAFT preached when an asterisk appeared on her husband's plan. JABEZ BUNTING considered an extraordinary call to be "every fanatic's plea." HUGH BOURNE accepted female itinerants from the early days of PRIMITIVE METHODISM, and more than forty appear before 1844. WILLIAM O'BRYAN's wife was the first among the BIBLE CHRISTIANS, and there were fourteen "Itinerant Females" by the first conference in 1819. In all, seventy-one were accepted between then and 1861. Thirteen more appear between 1890 and 1907.

WOMEN'S CRUSADE, THE (American), a forerunner of The Woman's Christian Temperance Union, had its beginning in OHIO where women met for prayer, then went to the grog shops, saloons, drugstores, and hotels to pray and to sing and to plead with those engaged in the sale of liquor to desist from the traffic.

These Christian women from many denominations suffered persecution and imprisonment; they had buckets of icy water thrown on them in winter, and were sued by liquor dealers for loss of business. Their worship services on the sidewalks and in the saloons were broken up by rowdies or by singing and dancing girls. But through their consecrated efforts many saloons were closed and the bartenders went into other lines of work. Bishop SIMPSON calls it a "remarkable movement" and states that while it was not directly connected with Methodism, the Methodist women "owing to their greater experience in class meetings and love feasts" were unusually conspicuous in it. It was supplanted in time by the Woman's Christian Temperance Union which had great effect in fighting the liquor traffic.

WOMEN'S FELLOWSHIP (British), began in 1942, when a special committee was set up by the Methodist CONFERENCE to consider problems vital to women. In 1944 the Conference approved the name, recognized an aim and promise and laid down a constitution. The Fellowship is part of the HOME MISSION DEPARTMENT, and is charged with the task of calling women and girls to a Christian womanhood accepting responsibility in the home, the Church, and the State. There is an annually elected President. The Fellowship has organized a mother and a baby home, a home for girls in need of temporary accommodation, especially unmarried girls in the early stages of pregnancy, and a hostel for business and professional girls.

MARGARET STATHAM

WOMEN'S GUILD FELLOWSHIP in New Zealand Methodism was founded to draw together local guilds, which played a valuable part in the life of the church from the earliest days. In the Law Book of the New Zealand Methodist Church the objects were stated thus: "To promote the spiritual and social welfare of its members and of the Church, to assist in the furnishing of the Parsonage and to help in Trust and Circuit enterprises." These objects have been realized. Membership has been open to all women of the church. The usual monthly meetings have assisted the spiritual influence of the church, sometimes to a marked degree.

In each district a district guild fellowship coordinated the work of the individual guilds and gathered isolated guilds into the larger fellowship of the church.

In 1948, the Conference asked the district fellowships to form a New Zealand Methodist Guild Fellowship, and in 1949 the Conference approved the constitution. In its 1960 report, the fellowship reported 6,697 members in 310 guilds, and £20,346 raised for church purposes during the year. The fellowship has always been worthily represented on many nationwide councils and federations outside the strictly church groups. Through the fellowship, the guilds became an important spiritual power in the church. The declared aim has been: "To know Christ and to make Him known."

In May, 1960, its representatives met representatives of the Women's Missionary Auxiliary, when it was decided to form one Women's movement in the church. The unified movement with the title, The New Zealand METHODIST WOMEN'S FELLOWSHIP, was established in 1964.

WILLIAM T. BLIGHT

WOMEN'S MISSIONARY SOCIETY of the M.E. Church, South. (See MISSIONS AND BOARD OF MISSIONS, MES.)

WOMEN'S ORGANIZATIONS, Br. (See METHODIST MISSIONARY SOCIETY and WOMEN'S FELLOWSHIP.)

WOMEN'S SOCIETY OF CHRISTIAN SERVICE, formerly Woman's Society of Christian Service, is the women's organization of The United Methodist Church whose purpose is "to help women grow in the knowledge and experience of God as revealed in Jesus Christ; to challenge them to God's redemptive purpose in the world; to unite them in a Christian Fellowship to make Christ known throughout the world; and to develop a personal responsibility for the whole task of the Church."

This organization is the outreach and ongoing of the missionary work of the M.E. Church, the M.E. Church, South, the M.P. Church, and the E.U.B. Church—all now united. The organization has a rich heritage of service, going back to societies organized from 1786 to this present day. In the old JOHN STREET CHURCH, New York, as early as 1768, Methodist women organized to help with the church and parsonage.

With the growth of missionary movement, especially overseas, the WOMAN'S FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY of the M.E. Church was organized in 1869. In 1873 the Woman's Bible Mission, later the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society of the M.E. Church, South, was organized. Two years later came the organization of the Women's Missionary Association of the Church of the UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST, and in 1879 the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society of the M.P. Church.

In 1880 the "home work" of the Church, namely looking after PARSONAGES and local mission work, was entrusted to a separate organization, the WOMAN'S HOME MISSIONARY SOCIETY in the M.E. Church. In 1886 an organization under the same name was created in the M.E. Church, South. It should be said also that in 1884 the Board of Missions of the Evangelical Association ratified the creation of its Woman's Missionary Society. The M.P. Church followed these moves by organizing in 1893 a Woman's Home Missionary Society.

In the M.E. Church, South, in 1910 a Woman's Missionary Council was formed, merging into it all that Church's missionary interests. The doing away with the separate organizations for home missions caused considerable tension among women in the Southern Church, but better administration called for it. In 1924 the Methodist Protestants united all their missionary interests, and at Methodist union in 1939, all women's organizations of the three churches merged to form the Woman's Division of the Board of Missions. There were to be auxiliary Woman's Societies of Christian Services in annual conferences, districts, and local churches.

A similar merger happened when the EVANGELICAL CHURCH and the United Brethren Church merged in 1946 and they, at that time, put their women's organizations all together in a Women's Society of World Service. In 1964 there was a further reorganization in The Methodist Church and the mission work of the Woman's Division of Christian Service was merged into and with World and National Divisions of the BOARD OF MISSIONS. This was to obviate possible conflict between the Woman's Division (which had an almost world-wide extension of schools, hospitals, and workers), and that of the World Division of the same Board which also had a world-wide outreach and its own special agencies and personnel. While the World Division and the Woman's Division had cooperated in many ways, the merger was to the advantage of all.

In 1968 came the great merger caused by the union of the Churches (E.U.B. and T.M.C.) to form The United Methodist Church. This merger changed the name slightly from Woman's Society to Women's Society of Christian Service. The organization is commonly referred to as "The W.S.C.S."

The work and accomplishments of these women's organizations have been almost miraculous in their support of, planning for, and projecting all sorts of missionary moves at home and abroad, all formerly under the aegis of their respective Churches. Successive Disciplines may be referred to ascertain the charter regulations, disciplinary guidance, and duties of the W.S.C.S. and its antecedent organizations. These have varied from time to time, and successive GENERAL CONFERENCES may be expected to revise them still further as need seems to call. However, the great forward drive and purpose of the organized women's work in the Church has always been the same—to spread scriptural holiness over all lands and to go into the world for Jesus Christ.

Membership in the combined societies of the United Methodist Church is approximately 1,795,376. The W.S.C.S. has sometimes been called "the largest woman's club in the world." Its membership is open to all women who are members of The United Methodist Church. It functions, as has been said above, in local chapters or societies in the local churches in the districts; in annual conference organizations; and in the jurisdictional groupings in the general Church. Annual conference W.S.C.S. meetings are largely attended and put on helpful programs, and the same can be said of the jurisdictional organizations and their assemblies. The whole organization is under the control of the general Board of Missions, and regulations governing it through that Board are, of course, General Conference enactments.

An enormous literature can be referred to for information in this field. The History of Methodist Missions, by Wade Crawford Barclay, will give the most complete account in volumes I and II (which have been published) of early American Methodism; and of the M.E. Church, 1845-1939. A complete bibliography is carried in volume

II published by the Board of Missions of The Methodist Church in 1957. There is a thorough treatment of women's work in volume II. (See also MISSIONS AND BOARD OF MISSIONS.)

MRS. JOHN M. PEARSON

WOMEN'S SOCIETY OF WORLD SERVICE (EUB).

Among Evangelicals the first such society existed briefly in Immanuel Church, PHILADELPHIA in 1839. Nearly forty years were to elapse before a letter, written by a lady missionary in JAPAN and published in the church papers, was to inspire another effort. A group of women petitioned the BOARD OF MISSIONS in 1878 for permission to organize missionary societies, but as one of them put it, "The wise men said 'no.'" Disappointed but undaunted they continued their agitation, and the Board in 1880 approved their request. In 1884 delegates from a number of these societies met in CLEVELAND to draft a petition to General Conference to permit the organization of a denominational Woman's Missionary Society and at the GENERAL CONFERENCE that year, the petition was granted.

"The Sisters' Missionary Society" organized by the women of the OHIO German Conference in 1869, and a similar organization by the women of the CALIFORNIA Conference in 1872 were the beginnings of organized women's missionary activity in the Church of the UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST. May 9, 1872 the Miami Branch Association was organized in the Euclid Avenue Church, DAYTON, and the pattern devised was used for other conference branch organizations. General Conference, 1873, gave its approval to the Associations. The following year the Board of Missions heard and approved the plan for a "General Women's Missionary Society," and the General Conference in 1877 formally recognized the "Women's Missionary Association." The successor to the Women's Missionary Association and the Women's Missionary Society in The E.U.B. Church is the Women's Society of World Service.

The purpose of the society shall be to unite all women of The E.U.B. Church in a Christian fellowship to make Christ known throughout the world and to develop a personal responsibility for the whole task of the Church.

The scope of work of the society shall be the needs and interests of women and the concerns and responsibilities of the church in today's world.

The society shall foster spiritual growth, missionary outreach, and Christian service.

WOOD, A. HAROLD (1896-), Australian preacher, educator and church executive, was born in Geelong, VICTORIA. He was educated in NEW SOUTH WALES at SYDNEY High School and later at Sydney University. He did his theological training in New South Wales; in addition to graduating B.A., he also studied Law at Sydney for two years. His M.A. and B.D. were taken when he was a country minister. Dr. Wood learned to type and take shorthand, and worked as a clerk in a Government Department of Justice, and later as a judge's associate in the quarter-sessions court. This whetted his appetite for the bar, but before he completed his law degree he was asked if he would go to a Sydney suburb which was short of a minister and prepare to offer himself for the ministry at the end of the year.

It was during this time in 1919 that he met his wife, who was a doctor. Immediately after their marriage in 1924 they went to TONGA as missionaries, where they stayed for thirteen years. Dr. Wood was in charge of a boy's school and also trained Tongan boys for the ministry. In Tonga Dr. Wood did the reading and preliminary work for his D.D. degree. However, it was not until 1948 that he finished his thesis and submitted it for examination.

After thirteen years Dr. Wood and his family (his six children were all born in Tonga) returned to Sydney in 1937. He was appointed Principal of the Methodist Ladies College, Hawthorn, Victoria in 1939. When he went to the College in 1939 there were 650 students; when he retired on Dec. 9, 1966, there were 2,200 pupils.

Throughout his career preaching and Christian teaching have been his main concern. In 1952 he was President of the Victorian Conference and during 1957-60 was President-General of the Australian Conference. As General Conference Convener of Church Union he worked tirelessly for this cause. At the time of his retirement he had a special interest in efforts being made to establish a Sixth Form College within the present College, for Matriculation Students.

After forty-one years in two schools, and five years in Circuit work, he has, since becoming a supernumerary minister, returned to circuit work as the minister of the Deepdene Methodist Church. He states: "I would rather be a minister than follow any other calling."

WOOD, ENOCH (1759-1840), was a noted early potter of Burslem, Staffordshire, England. In 1781 he produced his famous bust of JOHN WESLEY, who gave the artist five separate sittings. It was exhibited at the CONFERENCE in LEEDS, and Wood received commendation, Wesley and others declaring it an excellent likeness. In the first edition Wesley wore his traveling gown, and on ADAM CLARKE's suggestion another was made in full gown. Wood made six different busts of Wesley, and these have been the models for all succeeding artists except the French sculptor Roubiliac. Wood also made busts of Adam Clarke and GEORGE WHITEFIELD. WOOD, ENOCH (1804-1888), Canadian Methodist preacher and administrator, promoter of home missions and pioneer of foreign missions in Canadian Methodism, was born Jan. 13, 1804, in Gainsborough, Lincolnshire, England. He was a school-fellow of Thomas Cooper, later a prominent Chartist. He was received on trial in 1826 and ordained immediately so that he might join a group of Wesleyan missionaries bound for the WEST INDIES. Wood was stationed in Montserrat, W. I., where he worked until he was transferred to St. John, New Brunswick, in August 1829.

The next year he was received into full connection, thus beginning a half-century of leadership in British American Methodism. While serving on circuits in the Maritime Provinces, 1829-47, he was an effective preacher and administrator. From 1831 to 1833 he was stationed in the Miramichi area, opening a new church in Chatham and initiating churches at Bathurst and elsewhere. In 1833 he was placed at Fredericton, where his ability in the pulpit and his genial spirit soon attracted numerous hearers.

Since he was especially effective in urban circuits, Wood served in St. John and Fredericton until 1847. From 1843 to 1847 he was chairman of the New Brunswick district. In this position he imparted new vigor to the religious and educational activities of the New Brunswick Wesleyans.

In 1847, at the CANADA CONFERENCE, a long step was taken in Canadian Methodism when Enoch Wood was appointed superintendent of missions. For some years, the Conference had been interested in missions, especially to the Indians, and the Wesleyan Missionary Society had begun a mission in the Northwest. Now, Wood was made responsible for the Canadian missions. He imparted to this enterprise the same energy and imagination he had displayed in New Brunswick. In 1848, he travelled widely and planned an industrial school for the Indian work at Muncey, Upper Canada.

Five years later the Hudson's Bay district was taken over from the Wesleyan Missionary Society and amalgamated with the Indian missions of the Canadian Methodists. This gave Wood administrative responsibility for the missions from coast to coast. At his suggestion, a party led by JOHN RYERSON toured this vast area in 1854. The Canadian Conference now began to conceive of its mission in British North American terms and to appoint outstanding missionaries to the western posts. Among them were GEORGE McDOUGALL and EGERTON YOUNG, pioneers of the eventual prairie conferences.

Significant as was Enoch Wood's contribution to home missions, his greatest missionary venture was the establishment of a mission to JAPAN in 1873. This bold step marked the beginning of a new epoch in the history of Canadian Methodist missions. He faced firm opposition. Many doubted the wisdom of the venture at a time when so much was needed at home. Many missionaries were existing on inadequate stipends; many Indian tribes were as yet unreached; and there were loud and frequent calls for help from new communities. Nevertheless, in faith and hope Enoch Wood was instrumental in sending to Japan George Cochran, and Davidson MacDonald. They both served with distinction and fruitfulness, justifying the confidence and foresight of the superintendent.

In 1874, the Wesleyan Methodists, the Methodists of the New Connexion, and the Eastern British America Conference united to form the Methodist Church of CANADA. With this union came a consolidation of mission work across Canada, in Newfoundland, Bermuda, and the infant mission in Japan. It was a triumphant conclusion to Wood's dream. In 1874 and 1875, Wood, who had been President of the Canada Conference from 1851 to 1855 was President of the Toronto Conference, a testimony to the affection and respect of his brethren.

The previous year, ALEXANDER SUTHERLAND had been elected assistant secretary of missions. In 1878, Wood resigned in favor of his assistant. He was requested to attend the meetings of the committee and the board as honorary secretary as long as he was able. When the Central Board met in October 1880, a resolution of sympathy was recorded because of the long and painful illness of Enoch Wood, and in gratitude for his faithful service through many years.

Enoch Wood died in Toronto, Jan. 31, 1888 at the age of eighty-four. General Superintendent Williams gave the memorial address at the funeral service, Feb. 5, 1888.

Enoch Wood's life reflected a balance between missionary work and the more settled work of the pastorate. For three years he was a missionary in the West Indies. For the next eighteen years he served the largest centers in New Brunswick. The last thirty years he served in an administrative post as superintendent and later secretary of missions. His story is the account of a vital phase in the growth of Canadian Methodist missions. He was one of the new heroes of the faith who was more honored in his lifetime than after his death.

WOOD, THOMAS BOND (1844-1922), missionary from the United States to Latin America, served in ARGENTINA and URUGUAY and was one of the founders of Methodist work in PERU.

He was born on March 18, 1844, at Lafayette, Ind., the son of AARON WOOD, a prominent minister of the NORTHWEST INDIANA CONFERENCE. A brilliant student, he completed studies at Indiana Asbury at nineteen and at twenty had earned the A.B. degree from WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY. After earning the Master's degree at both schools (Indiana Asbury in 1866 and Wesleyan University, 1867), he taught natural science and German for three years at WESLEYAN ACADEMY, WILBRAHAM, Mass. For two years he was president of Valparaiso College, Indiana.

THOMAS B. WOOD

He was received on trial by the NEW ENGLAND CONFERENCE in 1865 and in 1867 transferred to the Northwest Indiana Conference.

Enrolling as a missionary for South America, he was sent to the River Plate region, where he spent a number of years in both Argentina and Uruguay. His first assignment was at ROSARIO, ARGENTINA, where he arrived on May 1, 1870. He began as a minister to the English-speaking community, but within a year had begun services in Spanish. His background in science and education led to the offer of a teaching position at the government university in Rosario. While continuing to work with his churches, he was a professor of astronomy and physics and for a time also served as a United States consul in Rosario.

In Uruguay he established in 1877 El Evangelista, the first evangelical paper in the country, serving as editor until 1888. He was director of a school in Uruguay, 1887-89. Then for two years, 1889-91, he was president of the Buenos Aires Theological Seminary (FACULTAD EVANGELICA DE TEOLOGIA).

"Once a work was started," states EULA K. LONG in writing of him, "Dr. Wood wanted to move on, so he traveled to Lima, Peru, where he followed close there FRANCISCO G. PENZOTTI, whose dramatic imprisonment and release had opened the way for Protestant work." Wood arrived there in 1891 with an appointment as superintendent of the newly formed Western District of the South America Conference which comprised Peru, ECUADOR, and BOLIVIA. Serving in that position four years, he established churches—the first one at Callao—and with the aid of his daughter, Elsie, organized schools.

He visited the United States for the Ecuadorian government from May to July, 1900, and then acted as superintendent of the North Andes Mission, president of the Lima Theological Seminary, and pastor of an English-speaking congregation in LIMA. He had a part in the evangelization of Brazil also, sending there in 1875, João Corrêa, a homeopathic doctor and lay preacher who had been converted under his preaching, and eventually asking Corrêa to move to Brazil and establish a residence and school in Porto Alegre.

Wood spent most of the remainder of his life in and out of Peru. He was briefly in Ecuador in 1900, where he was a founder of normal schools. He was president of the Lima Business College, 1899; president of the Lima Theological Seminary, 1905-13; and director of the Callao mission schools and pastor of the English church in Lima, 1907-13. He retired in 1915.

E.M.B. Jaime in writing about Dr. Wood and his work said, "He was the image of a patriarch; he had the heart of a child, a powerful brain; he was a fearful debater, an orator in Athenian style, an elegant writer and a master in theology."

WOOD JUNIOR COLLEGE, Mathiston, Mississippi, opened in 1886 as Woodland Seminary, an elementary school at Clarkston, Miss., under the auspices of the WOMEN'S HOME MISSIONARY SOCIETY of the M.E. Church. Initial funds for support came from the FREEDMEN'S AID SOCIETY. Renamed Bennett Academy in 1897, it moved to the present location in 1915 as a secondary school. Junior college instruction began in 1927. The college was given its present name in 1936 to honor its benefactors, Dr. and Mrs. Irving Wood of Omaha, Neb. The governing board has twenty-one members elected by the NORTH MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE and the Woman's Division of Christian Service of the BOARD OF MISSIONS of The United Methodist Church.

WOODFORD, THOMAS REEVES (1871-1945), American M.P. minister and educator, was born in Centreville, Md., on Dec. 6, 1871. In 1894 he sold out his mercantile business and entered WESTERN MARYLAND COLLEGE, where he graduated four years later. For a year he was a student at WESTMINSTER THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY. In 1899 he entered the MARYLAND CONFERENCE of the M.P. Church and on Aug. 7, 1900, he married Mary Elizabeth VanDyke (Sept. 15, 1872—Nov. 9, 1958).

Woodford served pastorates in Belair, Lawsonia, Bethany Church, BALTIMORE (all in MARYLAND) and at Accomac, Va., Stewartstown and Fawn Grove, Pa. While he was agent and publisher for the Board of Publications of the M.P. BOOK CONCERN of Baltimore, he organized the Wilton Heights Church. He was appointed pastor of Grace M.P. Church (now Maynard Avenue Church) in COLUMBUS, OHIO, in 1916. He accepted the position of superintendent of the ALVAN DREW SCHOOL at Pine Ridge, Ky., in 1919 at a forty percent decrease in salary. For the next fifteen years the Woodfords supervised and developed this accredited high school for mountain children, sponsored by the WOMAN'S HOME MISSIONARY SOCIETY of the M.P. Church. Because of ill health, the Woodfords resigned in 1934 and Woodford returned to the Maryland Conference to serve the First M.P. Church, Wilmington, Del., until 1937. He then superannuated but returned to Pine Ridge to help as he could there for three and one-half years. The Woodfords moved to FLORIDA in 1940, due to their health, and for five years were actively connected with the Goss Memorial Church in ORLANDO. Bishop JAMES H. STRAUGHN said of Woodford: "His preaching was simple and direct, without the slightest affectation of intellectualism or pedantry. He had a simple straight gospel."

The Woodfords were the parents of one daughter and one son. Woodford died on June 21, 1945, and both he and Mrs. Woodford are buried in Centreville, Md.

WOODHOUSE GROVE SCHOOL is a "public school" parallel in the north of England to Kingswood School in the south. (See BRADFORD, ENGLAND.)

WOODRING, EDWIN S. (1872-1957), administrator and bishop of the American Evangelical Congregational Church for twenty-two years. He was a leader in perpetuating the form of government of The United Evangelical denomination in the Evangelical Congregational conferences. He was a younger brother to James D. Woodring, an early president of ALBRIGHT COLLEGE at Myerstown, Pa. Graduated from Muhlenberg College, he went to Illinois and studied at the Moody Bible Institute of Chicago. After preaching in the Illinois Conference (UE) for seven years, he came back to eastern Pennsylvania as a pastor and was elected a presiding elder in 1921, and then bishop in 1926. In addition to organizational ability in the conferences, his most noteworthy work was organizing the School of Methods youth conference at Waldheim Park, in Allentown, Pa. This was one of the outstanding youth conferences in its day, using noted speakers from many denominations and attracting hundreds of people annually. Born Feb. 17, 1872 at Wescosville, Lehigh County, Pa., he died Feb. 25, 1957 in Harrisburg, Pa. His body was laid to rest in the West End Cemetery, Allentown, Pa.

WOODRUFF, MAY LEONARD (1862-1948), American missionary leader of the NEWARK CONFERENCE, who gave more than forty years of her life to the organizing and developing of the home missionary work of the entire Church, was born at Sewickly, Pa., on Feb. 4, 1862. Her father was ADNA B. LEONARD, for many years foreign missionary secretary of the M.E. Church, and her brother was Bishop ADNA W. LEONARD. She was the wife of Charles S. Woodruff, and her sons were Clarence Woodruff, a member of the Newark Conference, and C. Rogers Woodruff, an official of the BOARD OF MISSIONS and Church Extension of The Methodist Church, who passed away at a comparatively early age and some years before his mother died. Her daughter, M. Dorothy Woodruff, research librarian of the Board of Missions, will be remembered with great affection by those who used the Library of that Board in the old 150 Fifth Avenue building in New York.

Mrs. Woodruff was described by George G. Vogel as a forward looking leader, who "always advocated the larger and greater things for the tomorrows. She was an advocate of the United Woman's Missionary Societies and for the union of the Churches." She gave great leadership to the women in home mission work in the continental United States. She died at Ocean Grove, N. J., on Feb. 16, 1948.

WOODSWORTH, JAMES (1843-1917), Canadian minister, was born in Toronto, Canada West (Ontario) in 1843, the son of Richard Woodsworth, a Wesleyan local preacher. He studied theology with his district chairman and was ordained in 1868. He married Esther Shaver of Cooksville, near Toronto. There were six children, of whom James Shaver, the eldest, became a Methodist minister and leader of the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation.

After ordination Woodsworth served on several circuits in Ontario; in 1886 he was appointed superintendent of home missions in Manitoba and the Northwest, a post which he held for twenty-nine years. In this interval sixty-eight circuits and one Conference expanded into 650 circuits and three Conferences. Woodsworth's duties involved travel throughout the western provinces by all types of conveyances. During his first four years alone he travelled many thousands of miles.

To staff the growing mission field Woodsworth frequently visited Britain, where he recruited a large number of men who became known as "Woodsworth's Boys." He was a delegate to all GENERAL CONFERENCES between 1886 and 1915 and to the ECUMENICAL METHODIST CONFERENCE of 1891. Not content with territorial expansion, he laid the foundation of religious and social work among the urban immigrant population.

For his great services he was given an honorary degree by VICTORIA UNIVERSITY. Woodsworth's memory lives in the great foothold he established for Methodism in western Canada, a legacy incorporated in The United Church of Canada.

F. W. ARMSTRONG

WOODSWORTH, JAMES SHAVER (1874-1942), Canadian Methodist minister and political leader, was born near Toronto, on July 29, 1874, to JAMES WOODSWORTH and Esther Josephine Shaver. He was educated at Wesley College (B.A., 1896) and VICTORIA COLLEGE (B.D., 1900), and for one year he studied at Oxford University.

Following in his father's footsteps he became a probationer in 1896. To this task he brought new insights derived from close investigation of social problems, especially in LONDON. He was appalled at what he saw; depressed by the apparent feebleness of English Methodism and made aware of the vast disparity between his own beliefs and practices and those prevalent in British society. Although he accepted ordination in 1900, he became increasingly dubious about his position.

By 1902, Woodsworth was convinced that his growing disbelief in the accepted doctrines of his church disqualified him for the ministry. He attempted to resign in 1902 and again in 1907, but was dissuaded by his brethren who secured his appointment to the All Peoples' Mission, an institution designed to handle the acute social and moral problems of multi-ethnic WINNIPEG. Woodsworth's work in the mission confirmed and strengthened his interest in humanitarian reform.

JAMES S. WOODSWORTH

In part because of Woodsworth's teaching, Manitoba enacted compulsory school attendance legislation and established a system of juvenile courts. In 1909 he published Strangers Within Our Gates, a plea for understanding of the European immigrants who were flooding into Winnipeg and the West. In the same year he began to write for a labor newspaper The Voice. Increasingly he urged the Methodist Church to take the lead in social reform. The response was greater, however, outside his church than within it. In 1913 he became secretary of the new Social Welfare League, and three years later he became director of the Bureau of Social Research founded by the Prairie Provinces. These posts enabled him to acquaint a wide circle with the immense social stresses confronting a changing Canada.

Unfortunately for Woodsworth, his political opinions were as radical as his views on social questions. When he publicized his pacifist convictions he was forced out of his post, and after a short term as a missionary his brethren willingly accepted the resignation which he had long since proffered on serious theological grounds. Methodism's loss was, however, Canada's gain; as a political reformer Woodsworth continued to symbolize the deepest springs of Christian teaching.

After his resignation, he acquired first-hand knowledge of the worker's world as a Vancouver longshoreman. Spring of 1919 found him in Winnipeg again. His support for the general strike, by which the city was paralyzed, brought arrest for seditious libel, a charge for which he was never tried. It was fitting that in December, 1921, he should win election for Centre Winnipeg to the Canadian House of Commons. His grateful constituents regularly re-elected him until his death.

As an M.P. in the 1920's, Woodsworth fought manfully for humane treatment of the underprivileged and the persecuted. His small group was largely responsible for the introduction of old-age pensions in 1926 and, after 1929, for drawing attention to the desperate plight of the unemployed. When all those concerned to find a radical solution to the depression came together to form the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation in 1932, Woodsworth became its first leader.

From 1932 to 1939, he sought unceasingly and sacrificially to achieve political power and to maintain his crusade against social abuses. The outbreak of war, however, brought his resignation, for he could not join his followers in supporting Canadian participation in it. His political career was effectively at an end. Two years later his frail constitution ceased to function.

J. S. Woodsworth was not so much a socialist as a great Christian, who strove with all his strength to translate and apply the Gospel precept of charity to his own community. As such he was honored by his opponents and his friends, and he left an enduring legacy.

WOODVILLE, MISSISSIPPI, U.S.A., in the southwest part of the state, is the site of the oldest Methodist church building in MISSISSIPPI. The congregation was organized about 1810. The present building has been in continuous use as a place of worship since its construction in 1824, and Woodville has been a station appointment since 1835. The MISSISSIPPI ANNUAL CONFERENCE sessions of 1831, 1835, 1843, and 1858 were held there. Plans were made in the 1831 session for setting off part of the Mississippi Conference as the ALABAMA CONFERENCE. ENOCH MARVIN served as pastor in Woodville shortly before his election to the episcopacy. It is the home church of the McGehee family, featured in Stark Young's novel, So Red the Rose. Judge EDWARD MCGEEHEE, charter member of the congregation and well-known church and institutional benefactor, had the first standard gauge railroad in America built into Woodville. This railway is still in use. Also there is the site of the former Woodville Female Academy, later known as Edward McGehee College, a girls' school related to the Methodist Church, serving from 1840-1912. The church and community have been served by many outstanding ministers and laymen.

WOODWARD, MAX WAKERLEY (1908-), British minister, was born in England, Jan. 28, 1908, son of Alfred and Mabel (Wakerley) Woodward. He was educated at HANDSWORD COLLEGE, BIRMINGHAM, England, 1926-29. On Nov. 3, 1934, he was married to Kathleen May Beaty. Four children were born to this union: Gillian (Mrs. Sidney Porter), John, David and Peter. In 1933 Woodward was admitted into full connection in the British CONFERENCE. For thirteen years (1929-42) he was a missionary to CEYLON, and from 1942 until 1946 served in the British Navy. He served pastorates in Leamington, Finsbury Park, Harrow, and Wesley's Chapel, LONDON from 1946 to 1964. In 1964 he was elected Secretary of the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL Resident in Great Britain, a responsibility he had carried along with his pastorate on a part-time basis since 1961. He gave full-time service to the Council from 1964-69.

WOOLSEY, THOMAS (1818-1894), Canadian Methodist missionary, was born in Gainsborough, Lincolnshire. He moved to London at an early age and became a member of the CITY ROAD CHAPEL. Before he came to CANADA in 1852, he had been a local preacher for fifteen years. Received on trial in 1853, he was ordained in 1855 and appointed to Fort Edmonton (Alberta).

In 1856 Woolsey re-occupied a mission on Pigeon Lake that had been abandoned by Benjamin Sinclair. About 1860 he began a new mission at Smoking (Smoky) Lake. Two years later the superintendent, GEORGE McDUGALL, permitted him to move to a new site named Victoria Mission, now Pakan, Alberta.

In 1864, Woolsey left the west for England. On his return he served on various charges in Ontario and Quebec, most of which were Indian missions.

Although he found life in the west difficult, Woolsey was a faithful pastor and evangelist. He made use of Evans' syllabic Bible and served as a doctor to the Indians. His devoted spirit and genial personality made a deep and lasting impression. Superannuated in 1885, he lived in Toronto until his death in 1894.

WOON, WILLIAM (1804-1858), NEW ZEALAND Methodist minister, was of Cornish birth, and served a lengthy apprenticeship to the printing trade. In 1831 he went to TONGA as a lay agent and there did valuable work translating and printing the Scriptures. Because of ill health he purposed returning to England. However, when the ship called at Hokianga in January 1834, he was persuaded to remain with the New Zealand Mission. For some years (except for a brief term at Kawhia, 1834-35), he was in charge of the Mission Printing Press at Mangungu. Later he was again appointed to Kawhia (1844) and then to South Taranaki (1846-53). Possessed of a fine singing voice, he was affectionately known among the Maoris as "the Organ."

In 1853, he retired to Wanganui, where he resided until his death on Sept. 22, 1858.

WOOSLEY, OSCAR VERGUS (1881-1958), American layman and educator, was born in WINSTON-SALEM, N. C., April 10, 1881, the son of John E. and Pauline Sophia (Fishe) Woosley. He was educated at Guilford College, receiving his A.B. degree in 1905.

After college he became a teacher in the public school system of NORTH CAROLINA. In 1917 O. V. Woosley, always a deeply consecrated layman, entered the full-time service of the M.E. Church, South, as superintendent of the WESTERN NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE Sunday School Board. His wife was Nell Maxwell, whom he married in 1918.

After directing the Christian education work of the Western North Carolina Conference for more than twelve years, he resigned this position to become superintendent and treasurer of the Children's Home, Winston-Salem, N. C. He continued in this capacity until his retirement in 1954.

Oscar Woosley was a distinctive personality, possessed of a contagious enthusiasm which he applied to all of his activities. He served his Church as a trustee of both BREVARD COLLEGE and the Methodist Home for the Aged, member of Conference and General Boards of Hospitals and Homes, delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCE from 1930 to 1952, and member of the 1939 Uniting Conference.

He died Jan. 12, 1958.

WORCESTER, MASSACHUSETTS, U.S.A., located forty miles west of BOSTON on the Blackstone River and Lake Quinsigamond, was settled in 1713. It is known today both as an industrial area with some 700 manufacturing establishments, and as a cultural center with five colleges, two junior colleges, and more than 100 buildings for religious use. Once the home of the inventors Elias Howe and Eli Whitney, and of "the father of rocketry," Robert H. Goddard, here is located the American Antiquarian Society (founded 1812) and the Worcester Art Museum.

On Oct. 15, 1740 GEORGE WHITEFIELD preached in Worcester. ASBURY visited here on several occasions but there is no record of his preaching. The first class was organized by local preacher William Routledge in 1833. From a rented room the group moved to the Town Hall. The following year Emory Washburn was permitted to organize thirteen people into the "Methodist Episcopal Religious Society in the Town of Worcester." GEORGE PICKERING was appointed pastor in 1835; a church was erected in 1837; here the NEW ENGLAND CONFERENCE met in 1841. Destroyed by fire in 1844, a new church facing the Common was built in 1846. By 1876 there were five Methodist churches in Worcester with Grace and Trinity the most influential. Grace Nies Fletcher's book In My Father's House, described Worcester Methodism in these years. In 1923 the congregations of Grace and Trinity merged to form Wesley Church, located at the heart of the city in a monumental Gothic edifice.

Today there are six Methodist churches in Worcester: Aldersgate, Covenant, Epworth, Quinsigamond, St. Andrew's and Wesley with an aggregate membership of 3,720 and 1,062 students enrolled in the church schools.

Wesley Church is the largest Methodist church in New England and one of the largest in the NORTHEASTERN JURISDICTION.

As the mother church in the city, it inherits the heritage of a line of forerunners that stretches back to the Church-in-the-Meadows, the first Methodist building in the city. A Francis Asbury window commemorates the visit of the Bishop.

Wesley Church is a well-preserved million dollar structure. The stained glass windows are outstanding in their beauty and perfection. Among them is a Wesley family window; one for the first bishops to INDIA, CHINA, and AFRICA; one for early American Methodists and circuit riders; and windows for prominent women of the Bible and of modern times. The Te Deum Laudamus window in the chancel and the rose window over the entrance are in the highest traditions of the stained glass art. Today the church carries on a vigorous ministry in the inner-city as well as to people of the entire area. Religious education, music and the pulpit are the chief avenues of creative ministry. The 1970 report indicated 2,022 members.

WORKMAN, HERBERT BROOK (1862-1951), British Methodist historical scholar and educationalist, was born at Peckham in LONDON in 1862. He was educated at KINGSWOOD SCHOOL and Owen's College, Manchester, and entered the Wesleyan Methodist ministry in 1885. After serving in various English circuits he went to WESTMINSTER Teachers' Training COLLEGE, of which he was principal from 1903 to 1930. He was elected president of the Wesleyan Methodist CONFERENCE in 1930; he had given the FERNLEY LECTURE in 1906, taking as his subject Persecution in the Early Church, a book which is still in print. He was Cole Lecturer at VANDERBILT UNIVERSITY, Nashville, Tenn., 1916, and temporary professor of Methodist Church history at the University of Chicago in 1927. He was awarded the Litt.D. of London University, and the D.D. (Hon.) of Aberdeen University. His main historical interests lay in the medieval period. He published The Letters of John Hus (1904), The Evolution of the Monastic Ideal (1913), and a two-volume study of John Wyclif (1926). In 1900 he produced Christian Thought to the Reformation, a work often used as a textbook by those teaching the history of Christian doctrine. In 1909 he wrote for the New History of Methodism, of which he was one of the editors, an introductory chapter entitled "The Place of Methodism in the Catholic Church." This was afterward published separately, and is famous as an attempt to state the place of Methodism in the progress and development of the Catholic Church, over against a school of theologians, more common in 1900 than it is now, who denied that Methodism was essentially a part of the life history of the Catholic Church at all. "In the story of Methodism," he wrote, "only the blind and the irreverent can fail to discern the presence and power of the Master."

WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, with principal headquarters in GENEVA, SWITZERLAND, is a fellowship of more than 200 churches (communions, denominations) of Protestant, Anglican, Orthodox, and Old Catholic confessions. "They gather for study, witness, service, and the advancement of unity."

The churches in the Council come from more than eighty countries living under many forms of government, and with many varieties of Christian tradition and culture. But their basis of membership in the Council is one and simple: "The World Council of Churches is a fellowship of churches which confess the Lord Jesus Christ as God and Saviour according to the Scriptures, and therefore seek to fulfill together their common calling to the glory of the one God, Father, Son, and Holy Spirit."

The Council affirms that it is not a superchurch since it does not legislate for its members; rather it is the organization through which the churches enter into dialogue with each other about creed, ministry, government, program, and missionary work; helps them seek unity; and unites them in meeting human need and in witnessing to the Lordship of Christ.

The World Council of Churches had its earliest rootage in the international missionary conference in Edinburgh, SCOTLAND, in 1910; and later rootage in the INTERNATIONAL MISSIONARY COUNCIL (founded in 1921), the Faith and Order Movement (1927), and the Life and Work Movement (1925). The work of all three is now incorporated in the World Council. The general assemblies of the Council (held every six or seven years) have been: Amsterdam, the Netherlands, 1948; EVANSTON, Illinois, 1954; New Delhi, INDIA, 1961; UPPSALA, Sweden, 1968.

American and British Methodists have been active in leadership in the World Council of Churches since its formation. JOHN R. MOTT, who presided over the Edinburgh Missionary Conference in 1910, was honorary president of the Council when first organized; and presidents of the Council have included Bishop G. BROMLEY OXNAM, Bishop SANTE UBERTO BARBIERI (Argentina), and Dr. CHARLES C. PARLIN. The Council has an American office at 475 Riverside Drive, New York City.

WORLD FAMILY LIFE COMMITTEE is an outgrowth of the Family Life Conferences in the United States. Bishop HAZEN G. WERNER was appointed by the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1964 to help develop among the Methodists across the world an awareness of Christian Family Living in which "the Christian family is committed to behavior in keeping with Christian ideals for family relations, community life, and national and world citizenship." (Discipline, T.M.C., 1964, Paragraph 1821.)

Regional family life conferences were held in INDIA, KOREA, AFRICA, and other parts of the world. As an outgrowth of these, the First World Methodist Conference on Family Life met in LONDON, Aug. 17, 1966, and this was preceded by a four-day seminar for selected delegates from thirty-six countries. Officers were selected from seven areas of the world, and this group became a committee of the World Methodist Council.

WORLD FEDERATION OF METHODIST WOMEN. The idea of the World Federation of Methodist Women came from Asia in the 1920's. In 1923, HELEN KIM, later President of EWAH UNIVERSITY in SEOUL, KOREA, was a student at OHIO WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY, and she had been asked by the Executive Committee of The WOMAN'S FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY (ME) to speak at DES MOINES, Iowa. Frightened by this assignment, she went to the prayer room before her speech. As she prayed she had a vision of a world fellowship of all Christian women. She entered the sanctuary of the large church, was ushered to the platform, and gave her famous address. "To the Women of the World." "This is the time of times," she said, "when women of the world need to come together into a Women's International Association with its membership including delegates from all kinds of organizations of women in each country." This in 1923, was a revolutionary idea to many American women, but a few, including Mrs. THOMAS NICHOLSON, President of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society, had the same idea and wondered how it could be implemented.

Four years later, in 1927, the Chinese women were celebrating the tenth anniversary of the China Women's Society, and they too wanted an international fellowship of women. They wrote to their sponsoring organization, The Woman's Missionary Council, saying, "What a work! What a sisterhood it is! The Jubilee in America! The tenth anniversary in China! Americans working in China! China working in Africa, and the women of the whole wide world joining hands to bring in the Kingdom of God. The creation of a world sisterhood begins when the field of service is entered. It is indeed a thrilling story—this cementing of friendship with women and girls of other races and conditions of life, a friendship with women which will last through eternity because it is founded on the love of Jesus Christ.” The Woman’s Missionary Council took up this challenge and kept in close touch with its conference organizations around the world.

Two years later, the Woman’s Foreign Missionary Society acted on the plan of the Korean women and organized its International Department. The women of fourteen countries asked that a separate organization be formed in which each autonomous unit could share equally with all others. On Oct. 26, 1939, the First Assembly of The World Federation of Methodist Women met. Delegates from twenty-seven lands signed the charter and constitution. The basis of membership was: “A fellowship of such organized groups as will accept Jesus Christ as the revelation of God and the Savior of Mankind and will affirm their purpose, ‘To Know Him and to Make Him Known.’”

When the three Methodist churches of the United States came together, the World Federation of Methodist Women was recognized by the 1940 GENERAL CONFERENCE as an official organization of The Methodist Church, and the WOMAN’S SOCIETY OF CHRISTIAN SERVICE became a unit of the World Federation.

In 1944, the Second Assembly of The World Federation of Methodist Women re-affirmed the motto with a new wording, “To Know Christ and Make Him Known.” The Scripture (Revelation 22:2) was chosen as the special scripture for the new organization, and The Tree of Life, suggested by Lucy Wang of China, became the official symbol of the World Federation.

In 1948, the third Assembly of The World Federation met at Boston, Mass., and a twelve-point program was adopted as the working basis for all units. This program is symbolized by “The Tree of Life” with its twelve fruits “to His Glory”: evangelism, medical work, education, literature, children, youth, home and family life, rural projects, economic justice, international friendship, temperance, and world peace.

In 1952 the fourth Assembly gathered at Berkeley, Calif., with delegates from twenty-nine units meeting for a three-day seminar to exchange ideas, program materials, and to deepen their spiritual lives. The assembly voted to ask other Methodist groups, besides those connected with the American Methodist church, to join the World Federation.

In 1956 the new world-wide World Federation of Methodist Women was organized at Lake Junaluska, N. C., and it became known as the First Assembly. At this time a new constitution was signed by forty-one units representing the women of the British tradition, Australasian, and African, both in United States and on the continent bearing the name Africa, in addition to those who were already members of the Federation. This federation became an affiliate of the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL and set its meeting date three days prior and at the same place as the quinquennial World Methodist Council meeting. Every woman’s organization whose parent body is a member of the World Methodist Council was eligible for membership in The World Federation of Methodist Women.

In 1961 the World Federation met before the meeting of the World Methodist Council in Oslo, Norway. There were delegates from fifty-two units in forty-seven countries. It was voted to include women from churches united and uniting, if one of their constituting bodies had been Methodist.

In 1966 the Third Assembly of the World Federation was held at Southlands College, near London, England. There were sixty units representing fifty-five countries (Rhodesia with two units, and the United States with five). A leadership training for all women, especially in the developing countries, was launched. Plans included: 1) A representative of the World Federation to become a seminar assistant for in-service training at the Methodist Office for United Nations for at least a year, beginning in the fall of 1966. (Other seminar assistants to be chosen for training later.) 2) Regionals for leadership training to be held in various areas of the world. 3) Representatives from various parts of the world to be chosen as observers at commissions of The United Nations, to be a part of the Churches Commission on International Affairs of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES quota. The new officers for 1966-1971 represented four continents, the president from Asia, the vice-president from Africa, the secretary from Australia, and the treasurer from North America. The sixty units are organized into nine areas, each with a President, and four of the areas with vice-presidents who also help implement the program. The World Federation with its sixty units and six million members has become relevant for today’s needs, problems, and for tomorrow’s possibilities.

WORLD METHODIST CONFERENCES began under the name Ecumenical Methodist Conference in the year 1881. These conferences continued at ten-year intervals through 1931, when, because of World War II, the Seventh Conference was delayed until 1947.

The origin of the Ecumenical Methodist Conference is an interesting historical study in itself. On May 31, 1876, the GENERAL CONFERENCE of the M.E. Church sitting in BALTIMORE, Md., “adopted a preamble and resolutions setting forth grounds on which it appeared desirable that a conference should be called together, representing all the diversified bodies of Methodists which had sprung up throughout the world.”

The committee which was appointed by the 1876 General Conference of the M.E. Church corresponded with the different Methodist churches of America. There was such unanimity of opinion that there should be such a conference, that in May 1878 a letter inviting their concurrence was sent to the British Conference of the Wesleyan Methodists. A British committee was appointed to consider the proposal and report to the conference in 1879. A favorable report was made and was adopted by the British Conference in session in BIRMINGHAM, England in August 1879.

As a result of committee activity in all parts of the Methodist world, there assembled in CINCINNATI, Ohio, on May 6, 1880, “such a combined committee of Methodist churches as had never before come together.” One of the most interesting aspects of this meeting was the fact that “for the first time since 1844, when the American church was divided, did Bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, meet at the same board with Bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church.”

With such planning and interest as a background the first Ecumenical Methodist Conference opened on Sept. 7, 1881 at City Road Chapel, LONDON. There were delegates and representatives from twenty-eight different Methodist denominations present.

The Conference lasted for twelve days, hearing many sermons and addresses dealing with general themes of Methodist interests. The organization of the conference was handled by a business committee of twenty persons selected equally from the four divisions of the Methodist world. As in all subsequent conferences, this first one did not seek to legislate for or invade the autonomy of the various churches represented. Instead it sought to deepen the fellowship of Methodist peoples over the barriers of race, nationality, and language.

The Second Ecumenical Methodist Conference met in the Metropolitan M.E. Church, WASHINGTON, D. C., Oct. 7-20, 1891. The program pattern followed was essentially that of the First Conference, except that the organizational structure began to become more evident. The list of officers reveals that there were twenty-five presidents and four secretaries.

The Third Conference was once again held at City Road, London, Sept. 4-17, 1901. The list of presidents was reduced to thirteen with the four secretaries.

The first departure from the "pattern of location" which had been alternating between England and the United States occurred in 1911 when the Fourth Ecumenical Methodist Conference was held in the Metropolitan Methodist Church of TORONTO, CANADA. The dates were Oct. 4-17, 1911. On this occasion the number of presidents was increased to thirty with the usual four secretaries.

The Fifth Conference returned to England in 1921. This time the location was changed from City Road to Central Hall, Westminster, London. The number of presidents was again reduced, this time to twenty-two, with the four secretaries. There was, however, another change in the conference format with the number of days reduced to ten—Sept. 5-16, 1921.

Wesley Memorial Church, ATLANTA, Ga., was the site of the Sixth Conference, Oct. 16-25, 1931. Again the length of the sessions was shortened. There were fifteen presidents with three secretaries and one associate secretary.

The sixteen-year interval between the Sixth and Seventh Ecumenical Conferences necessitated considerable change in organization. Many of the leaders of 1931 were passing off the scene by the time the Conference met in Springfield, Mass., Sept. 24—Oct. 2, 1947. Names of such leaders as Bishop IVAN LEE HOLT, HAROLD ROBERTS, OSCAR T. OLSON, BISHOP PAUL N. GARBER, ELMER T. CLARK, Bishop S. L. GREENE, MALDWIN L. EDWARDS, ERIC W. BAKER, Stanley Leyland, W. E. SANGSTER, Wesley Boyd, CHARLES C. PARLIN, EDWIN L. JONES, RALPH W. SOCKMAN, E. BENSON PERKINS, J. B. WEBB, Setareki Tuilovoni, Bishop W. J. WALLS and many others who were to become the mainstays of the Conference, were becoming prominent in its affairs.

Some of the ideas which had strong support in this session were the organization of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, a more effective evangelistic witness, stronger and more frequent contacts between various sections of the Methodist world and a modernized structure in keeping with other World Confessional Organizations.

Looking to these changes, the following report of the Committee on reorganization was presented:

There should be a reorganization of the Ecumenical Methodist Conference, but in order that there may not be too much of a break with the past we propose as officers, to serve until the next Ecumenical Conference: two presidents, two vice-presidents, two secretaries, two treasurers.

Officers elected were:

Chairmen: Bishop Ivan Lee Holt, Wilbert F. Howard
Vice-Chairmen: Bishop Paul N. Garber, A. Victor Murray
Secretaries: Oscar Thomas Olson, Harold Roberts
Treasurers: M. S. Davage, Benjamin Gregory

The Eighth session of the Ecumenical Methodist Conference met in OXFORD, England, Aug. 28—Sept. 7, 1951. It was at this session that the name was changed to World Methodist Council and the Conference continued as the inspirational segment of the Council/Conference sessions. A constitution was adopted and the decision was made to meet at five year intervals. The officers elected were

President: Bishop Ivan Lee Holt
Vice-President: Harold Roberts
The Secretariat: Elmer T. Clark and E. Benson Perkins
Treasurer: Duncan Coomer
Associate Treasurer: Edwin L. Jones

The Ninth World Methodist Council/Conference met at LAKE JUNALUSKA, N. C., U.S.A., Aug. 27—Sept. 12, 1956. The officers elected at this time were: Harold Roberts, President; Bishop Ivan Lee Holt, Past President; Bishop FRED P. CORSON, Oscar T. Olson, Charles C. Parlin, Bishop S. L. Greene, Mrs. OTTILIA DE O. CHAVES, J. B. Webb, James S. Mather, A. HAROLD WOOD, Vice-Presidents; Elmer T. Clark and E. Benson Perkins, Secretaries; Edwin L. Jones and L. A. Ellwood, Treasurers. During this session the World Methodist Council headquarters building at Lake Junaluska was dedicated.

The Tenth World Methodist Council/Conference was held for the first time on the European continent at OSLO, Norway, Aug. 17-25, 1961. In Council sessions, the constitution was revised, and new officers were elected as follows:

President: Bishop Fred P. Corson
Past Presidents: Harold Roberts and Bishop Ivan Lee Holt
Vice-Presidents: Bishop Roy H. Short, Bishop Odd Hagen, Eric W. Baker, J. B. Webb, Bishop Sante Uberto Barbieri, Oscar T. Olson, Frank Hamby, B. M. Chrystall, Charles C. Parlin, Mrs. R. J. Latham, Bishop Herbert Bell Shaw
General Secretaries: Lee F. Tuttle and Max W. Woodward
Secretaries Emeritus: Elmer T. Clark and E. Benson Perkins
Treasurers: Edwin L. Jones and L. A. Ellwood

The Eleventh World Methodist Council/Conference met at Westminster, Central Hall, London, England, Aug. 18-26, 1966. More than 2,000 Council Members, Conference delegates and accredited visitors from more than sixty countries were present. The officers elected were:

President: Bishop Odd Hagen
Past Presidents: Bishop Fred P. Corson, Harold Roberts, Bishop Ivan Lee Holt
Vice-Presidents: Eric Baker, Bernard Chrystall, Carlos T. Cattinoni, Cecil F. Gribble, D. T. Niles, Patrocinio Ocampo, Charles C. Parlin, Bishop Herbert Bell Shaw, Hugh B. Sherlock, Bishop Roy H. Short, J. B. Webb

General Secretaries: Lee F. Tuttle, Max W. Woodward
 Secretaries Emeritus: Elmer T. Clark, E. Benson Perkins
 Treasurers: Edwin L. Jones, L. A. Ellwood

The most important action was the appointment of a committee with strong powers to recommend and guide restructuring of the Council/Conference so that it would become more fully representative of the entire world. Action in this direction was set in motion so as to become the main work of the Twelfth Council/Conference to be held in DENVER, Colo., U.S.A. in 1971.

During the quadrennium 1966-71 the President, Bishop ODD HAGEN, died, and Charles C. Parlin was elected to fill out his term of office.

WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL is an association of twenty-one different Methodist denominational groups at work in eighty-six countries of the world. According to its purpose as stated in its constitution, "it does not seek to legislate for them nor to invade their autonomy. Rather it exists to serve them and to give unity to their witness and enterprise."

Although the name World Methodist Council was adopted in 1951, the Council dates from 1881 when the first Ecumenical Methodist Conference met in LONDON, England, with some 400 delegates from thirty Methodist bodies throughout the world in attendance. As the Ecumenical Methodist Conference, this world organization convened at ensuing ten-year intervals, with the exception of the 1941 Conference, which because of World War II was not held until 1947.

The 1947 Conference, which was the seventh such gathering, changed the interval at which the Conferences were held. The eighth Conference met in 1951, and since that time the interval between meetings has been five years. It was at the 1951 Conference in OXFORD, England, that the name was changed from Ecumenical Conference to World Methodist Conference. Organizational changes were also brought about then which made the World Methodist Council similar in form to other world conciliar organizations.

With the name change there came also the setting up of a permanent secretariat with headquarters in both the United States and Great Britain. Two secretaries were elected, but the administration of the council was unified by the selection of only one set of officers. The first officers of the Council were Bishop IVAN LEE HOLT, President; HAROLD ROBERTS, Vice-President; EDWIN L. JONES and L. A. Ellwood, Treasurers; and ELMER T. CLARK and E. BENSON PERKINS, Secretaries.

In 1953 by authority of the World Executive Committee and the Executive Committee of Section XIII, representing The Methodist Church, U.S.A., headquarters in America were established at LAKE JUNALUSKA, N. C., and a handsome stone headquarters building was erected. This building, which contains offices, a library, a reading room and one of the outstanding collections of Wesleyana in the world, was dedicated at the Ninth World Methodist Conference which was held at Lake Junaluska in 1956. Indicating something of the growth of the Council, the headquarters building has twice been enlarged to take care of the expanding work and completing the architectural design.

At the OSLO World Conference in 1961, LEE F. TUTTLE

became the first full-time Secretary of the council, succeeding Elmer T. Clark. At this same Conference MAX W. WOODWARD was elected to succeed E. Benson Perkins, but remained on a part-time basis until 1964. From that time until 1969, he gave full time to the work of the Council. In 1969 Lee F. Tuttle became the single General Secretary with a new title. The office of GENEVA Secretary was created for the administrative officer of the Geneva, Switzerland office.

While the format of the eleven Conferences has changed considerably with an increasingly serious purpose, the Conferences continue to hold tremendous appeal to Methodists from throughout the world. The 1966 Conference in London officially registered 2,090 delegates and Council Members from sixty-four countries of the world, and there were hundreds who attended unofficially.

In 1951 at Oxford an extensive program of publishing was planned including a Who's Who in Methodism, an Album of Methodist History, an annotated edition of the Journal and Letters of Francis Asbury, and an Encyclopedia of World Methodism. This program of publication has been duly carried out with the publication of this Encyclopedia.

Since 1946 the Council has sponsored a program of ministerial exchanges between Methodist ministers of different countries for both long and short periods. This exchange program has been highly successful and continues to grow rapidly. What started with exchanges between British and American Methodist ministers has now reached out to include GERMANY, SWITZERLAND, SWEDEN, INDIA, NEW ZEALAND, CANADA, and other countries.

Within the past decade an important contribution has been made to Methodist theologians through the OXFORD INSTITUTE OF METHODIST THEOLOGICAL STUDIES, held at four-year intervals at Lincoln College, Oxford, England. On each occasion 100 theologians representing all areas of the world participate by invitation in this enterprise. Three such institutes have been held.

WORLD PARISH is the official periodical of the Council and is published nine times each year under the editorship of the Secretary resident in the United States. Since the new format was adopted in mid-1962, circulation has increased from 1,200 to 7,000 and continues its growth. News of Methodism in all parts of the world makes up the contents of this periodical.

The Council has been actively involved in every phase of the ECUMENICAL MOVEMENT through close consultation and cooperation with the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, national and regional councils, as well as being the agency responsible for Methodist observers at the second Vatican Council from 1962 until its conclusion in 1965. At the London World Conference in 1966, for the first time observers were present from the Roman Catholic Church by invitation. The Council also set up a committee to meet with a similar committee representing the Roman Catholic Church to conduct conversations at the world level.

One of the most important and potentially far-reaching decisions of the 1966 Council was the creation of a Committee on Structure and Program to review the past work of the World Methodist Council and to make recommendations to later Executive and Council meetings on expanded structure and procedure.

WORLD MISSIONARY CONFERENCE, Edinburgh. (See ECUMENICITY AND THE METHODIST CHURCH.)

WORLD OUTLOOK, a monthly periodical, is the official organ of the BOARD OF MISSIONS of The United Methodist Church. It began publication under the name of The Missionary Voice in January 1911, as the official missionary periodical of the M.E. Church, South. The name was changed to World Outlook in May 1932.

In January 1932, a rotogravure picture section appeared, and when the name became World Outlook a cover in full color was added, and it became typographically the finest missionary magazine in the world.

The periodical always had two editors, a man and a woman, representing the two sections of the Board of Missions. When the three large Methodist bodies of American Methodism were unified in 1939, World Outlook became the official organ of the Board of Missions and Church Extension, although the Woman's Division started another publication, which was originally intended to publish mainly the study materials for the woman's societies. In 1964 World Outlook for the first time in its history was placed under the direction of one editor.

In February 1970, World Outlook merged with New, a publication of the Commission on Ecumenical Mission and Relation of the United Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A., to become New/World Outlook. Arthur J. Moore, Jr. is the editor.

WORLD PEACE, COMMISSION ON, an agency of The Methodist Church, U.S.A., which was formally so named at the time of Methodist Union in 1939. The GENERAL CONFERENCE of the M.E. Church had set up a Committee on World Peace in 1924 for which very limited funds were available. This functioned largely through the staff of the BOARD OF EDUCATION. In 1928 the committee employed an executive secretary, but by 1932 the funds were no longer available for this purpose due to the severe economic depression.

In 1936 the General Conference Commission on World Peace of the M.E. Church was established with a limited budget and staff with its office in CHICAGO. This agency cooperated with other denominations and peace organizations in education concerning international issues and action on important matters of foreign policy. It established a permanent register for Methodist conscientious objectors.

At the time of church union in 1939, the Commission on World Peace became an established agency in The Methodist Church. During the years of World War II it cooperated closely with the COUNCIL OF BISHOPS and many other church agencies in the Crusade for a New World Order. This entailed large meetings across the country, local study of proposals for a United Nations permanent organization, and strong support for U. S. Senate ratification of the U.N. Charter drafted in 1945.

During the years after World War II, an active program of education concerning the United Nations and international organization was conducted, including the program of "seminars" on the U.N. in NEW YORK CITY. An office was established in the Carnegie International Peace Center, which later led to the idea of the Church Center for the United Nations. Prominent in the leadership of the Commission on World Peace over the years were RALPH W. SOCKMAN who served as Chairman for thirty years, ERNEST F. TITTLE, GEORGIA HARKNESS, Bishop G. BROMLEY OXNAM, and the Executive Secretary from 1936 to 1960, CHARLES F. BOSS, JR.

WORLD SERVICE AND FINANCE, COUNCIL ON, of The United Methodist Church is an incorporated body which receives and administers the general funds of the church. The different Churches which have united to form The United Methodist Church have each had commissions and committees on general finance and general budgets, with elected or appointed treasurers to hold in trust and administer their necessary connectional funds.

After union and up until 1952, The Methodist Church had a general Commission on World Service and Finance, a corporation licensed under the laws of ILLINOIS. But the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1952, following the recommendations of a survey commission which at that time made recommendations with reference to all agencies of the Church, directed that the name of the body should hereafter be the Council on World Service and Finance, and its name was so changed.

The Discipline specifies the membership on this powerful Council. Upon it at present are two bishops who are nominated by the COUNCIL OF BISHOPS, and two ministers and two lay persons from each JURISDICTION. There are also seven members at large, at least three of whom are women. These members are not, however, elected by the Jurisdictions, but by the General Conference itself, and no member of the Council not even a bishop, is eligible for membership on, or employment by, any other general agency in the Church—except the Church's Board of TRUSTEES.

The Council prepares and presents the report concerning the church-wide budget and assessments (which are due during each quadrennium) to the General Conference at the beginning of each quadrennium. It must also administer the huge funds which are entrusted to its keeping. The Council works out an equitable schedule of apportionment by which the total World Service budget is distributed and apportioned to the Annual Conferences. The General Conference, as final authority, takes these reports for its "action and determination."

Among the general funds administered by the Council are the World Service Fund, the General Administration Fund, the Episcopal Fund, and certain miscellaneous funds.

The World Service Fund represents that part of the general budget of the Church which is administered for the support of the executive agencies of the Church, such as missions, education and the general boards. The General Administration Fund provides for the expenses of the sessions of the General Conference, for those of the JUDICIAL COUNCIL, and for such committees and commissions as may be constituted by the General Conference apart from the World Service Boards and Agencies. This Fund is apportioned on an equitable basis to the Annual Conferences after the General Conference has adopted it. No Annual Conference and no charge or local church is allowed to change or revise their apportionment for the general administration budget.

The Episcopal Fund is raised separately from all other funds and is considered a part of the money raised for ministerial support. It provides for the salaries and expenses of effective bishops, for the support of retired bishops, and for that of widows and minor children of deceased bishops. The Council on World Service and Finance recommends to each General Conference the amounts to be fixed as salaries and administrative expense of the effective bishops, and also for the pensions for retired bishops and the widows and minor children of deceased bishops.

Other general funds of The United Methodist Church are the Methodist Investment Fund administered by the National Division of the Board of Missions, and what is called the Temporary General Aid Fund used to supplement the pensions and salaries of the former Central Jurisdictional members. For these regulations in re these funds, the current Discipline must be referred to.

A Department of RECORDS AND STATISTICS is also administered under this Council, as well as a Convention Bureau and a TRANSPORTATION OFFICE.

In each Annual Conference, there is an Annual Conference Commission on World Service and Finance which has responsibilities within its own Conference for seeing that the general apportionments of World Service of the Church are properly apportioned out; and where an Annual Conference has also a separate budget, as most do, this must also be properly apportioned to the districts and charges. Usually the combined askings from the Council on World Service and those of the Annual Conference Commission on World Service are termed "World Service and Annual Conference Benevolences." Conference Commissions on World Service and Finance, unless they be directed otherwise, have the right to estimate the total amount necessary for the support of the district superintendents and to determine the amount needed for their salaries. Annual Conferences which wish to do so may, however, provide that the support for the respective district superintendents shall be made by the Board of District Stewards in each of the several districts.

WORLD'S STUDENT CHRISTIAN FEDERATION. The Student Christian Movement (SCM) comprised the inter-related organizations promoting religious activity among young men and women of the colleges and universities from about the 1850's onward. (Among the organizations were the Young Men's Christian Association, American Intercollegiate Young Men's Christian Association, Inter-seminary Missionary Alliance, STUDENT VOLUNTEER MOVEMENT, and others.) The SCM was widespread, active not only in Britain and America, but GERMANY, Scandinavia, INDIA, CHINA, and elsewhere.

JOHN R. MOTT, a Methodist layman, did more than any other one person to bring the various SCM's into a world union and fellowship of Christian students under the name of the World's Student Christian Federation (WSCF). Others, such as James B. Reynolds and Luther D. Wishard, greatly helped.

Mott served for two years as an associate in the YMCA's college department, organizing conferences. In 1890 he assumed full responsibility for the work. Dwight L. Moody had impressed Mott with the possibility of a growing Christian unity through large (in conception and understanding) EVANGELISM; and Mott was further influenced while serving as executive secretary of the Student Volunteer Movement (SVM) by its missionary passion and world outreach. He began to think far beyond denominational lines. He became a secretary of the International Committee of the YMCA.

In 1891, at the Amsterdam meeting of the World's Alliance of the YMCA, Mott gave probably his first serious thought to developing a world fellowship of Christian students. He called together some student leaders from different lands to discuss the matter. By 1894 Mott was convinced that the time was ripe for a world-wide union of Christian students. He wanted to retain diversity, allowing for the richness of "particular genius and character" in the developing national SCM's. They were to be linked together in a simple yet effective Federation.

In August 1895, six men met together in Vadstena Castle, SWEDEN, to form the Federation. They represented five Student Movements: the American, the British, the German, the Scandinavian, and "The Student Christian Movement in Mission Lands," the last to include within the Federation all the non-Occidental Student Movements not closely organized at that time. They chose Karl Fries of Sweden to be chairman and John R. Mott as general secretary.

The Federation's purpose was to unite the SCM's of the world to lead students to become disciples of Jesus Christ as only Saviour and God, to quicken their spiritual life, and to enlist them in extending the Kingdom of Christ throughout the whole world. The Federation had no authority except the integrity and vision of its leaders. It could not command, but could suggest and serve. The Federation was evangelistic, influenced by the SVM's watchword, "The evangelization of the world in this generation."

The WSCF sought a unity, at home and abroad, transcending national and denominational lines, but encouraged each national Student Movement to develop along its own distinctive lines and under its own leadership. It emphasized the practical, for along with theological aspects it demanded action and service for the world-wide extension and establishment of the Kingdom of Christ.

The Federation's seventh conference, held in Tokyo in 1907, was the first international conference of any kind, secular or religious, to be held in the East.

The WSCF was influential in bringing into the ecumenical movement the influential Anglo-Catholic element of the Church of England. Also, the conference of the WSCF in Constantinople in 1911 drew the ancient Eastern Churches, for centuries largely isolated from Western Christendom, into touch with the emerging ecumenical movement. In common counsel and fellowship sat members of the Greek Orthodox, Syrian, Armenian, Coptic, Protestant, and Roman Catholic communions. The conference had the blessing of the Ecumenical Patriarch and other leaders of the ancient Eastern Churches. Its aim was to extend the SCM throughout the Near East, and student members of the Eastern Churches were welcomed to the movement. SCM's were organized in many more nations, such as Rumania, Serbia, Bulgaria, Greece, and Russia.

The WSCF suffered during the World Wars, but contributed greatly to European Student Relief, which sought to bring relief to starving fellow students. The WSCF also sought to help displaced persons and refugees. In the early 1920's, the SCM and YMCA fostered the Russian Student Christian Movement in Exile, following the migration or expulsion of at least a million White Russians into Europe.

The Student Movement produced a group of leaders who were to play a great role in the life of the Church. To name only a few, there were: Joseph H. Oldham, Nathan Söderblom, William Temple, John R. Mott, Robert Wilder, W. A. Visser 't Hooft, V. S. Azariah, and many others.

Lay movements, since they are not Churches, are not members of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES (WCC). However, the constitution of the WCC provides for a consultative relationship with the WSCF and other lay movements.

WORSHIP IN AMERICAN METHODISM, Informal Worship:

As may be gathered from the account of worship as it developed in British Methodism, the CLASS MEETINGS, the BANDS, and the LOVE FEASTS gave Methodism a unique type of religious practice, which may be treated under the general head of worship. Their habits and methods of conduct became fixed and will be described below as they were in English Methodism. When JOHN WESLEY was criticized for certain of these practices, he replied, "These are prudential helps, grounded on reason, and experience, in order to apply the general rules given in the scripture to particular experiences" (Works, Emory edition, 1850, V, p. 1831). Class meetings especially became a powerful force for self-examination, which led to purification and forgiveness, and heightened the members' sense of duty and responsibility.

In Wesley's Plain Account of the People Called Methodists (Works, V., pp. 176-194), the reader will find a detailed description of the genesis of these meetings. Obviously, relying on James' exhortation (4:13-16), Wesley wrote:

In order to "confess our faults one to another" and "pray one for another" that we may be healed, we intend,

- (1) to meet once a week, at the least.
- (2) to come punctually at the hour appointed.
- (3) to begin with singing and prayer; to speak each of us in order, freely and plainly, the true state of our souls, with the faults we have committed in thought, word, or deed, and the temptations we have felt since our last meeting.
- (4) to desire some person among us (thence called the leader) to speak his own state first, and then to ask the rest, in order, as many and as searching questions as may be, concerning their state, sins, and temptations (Works, V., p. 183).

John Wesley, without realizing it, anticipated modern phraseology which has become known as "group therapy." The Wesley plan was to have the men "to meet me every Wednesday evening," and "the women on Sunday . . . that they might receive such particular instructions . . . as might be most needful for them." This has proved to be very wise. He summarized his directions by saying that no extensive rules were needed, except "let nothing spoken in this society be spoken again" (Works, V., p. 185). Thus men to men, women to women, they bared their inner feelings one to another, without embarrassment or worry about later gossip and tale-bearing.

The growth effect of these devotional meetings was notable. "They began 'to bear each others' burdens' and naturally to 'care for each other' . . . And 'speaking the truth in love, they grew up into Him in all things, who is the Head, even Christ'" (ibid., p. 180). So he added, "Many of these soon recovered the ground they had lost. Yea, they rose higher than before, being more watchful than ever, and more meek and lowly, as well as stronger in faith" (ibid., p. 184).

American Methodists followed these British features and continued the Class Meetings, the Bands, and the Love Feasts as has been stated.

FRANCIS ASBURY in his Journal (I, p. 131) made this significant observation:

In meeting the Bands, I showed them the impropriety and danger of keeping their thoughts or fears of each other to themselves. This frustrates the design of Bands; produces coolness and jealousies toward each other; and is undoubtedly the policy of Satan.

Thus, what first appeared in English Methodism was continued in America. In addition to regular worship for large numbers, they had a type of confessional worship in small groups. The regular worship services were designed for the public; it aimed at large numbers and got them, and, as Asbury stated, it was aimed "to reach a decision."

But growth in the depth of Christian experience and in the sense of Christian duty was a further need for those who had reached a decision. This objective was carried out in the small meetings. Those who attended had to have a card, as we would now say they were "screened" by the leader. They met, men separately from women, the married separately from the unmarried. No doubt in carrying out these practices the poor preacher had meetings galore, but meetings held in this way must have had powerful influence on helping Methodists grow in the knowledge and grace of the Lord Jesus Christ; or as the Methodists then quaintly stated it, "going on to perfection."

Formal Worship. When John Wesley wrote to COKE, Asbury and the brethren in North America on Sept. 10, 1784, his letter contained this paragraph:

And I have prepared a liturgy little differing from that of the Church of England, (I think, the best constituted national church in the world) which I advise all the traveling preachers to use on the Lord's day, in all the congregations, reading the Litany only on Wednesdays and Fridays, and praying extempore on all other days. I also advise the Elders to administer The Supper of the Lord on every Lord's Day. (Works, p. 314)

It is strange that John Wesley, whose formality met so little favor in his missionary term in GEORGIA, and who himself was so informal in his preaching services of the Methodist Meeting Houses, should have sent such a formal service of worship to the pioneers of the American frontier. It is not surprising that, as Bishop HARMON succinctly pointed out in his book, The Rites and Ritual of Episcopal Methodism, the American Methodists did not adopt Wesley's order of service for the Lord's Day nor the reading of the Litany on Wednesday and Friday. The ritual for the Lord's Supper, Baptism, and other occasional offices of the Church, however, were acceptable to the Americans.

That does not mean that there was no order in American worship. On Dec. 1, 1789, a "Council" composed of Coke and Asbury (Coke however was not present), and certain of the ELDERS, met to outline the working rules of the Church. In a manuscript copy of these "Proceedings of Bishop Asbury and Presiding Elders of The Methodist Episcopal Church in Council Assembled" (which is in the GARRETT THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY Library), item one of the purposes of their meeting was, "To render the time and form of public worship, as similar as possible through all their congregations."

Further on, the "proceedings" outline the various measures which should be followed throughout the connection. The second and third of these resolutions deal with worship, to wit:

2. Public worship shall commence at 10:00 o'clock on the Lord's Day, in all places where we have societies and regular preaching, if it be practicable, and if it be not, at 11:00 o'clock.
3. The exercise of public worship on the Lord's Day shall be singing, prayer and reading of the Holy Scriptures, with exhortation or reading a sermon in the absence of a preacher: the officiating person shall be appointed by the Elder, Deacon, or Traveling Preacher for the time being.

The General Conference record of 1792 carries this notation:

- | | |
| Question, | What directions shall be given for the establishment of uniformity in public worship amongst us? |
| Answer, | <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. Let the morning service consist of singing and prayer, the reading of a chapter out of the Old Testament and another out of the New Testament, and preaching. 2. Let the afternoon service consist of singing, prayer, the reading of one chapter out of the Bible and preaching. 3. Let the evening service consist of singing, prayer and preaching. 4. But on the days of administering the Lord's Supper, the two chapters in the morning service may be omitted. 5. Let the Society be met, whenever practicable, on the Sabbath Day. (Doctrines and Discipline, (MEC) 1792, pp. 40f) |

Such a passage, often in identical wording, was thereafter carried in every issue of the Doctrines and Discipline, until 1884.

However, Methodists did not go for uniformity. In the General Conference of 1832 a committee was ordered to "inquire into the forms and customs observed by the several Annual Conferences," and to report later to the Conference. In due time the committee made the following report:

The reading of the Scriptures in the morning and afternoon services, and the public use of the Lord's Prayer is generally practiced, though not as uniformly as can be wished, and in some instances the sacraments are administered without using our prescribed and excellent forms; but in these things there has been an evident improvement the last four years, and we are confident that a proper attention to this subject in the Annual Conferences will shortly do away with all irregularity, and our public administrations will become uniform, scriptural and edifying. (Doctrines and Discipline, 1832)

From time to time frequent references to worship appeared both in the Journals of the General Conferences and in the quadrennial issues of the Discipline. But progress seemed to be slow. In the General Conference of 1888 the "Committee on Revisions" offered the following resolution:

Whereas various forms of service are being used in different churches of our denomination; and

Whereas such diversity of forms causes much embarrassment at times to strangers conducting services during the absence of the pastor; be it

Resolved that the following "form of service" be adopted by the General Conference, and that the same be printed in the Discipline, and be made part of the ritual. (Journal of the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, 1888, p. 125)

Here follows in the General Conference Journal, a quite elaborate form of service which form was adopted. However, when the Discipline appeared in print, the following editorial corrections had been made to read:

Let the morning service be ordered as far as possible, in the following manner:

1. Singing a hymn from our hymnbook
 2. Prayer . . . followed by the Lord's Prayer
 3. Readings from Old Testament and New Testament
 4. Collection
 5. Singing another hymn
 6. Preaching
 7. Short prayer for blessing on the Word
 8. Singing and Doxology
 9. Apostolic benediction
- (Par. 43, p. 38) Discipline, 1888

In the General Conference of 1892 the subject of orders of worship came up again. Action was then taken providing that the Board of Bishops—"promulgate two orders of service, one taken from the order used in England as adapted from John Wesley's original proposal, the other to be an order the bishops 'judged best,' and that each local church then adopt and follow one or the other." (Journal 1892, General Conference Methodist Episcopal Church, p. 215.) Thus, after the lapse of a century, there appeared in the Northern Church, what seems to be the first official reference to John Wesley's "Order for Morning and Evening Prayer." It should be noted, however, that the order taken as a model was not Wesley's original recommendation, but the changes wrought in it by the English Methodists.

However, the movement for liturgical reform was by no means universally acceptable. William McKinley of the MINNESOTA CONFERENCE offered a resolution, which was referred to the Committee on the State of the Church (where in the light of the above it died); namely,

Whereas, simplicity and brevity in religious services are more impressive and helpful than prolixity and tautology; and

Whereas, there are tendencies in many of our churches toward the use of prolix ritualistic forms; and,

Whereas, history shows that as ritualism grows, religion declines; therefore,

Resolved, that this General Conference be requested to adopt such measures as will arrest the growth of ritualism and maintain and perpetuate among us the simplicity and spirituality of our public and social services.

(Journal, 1892, p. 311)

The pressures for a better order of service increased in both the Northern and Southern branches of the M.E. Church. The Methodist Protestant wing of the Church continued in a simpler order of worship and made the first considerable elaboration in 1916. Northern and Southern Methodism joined in preparing the Hymnal of 1905. Here the Order of Worship, adopted in 1896, appeared in the first pages of the book. Its interesting feature is that it introduced the confessional movement after the call to worship, invocation, and first hymn.

Bishops THIRKIELD, WELCH, McDOWELL in the Northern Church, and such men as WILBUR FISK TILLET and FITZGERALD PARKER from the South, assumed important leadership in this development. Thirkield published the first Methodist book of "aids" to worship (W. P. Thirkield, Services and Prayers for Church and Home, 1918). He did not change the official service as ordered in The Discipline and printed in The Hymnal. Then he added one noteworthy feature (pp. 199 ff), the Wesley Sunday Service, along with the lectionary, prayers and collects which were part of Wesley's original. This publication was a milestone in Methodism.

The interest in better liturgy developed. Bishop Harmon's book Rites and Ritual of Episcopal Methodism (1926) was a further milestone and the first serious historical study of Methodist worship. A growing number of clergymen began to study and read in the history of worship and became more knowledgeable of the theology and form of worship.

The two Churches, joined by The Methodist Protestants, brought out the next hymnal in 1935. In it were two orders of service. The first had the Confession in place of the Creed, provided for a chant, the Creed after the Psalter. The second adhered to the earlier forms. There were two more orders of worship in the back of the volume, one being "adapted" from John Wesley's "Order of Morning and Evening Prayer." It had a better Psalter, and for the first time, a rather limited but very useful collection of prayers, confessions, and collects.

After the union of the three churches, the GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1940 appointed a "Commission on Ritual and Orders of Service" "to draw up richer and wider sources than those available up to the present time." In 1944 it was named the "Commission on Worship," and reappointed in 1948 and 1952. Bishop IVAN LEE HOLT was chairman and able leader of this working body. They prepared and presented to the General Conference of 1944 the Book of Worship for Church and Home. This was a remarkable compilation, and a far advance over Bishop Thirkield's trailblazing volume of 1918. The General Conference however did not "adopt" the book, but "authorized" its publication in line with the Commission's recommendation. Even so, it had a wide circulation among the ministers and prepared the way for the next steps.

A feature of the book lay in the elaboration of orders of service. In the early pages it printed three "services for morning worship," three services "for evening worship," and three services each termed "an order of worship for morning and evening." In addition there followed seventeen more "occasional orders for Seasons and Special Days." These services ranged from the simple to the very elaborate, with versicles, litanies, chants. It gave the churches the widest variety of services, and "aid to worship" in the way of responses, confessions, collects, prayers. The wide use of this book prepared the church for the further development which led up to the present.

In 1956, at Bishop Holt's formal retirement, he helped to influence the General Conference to make the Commission on Worship a permanent commission in the Church. This Commission was ordered to revise the Book of Worship and to make a recommendation for a new hymnal, and report four years later.

The Commission brought in a revision of the 1945 Book in 1960, with the recommendation that the study be continued until 1964. Its tentative printed report (commonly called "The Green Book") was recommended for experimental use in the services of worship throughout the Church during the quadrennium. The Green Book was widely used, and many helpful suggestions regarding it were sent to the Commission for consideration. The resultant volume was presented to the General Conference of 1964, and adopted with virtually a unanimous vote. Its main features were as follows:

- a. It recommended one order of service, which was printed in two forms, the first in skeleton form, the second elaborated with rubrics, versicles, and sample prayers and collects.
- b. The order was revised to conform, at least in part, to the historical usages in the Church Universal. It was built about the five traditional phases of worship—Vision, Confession, Praise, Proclamation of the Word, and Dedication.
- c. Prayers were suggested for each worship mood, more congregational participation was enjoined, and more scripture readings suggested, besides the Psalter, an Old Testament lesson, Epistle, and a gospel lection. It provided a new lectionary for this purpose.
- d. It had a section devoted to the church year, with suitable aids to worship selected for this purpose. It had also a massive collection of general aids to worship.
- e. It worked up a new Psalter, making a new use of the feature of Hebrew poetic-parallelism, and added a collection of canticles, new in Methodist usage, and other scriptural readings.
- f. The Commission revised the ritual for the sacraments and the other offices of the Church with attention given in part to the liturgies of the Church Universal, and in part to more phraseology.

The Methodist Church (now The United Methodist Church) seems to have accepted the Book of Worship with considerable enthusiasm. Its use marks a hesitant change from the traditional ritual of American Methodism. The present work is by no means a radical revision, but it is a step toward bringing Methodist ritual and liturgy into greater conformity with her sister churches. However, in a day of liturgical renewal and experimentation it is hard to predict what direction the movement will take. At least the American Methodists have shown awareness of the ferment going on, and an excellent group of Methodist liturgical scholars promise to keep the Church aware of the developments of the next years.

WORSHIP, British Methodist. At first, Methodist worship was regarded as complementary to that of the parish churches. WESLEY told the CONFERENCE in 1766, "It presupposes public prayer, like the sermons at the University. Therefore I have over and over advised, Use no long prayer either before or after the sermon." (Minutes of the Methodist Conferences, London, 1862, p. 59.) The new and distinctive features of eighteenth-century Methodist worship were the hymns, the COVENANT SERVICE, the LOVE FEAST, and the WATCH NIGHT, though each of these was derived rather than newly-created.

Since the Reformation, hymns—apart from those of the New Testament, and the Veni Creator in the Ordinal—had disappeared from English service books, though metrical psalms became popular, and Carolines, such as Wither, Herbert, and Ken composed hymns for particular and local occasions. The persecuted Reformation sects had always made hymns a part of their worship, and so did the Dissenters after 1662, not least at the Lord's Supper. Methodist hymnody is therefore an interesting blend of the Catholic and Puritan-pietistic traditions. The Wesleys' vivid and numinous settings of the Gospel and the Scriptures, together with some fine translations of Continental hymns, helped to revitalize worship.

In 1755, Wesley made the Covenant of the Somerset Dissenting clergy, RICHARD and JOSEPH ALLEINE, into a congregational rite. This was, naturally, an occasional office to mark times of particular solemnity. From 1778, it became customary on the first Sunday of the New Year. It was associated with Holy Communion, usually as its climax, though there is one recorded instance of the Sacrament preceding. In its post-1932 form, it is included in the service books of the Church of South India and in the Book of Worship for Church and Home of The Methodist Church, U.S.A. (Methodist Publishing House, Nashville, Tennessee, 1964-65.) (See COVENANT SERVICE.)

Love-feast and watch-night services were probably inspired by the Moravian influence, though the former have Puritan antecedents. The love feast sought to revive the primitive agape. Plain cake and water were shared and, afterward, testimonies given, interspersed with hymns. Confined originally to members of bands, then to members of society, love feasts persisted throughout the nineteenth century, as concomitants of Methodist life. They are chiefly of antiquarian interest today, though an attempt was made in the early 1950's to use them as occasions of joint worship of Anglicans and Methodists, in default of intercommunion.

Wesley considered watch nights as tantamount to vigils. Here was undoubtedly an attempt to baptize secular custom. In the end the services were reserved for New Year's Eve.

Under the Wesleys, Methodism was a Eucharistic revival in an age when there was widespread neglect of the Sacrament of Holy Communion. Not only was Wesley a frequent communicant himself, but he and his brother took their members with them to the parish church communions wherever possible, and when repelled, set up the Table in their own societies. The Hymns on the Lord's Supper (1745), paraphrases of an extract from the Caroline, Daniel Brevint, On the Christian Sacrament and Sacrifice, contain some devotional language susceptible of interpretation in terms of the Sacrifice of the Mass. They are certainly in the Western tradition in which the Eucharist is primarily a recalling of Calvary, and they are vividly imaginative; but doubtless the Wesleys would distinguish between intense poetry and precise doctrinal formulation.

Wherever the early Methodists needed to plant churches rather than societies, the basis of Sunday worship was the Book of Common Prayer, as the custom of the Caribbean and some African districts still bears witness. John Wesley abridged the book in The Sunday Service of the Methodists in North America (1784), on what may be termed liberal evangelical principles. This abridgment was prescribed, along with the prayer book, in the PLAN of PACIFICATION of 1795 as the proper order of worship in the British societies. But although it went into innumerable editions until 1910, it never replaced the prayer book itself in the esteem of British Methodists, many of whom would have agreed with ADAM CLARKE's eulogy that the "genuine original" liturgy of the Church of England is, "next to the Bible, . . . the depository of the pure religion of Christ."

The Mother Church indeed has haunted Methodism throughout its British existence. Some eighteenth-century Anglican customs have persisted to this day, for instance the habit of combining pulpit and reading desk, and conducting the service from one place; the custom of preparing the Communion Table beforehand; and of approaching and leaving the Table in groups. Even when set forms were eschewed the pattern of worship was never Reformed, but a kind of Free Matins or Evensong, which accounts for the fact that the traditional place for the offertory in nonsacramental services is at the point between the readings and prayers and the sermon, tagged on to the "office" in effect, and liturgically meaningless and deplorable.

The Plan of Pacification was so anxious to avoid open rivalry to the Established Church that it virtually jettisoned the morning Communions of the Wesleys' Eucharistic revival by insisting that "the sacrament shall never be administered on those Sundays on which it is administered in the Parish Church." Thus, ironically, the evening Communion came in, and Methodism was made unsafe for the liturgical movement.

Throughout the nineteenth century, the Wesleys published innumerable service books, all debtors to the Book of Common Prayer, which itself continued to be used. In 1874 an attempt was made by the appointment of a conference committee to provide a definitive book. This was also inspired by suspicions of the Anglo-Catholic revival, which caused an anti-prayerbook reaction, so that the committee was charged to remove "all expressions which are susceptible of a sense contrary to the principles of our evangelical Protestantism." Apart from the Baptismal Office, very little was found to revise, and in approving a new Book of Public Prayers and Services in 1882, the Conference did not prohibit the use of any forms previously authorized.

The development of Methodist worship is not however to be wholly understood in the light of service books and Anglican relations. A movement which may be legitimately reckoned among the manifestations of "enthusiasm" will always regard spontaneity as vital to its worship. Extempore prayer had been valued by Wesley, and was the form most congenial to the majority of itinerant preachers and their congregations. In America, contact with the Anglican Church was much slighter than in England, and in any case, the conditions of the frontier necessitated simple revivalistic services. Here the CAMP MEETINGS began, with far-reaching consequences for the home country too.

PRIMITIVE METHODISM was born in the fervent uninhibited prayer of the camp meetings, and the other secessions from 1798 to the 1850's were all inspired by the desire for freedom in worship and government. This did not necessarily imply disregard of the Sacraments. The Primitive Methodists, in particular, treasured their Communion seasons. HUGH BOURNE, fascinated by the parallels between the Passover and the Lord's Supper, was eager for the use of unleavened bread.

All the separated bodies found the need of service books in time, though these were for the Sacraments and occasional offices, not for regular Sunday morning and evening worship. They were provided to be guides, not chains, and never established themselves in the love and devotion of the people.

W. J. TOWNSEND's authorized Handbook for the Methodist New Connexion does not contain a Communion Office. The Bible Christian Book of Services recommends Communion on the first Sunday of each month; its form is in no sense a liturgy, but rather an explanation of what is being done and its great solemnity. This is also true of the Book of Services for the Use of the United Methodist Free Churches, in which the Offertory occurs after the distribution. The Primitive Methodist order consists entirely of prayers and phrases from the Anglican rite, beginning with an edited version of a prayer for the Church Militant, followed by Scripture, Exhortation, Confession, Comfortable Words (but no Sursum Corda or Tersanctus), and a Communion Prayer which adds to an abbreviated Prayer of Consecration a paraphrase of the Prayer of Humble Access. The United Methodist Book of Services in 1913 attempts an original order with a definite "movement" of worship, but it never apparently had much vogue. The Baptismal Offices of all the books imply categorically that infants are baptized, not simply dedicated. Again the Primitive Methodist service has most echoes of the prayer book, while the United Methodist book of 1913 is most anxious to guard against any idea of an opus operatum.

The Book of Offices of the united British Church in 1936 provides for far more congregational participation than the books of the non-Wesleyans had done. It includes an alternative Communion Order, really nonliturgical, but with a Resurrection hymn after the distribution. The book reveals some curious blind spots, and has been much criticized for its seeming lack of a theology of worship. Revision is now contemplated, as in the Anglican Church.

Meanwhile, in all parts of world Methodism there has been greater interest in ordered worship, and in church furnishings. This is due to ecumenical encounter, greater economic affluence, and new educational methods. In some cases ceremonial has entered the sanctuary from the Sunday school. In America printed orders of service are often provided, though the critical eye may sometimes discern an apparent deficiency of Holy Scripture, and a preoccupation more esthetic than theological. In Great Britain Divine Worship (1936), a Conference publication, provides various orders of morning and evening, as well as children's services and other offices. Since the Second World War, the Church of Scotland Book of Common Order has been much used by leaders of Methodist worship, and its influence upon the 1960 Report of the Conference Committee on Worship is marked. The full Communion Service is now used far more often in the English Methodist Church than formerly; morning celebrations are more frequent; and the service is less of an appendix to worship than at one time. The METHODIST SACRAMENTAL FELLOWSHIP, founded just after Union, may be a symptom rather than a cause of this revival. It remains true that for most Methodists the climax, if not the raison d'être, of worship is the sermon. The principal defect of our usage is the superabundance of the didactic; its great, though often unappropriated and possibly diminishing, assets are its fervor and flexibility. There is no definitive history of Methodist worship. J. C. Bowmer has written on The Sacrament of the Lord's Supper in Early Methodism (London, 1951) and The Lord's Supper in Methodism, 1791-1960 (London, 1961). There are many books on hymns, most notably, J. E. Rattenbury's The Evangelical Doctrines of Charles Wesley's Hymns (London, 1941) and The Eucharistic Hymns of John and Charles Wesley (London, 1948). The volumes of Proceedings of the Wesley Historical Society contain invaluable articles about the various traditions; of particular importance are Wesley F. Swift's studies of the Sunday Service of the Methodists (xxix, 12-20; xxxi, 112-18, 133-43). In the London Quarterly Review for July, 1923, is T. H. Barratt's famous article on Wesley's practice of Communion. In the same review for July, 1944, is Kenneth Grayston on the Office of Baptism. Other works include Nolan B. Harmon, Rites and Ritual of Episcopal Methodism (Publishing House, M.E.C.S., 1926); John Bishop, Methodist Worship in Relation to Free Church Worship (London, 1950); H. F. Hall in Ways of Worship (London, 1951), pp. 158-68; Horton Davies, Worship and Theology in England, from Watts and Wesley to Maurice, (London, 1961), Ch. 8; E. G. Rupp in The Holy Communion (London, 1947), Ch. VII; the Report of the Conference Committee on Worship (appointed in 1957) was published in 1960.

WREN, JAMES (1728-1815), of Falls Church, Va., was the great-grandson of Sir Christopher Wren, and James Wren was himself the architect of three VIRGINIA churches of the colonial period—Pohick near Mt. Vernon, Christ Church in Alexandria, and The Falls Church. Although he was a vestryman and church warden (with George Washington and George Mason) of Fairfax Parish of the Anglican Church, he became a leading member of the first Methodist society to be formed in what is now the Virginia suburbs of WASHINGTON, D.C., and gave to the Methodist Church its first church site in what later became ARLINGTON, Va. He was Colonel in the Virginia militia, and at various times Commissioner of Provisional Law, Commissioner of Tax, and Sheriff of Fairfax County. The chapel in the headquarters building of The Methodist Church in Northern Virginia, in ALEXANDRIA, is named in his memory.

WRENSHALL, JOHN (1761-1821), American layman and local preacher, who was instrumental in the founding of Methodism in PITTSBURGH, Pa., in 1796. Born in England, Wrenshall was converted in a Methodist Society there and became a LOCAL PREACHER. He emigrated to PHILADELPHIA in 1794 with his wife and five children. In 1796 he and his brother-in-law—both merchants—opened a second store in Pittsburgh and Wrenshall moved west to manage it. Finding no Methodist services in the town, and the community largely destitute of religion, Wrenshall commenced preaching in October 1796. For the first seven years the Society met under his oversight in the historic "Blockhouse" of old Fort Pitt. Because he had been administering the sacraments, though unauthorized to do so, at the request of Bishop ASBURY he journeyed to a Quarterly Meeting at the Hopewell Meeting-house on the West Wheeling Circuit where on Sept. 10, 1803 he was ordained DEACON. This was the first Methodist ordination in OHIO.

The wife of President U.S. GRANT, Julia Dent, was a granddaughter of John Wrenshall, Ellen Bray Wrenshall being the wife of Judge Frederick Dent. Wrenshall kept a Journal which consists of five small handwritten volumes. Volumes one and two deal with his life in England, and the remainder with his life in America. It deals with both his business and his religious interests.

WRIDE, THOMAS (17? -1807), British Methodist, entered the ministry in 1768. He was an ingenious mechanic who also dabbled in medicine. His eccentricities and overindulgence in mimicry detracted from his usefulness as a preacher. He was inclined to be officious and obstinate, and on occasions Wesley was obliged to deal bluntly with him. He was, nevertheless, a loyal champion of Methodist usage.

WRIGHT, DUNCAN (1736-1791), Scottish preacher, was born in May, 1736, at Fortingal, Perthshire, and brought up in Edinburgh. Although delicate, he enlisted in the army in 1754 and was converted while serving in Limerick in the winter of 1755-56. The death of a condemned deserter moved him to begin preaching in 1758, and on his discharge in 1764 he was encouraged by Wesley to enter the itinerancy. He traveled with Wesley from 1765 until prevented by failing health. After several English circuits, he was sent to Scotland in 1770, where he preached in Gaelic, especially in Aberdeen, Perth, and Greenock. He took a particular pleasure in helping younger preachers. He is buried in Wesley's vault at City Road Chapel.

WRIGHT, GEORGE G. (1820-1896), noted IOWA jurist, was born in Bloomington, Ind. He entered the state college (later Indiana University) in 1835, graduated in 1839, and studied law in the office of his brother, Joseph Albert Wright. In September 1840, he began the practice of law at Keosauqua, in Iowa Territory, where he lived until 1865, when he removed to DES MOINES. On Oct. 19, 1843, he married Hannah Dribble and they had seven children.

Wright became active in Iowa politics soon after settling in Keosauqua. He was prosecuting attorney for Van Buren County from 1846 to 1848, served as state senator in the Second and Third General Assemblies, and was a justice of the Iowa Supreme Court, 1855-70. His decisions as a jurist were of the highest importance to Iowa jurisprudence.

Judge Wright, states Bishop SIMPSON, "united in early life with the M.E. Church and has remained a devoted member, occupying many of its official positions." He discussed "Temperance" at the Methodist State Convention in 1871. A Republican in politics, he served a term in the U.S. Senate (1871-77). He returned to Des Moines in 1877 to practice law with two of his sons, but devoted his attention chiefly to his business interests. From 1881 to 1896 he lectured in the state university law school, which he helped establish in 1865. Judge Wright served as president of the American Bar Association in 1887 and 1888. He died in 1896 in Des Moines, Iowa.

WRIGHT, MILTON (1828-1917), American bishop of the Church of the UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST and father of Wilbur and Orville Wright of aeroplane fame, was born Nov. 17, 1838, in Rush County, Ind., son of Dan, Jr. and Catherine (Reeder) Wright. Endowed with a strong desire to learn, he read everything he could lay his hands on, including anti-slavery literature, until he had advanced far beyond the curriculum offered by the rural schools he attended.

Converted in 1843, at the age of fourteen, he debated between joining the M.E. Church and the Presbyterian Church until 1847, when John Morgan, a minister of the Church of the United Brethren in Christ, persuaded him to become a member of that denomination. He disciplined himself to a rigid program of independent study and took work at Hartsville College, a United Brethren institution, before becoming a public school teacher. In 1850 he took his first steps toward entering the Christian ministry and received an annual conference license from the White River Conference in 1853. In 1856, he was ordained.

After serving as a missionary to OREGON, 1853-57, he taught at Sublimity College, Oregon, when it was opened in 1857, serving as its principal for a time. On Nov. 24, 1859, he married Susan Catherine Koerner in INDIANA. To this union were born the famous inventors, Wilbur and Orville. Milton Wright remained in Indiana, preaching, teaching at Hartsville College, and serving as presiding elder, until he was elected Editor of the Religious Telescope in 1869. His forceful, independent spirit and his strong opposition to slavery, alcohol, and secret societies were boldly written across the pages of the publication and played a large part in his election as a bishop in 1877.

The GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1881 did not re-elect him to this high office, largely because of a rising tide of liberalism on the secret societies issue. However, in 1885 he was again elected bishop and assigned to the Pacific Coast, even though he had spent the years 1882-85 publishing an anti-secret society monthly journal, the Richmond (Indiana) Star. When the General Conference, meeting in York, Pa., in 1889, adopted a revised constitution for the denomination, Bishop Wright and a group of followers withdrew from the body and established the Church of the UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST, OLD CONSTITUTION. He served this group, which now has headquarters in Huntingdon, Ind., from 1889 to 1905, when he retired from the office of bishop. He died April 3, 1917 and was buried in the Woodland Cemetery, Dayton, Ohio.

WRIGHT, RICHARD (17? - ?), one of the eight official Methodist missionaries sent to America by JOHN WESLEY; he came over with FRANCIS ASBURY in 1771. From the first there was some question about Wright's fitness for the work. After both he and Asbury had preached at St. GEORGE'S CHURCH, PHILADELPHIA, JOSEPH PILMORE wrote that Asbury's message was "attended with life," while "the people seemed pretty well pleased with" Wright's "manner, and as to his manner, he will easily improve."

Wright remained in America about three years, and during that time he served in MARYLAND, DELAWARE, VIRGINIA, and NEW YORK CITY, going to the latter place for two short tours of duty. He was present at the first conference in July, 1773. Though a fluent speaker with a pleasing disposition, his ministry seemed to produce divisions that weakened the work. It was said that he became close friends with some people in the societies, thereby arousing jealousies. Also, he accepted material gifts and was sometimes partial in applying the strict discipline required by early Methodism. Asbury said of his work in New York, "He has been spoiled by gifts. He has been pretty strict in the society, but ended all with a general love feast; which I think is undoing all he has done."

Since Wright's work did not improve, the 1774 conference sent him back to England along with RICHARD BOARDMAN and Pilmore who were going at that time. Asbury visited Wright shortly before his departure and "found he had no taste for spiritual subjects." The British Minutes for 1777 list Wright as having desisted from the ministry. Little is known about him after he left the connection.

WRIGHT, RICHARD ROBERT, JR. (1878-1967), American bishop of the A.M.E. CHURCH, was born in Cuthbert, Ga.,

on April 16, 1878. He was educated at Georgia State College where he earned the A.B. degree in 1898. He received the B.D. and A.M. degrees from the University of Chicago in 1901 and 1904, respectively. In 1911 after study at the University of Berlin and Leipzig in Germany, he took the Ph.D. degree at the University of Pennsylvania. He was ordained deacon in 1900 and elder in 1901, served as pastor in ILLINOIS and PENNSYLVANIA, editor of the Christian Recorder, business manager of the A.M.E. BOOK CONCERN, and president of WILBERFORCE UNIVERSITY. From this last position he was elected to the episcopacy in 1936. He was the author of several important works in American sociology and A.M.E. history. His book, The Bishops of the A.M.E. Church, is an authority in its field and is cited frequently in this Encyclopedia. His was a long, busy and eventful life. He died in Lankenau Hospital, Philadelphia, Pa., on Dec. 12, 1967.

WRINCH, HORACE COOPER (1866-1939), Canadian Methodist medical missionary, was born to Leonard and Elizabeth Wrinch on Jan. 6, 1866, in Essex, England. The family came to Canada in 1880. Horace was educated in Albert Memorial College, Flamingham, England; Albert College, Belleville, Ontario; the faculty of agriculture of Toronto University, from which he graduated as gold medalist in 1888; and Trinity Medical College, Toronto, from which he graduated M.D., C.M. as gold medalist. During university days his thoughts were turned, with encouragement from his fiancée, Alice Breckon, to medical missions overseas, but on graduation no such opening was available. He gladly accepted an appointment to work among the Indians of northern British Columbia.

Following their marriage, Dr. and Mrs. Wrinch left for the West and spent the winter of 1899 in Port Essington, near the mouth of the Skeena. In the summer of 1900 they traveled upriver by Indian canoe to Kispiox where he began his practice. This village was so isolated that, at the time, the mail came only twice a year. After two years at Kispiox, Wrinch moved down river twelve miles to Hazelton and began to build a hospital which, in 1904, admitted its first patients. For many years Hazelton Hospital was a recognized training-school for nurses. Before Dr. Wrinch retired, a fine new fifty-five-bed concrete structure was built and is now known as Wrinch Memorial. Wrinch kept abreast of the advance of medicine with postgraduate courses in New York, Los Angeles, Rochester, Montreal, and Toronto. His surgical skill was recognized across the continent.

He took a deep interest in public affairs, and was one of the few men in Canadian history to have been sought out by both parties at the same time. He was twice elected to the Provincial Legislature, in 1924 and 1928. For three successive years, 1921-24, he was president of the British Columbia Medical Association.

In 1910 he was ordained by the Conference, and as long as he was at Hazelton the hospital was listed as a preaching point. He was man of wide interests and many skills, but he would desire, most of all, to be remembered as a Christian missionary. Prior to an operation he would offer prayer beginning: "A human life is placed in our hands. We must have God's help if we are to do our best. Let us pray."

In 1921 Victoria University, Toronto, conferred the doctorate of divinity on him. He died in Vancouver on October 19, 1939.

PARISH CHURCH, WROOT

WROOT was a Lincolnshire parish near Epworth, in the Isle of Axholme, which SAMUEL WESLEY, JOHN WESLEY's father, received in 1725 and held until 1734, when he resigned it in favor of his son-in-law, JOHN WHITELAMB. Between 1727 and November, 1729, John Wesley often acted as his father's curate in the parish; it was worth about £50 per annum in eighteenth-century money. Wroot today has little about it to mark the influence of the eighteenth-century curates.

JOHN NEWTON

WUNDERLICH, ERHARD (1830-1895), German pioneer leader, emigrated to the United States in 1849. He was converted and joined the Methodists in DAYTON, OHIO. On a visit to his native country in 1850, he bore witness to Christ before his mother and brother and before friends and villagers both of Waltersdorf and of Ruessdorf, the estate of the Wunderlich family. The meetings he held brought about an awakening in Eastern Thuringia. The movement strengthened even under hostilities and persecutions. Contact with the BREMEN Methodist Mission, established in 1851, gave him the support and advice of L. S. JACOBY, who soon visited this new branch of Methodism in Central Germany. Wunderlich preached to the societies and visited them on horseback or on foot like the first itinerants on both sides of the Atlantic. At last the persecution of Wunderlich grew so unbearable that even Jacoby advised him to return to America and asked his brother FRIEDRICH WUNDERLICH to continue his work. Erhard left Germany in the fall of 1853, and became a member of the OHIO ANNUAL CONFERENCE in the United States, twice serving as a presiding elder. After 1868 he was a member of the first board of trustees of German Wallace College, BEREA, OHIO. Powerful as a preacher and successful in the cure of souls, he contributed largely to the quick advance of Methodism among German immigrants.

THEOPHIL FUNK

WUNDERLICH, FRIEDRICH (1823-1904), was owner of the Ruessdorf estate in Central Germany. In the beginning he did not agree with his brother Erhard's religious enthusiasm, but then he also was converted and became the assistant of his younger brother. When ERHARD WUNDERLICH was forced to leave his native country, Friedrich assumed the responsibilities and hardships of continuing the work in Thuringia. L. S. JACOBY visited it periodically, and his prophecies that religious liberty would come gradually soon proved right. Friedrich, ordained an elder at Bremen in 1865, later called September 15, 1866, the date of the foundation of the Methodist Church in the Grand-dukedom Saxe-Weimar. On that day he and a dozen of his friends were summoned to stop Communion services or to leave the established church. They chose the latter. A movement which had begun with an endeavor to renew the church resulted in founding a free church with a manifold reviving influence on the established churches in Germany. Friedrich Wunderlich was fined several times for his preaching, but he experienced the blessing of God upon his spiritual as well as his temporal work. Erhard and Friedrich Wunderlich proved to be the type of JOHN WESLEY's early itinerant lay preachers revived in nineteenth-century Germany.

FRIEDRICH WUNDERLICH

WUNDERLICH, FRIEDRICH (1896-), Methodist bishop and general superintendent of The Methodist Church of East and West Germany, was born in Plauen, Saxony, Germany on Jan. 23, 1896, the son of Engelbert and Lydia (Laemmle) Wunderlich. His grandfather was FRIEDRICH WUNDERLICH, a farmer and founder of the Methodist Church in Eastern Germany. He received the Ph.D. from Leipzig University in 1923; D.D. from DePaul University in 1952; and from Birmingham-Southern College in 1956; and the L.H.D. from Baldwin-Wallace College in 1963.

On Dec. 6, 1930, he was united in marriage to Maria Straube, and their children are Maria (Mrs. Emanuele Mannarino, who holds an M.D. degree); Friedrich, an Sc.D.; Gertraud (Mrs. Wolfgang Weber, an M.D.) and Georg, also an M.D.

Friedrich Wunderlich was ordained to the ministry of the M.E. Church in 1924. He was secretary of Christian education in the Methodist Church in Germany, 1924-31; pastor in Hamburg, Germany, 1931-39; professor of theology at the Theological Seminary (Predigerseminar der Methodistenkirche), Frankfurt-am-Main, Germany, 1938-48; president of the same, 1948-53. He was elected bishop of the Methodist Church by the Germany Central Conference and assigned presidential and residential oversight of the Methodist churches of East and West Germany, Frankfurt-am-Main, in 1953.

He has been a member of the Working Fellowship of Christian Churches in Germany since 1949; a member of the Free Church Council, 1938; member of the Committee of Bread for World Protestant German Interchange Aid, 1959; member of the executive committee of the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL; a delegate to the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, held in EVANSTON, in 1954, and New Delhi in 1961. He served with the German Army, 1915-18, and 1940-45.

He is the author of Methodists Linking Two Continents, 1960; Gott Gibt Sein Volk Nicht Auf, 1960; and Christus vor Allem, 1964.

Bishop Wunderlich resides in Frankfurt and from there until he retired in 1964 he continued to supervise Methodist churches in both West and East Germany. His episcopal supervision on both sides of the divided nation was carried on, and his travel east, as well as west, permitted by virtue of his own personal reputation and the trust reposed in him by secular, as well as church, authorities. On the death of Bishop ODD HAGEN, Bishop Wunderlich was recalled to active service and supervised the STOCKHOLM Area until Bishop OLE E. BJORGEN was elected Bishop in 1970.

WYANDOT INDIAN MISSION

WYANDOT MISSION (sometimes spelled Wyandotte), at Upper Sandusky, OHIO, is sometimes referred to by Methodist historians as the "first systematized missionary work undertaken in the Methodist Episcopal Church." Others claim that the National Missionary Society (now the BOARD OF MISSIONS of The United Methodist Church) was organized in NEW YORK in 1819 as the result of the interest aroused in Methodism by the challenging work accomplished at the Wyandot Mission.

Its beginnings center in the fascinating story of an uneducated Virginian of Negro and Indian blood named JOHN STEWART. Converted in Marietta, Ohio, he joined a Methodist Society and later felt the call of God to preach to the Indians in Northern Ohio. He journeyed, among other places, to Piketown on the Sandusky River where he stopped for a time with a tribe of Delaware Indians. The first night of his arrival the Indians joined in a noisy dance which Stewart feared was in anticipation of killing him. When they stopped dancing, Stewart took his hymnal and began singing hymns. When he ceased one of the Indians said, "Sing more!" Stewart sang more hymns and then, asking for an interpreter, gave them an exhortation. From Piketown, Stewart eventually went northwest until he reached the home of William Walker, Sen., sub-agent of Indian affairs at Upper Sandusky. Walker questioned Stewart closely and then encouraged him in his work. In November 1816 Stewart, having secured an interpreter, began preaching to the Wyandots. Two converted Indian chiefs requested the QUARTERLY CONFERENCE at Urbana to license Stewart to preach, and he was licensed March 1819. In 1821 seven chiefs requested the Annual Conference meeting at Lebanon to organize a Mission School at Upper Sandusky. JAMES B. FINLEY was sent to help Stewart, and in 1822 he built the first Manual Training School in the United States. By 1824, with the assistance of the United States Government, a thirty by forty stone church was built. Revivals broke out and the work quickly spread to other Indian tribes. Four converted chiefs who became especially useful Methodist leaders were: Between-the-Logs, Mononcue, Hicks, and Scuteash. The work continued to prosper among the Wyandots here until they were removed from Ohio into KANSAS. Today the restored stone building at Upper Sandusky is a national Methodist Historic SHRINE.

WYNN, ALEXANDER MACFARLANE (1827-1906), American pioneer minister, was born on Jan. 20, 1827, though place of birth in NORTH or SOUTH CAROLINA is uncertain, the son of Thomas and Sarah Harriett MacFarlane (there were three sisters with husbands in the SOUTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE). He was orphaned at three weeks, reared by his uncle, Bishop JAMES OSGOOD ANDREW, graduated from EMORY COLLEGE in 1848, and entered the ministry in 1849. He was selected on Oct. 9, 1849 by Bishop ROBERT PAINE to accompany JESSE BORING to CALIFORNIA.

He married Maria, Mrs. Boring's sister. They sailed from NEW ORLEANS to PANAMA, across the Isthmus (where he contracted malaria), and came to SAN FRANCISCO on April 15, 1850.

Wynn organized the first M.E. Church, South, west of TEXAS as Wesley Chapel, San Francisco. He held the first service in the original courthouse. He served other churches in California during the 1850's and was principal of Bascom Institute.

Wynn helped Boring establish the "California Mission" in 1850; the PACIFIC CONFERENCE, 1852. He was conference secretary, 1852-54; and a delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCE (MES) of 1854. Illness involving a lung hemorrhage necessitated his coming back to GEORGIA.

In Georgia his pastoral record was as follows: ATLANTA and Decatur Circuit, 1849; Athens, 1855; Columbus, 1856; Girard and Colored Charge, 1857; Talbot, 1858; Eatonton, 1860; SAVANNAH, Trinity and Wesley Chapel, 1862-64, Trinity, 1865. WYNN, ROBERT HENRY (1871-1931), American preacher, was born in Waterproof, La., Feb. 23, 1871, and was received on trial in the LOUISIANA CONFERENCE in 1892. He served Parker Memorial, NEW ORLEANS; Algiers; Louisiana Avenue; Homer; Ruston; Minden; and Monroe. In 1911, he was appointed to the Lafayette District, but was called to the presidency of CENTENARY COLLEGE in the summer of 1913, serving that church-related institution for six years. Returning to the pastorate, he served again at Ruston, then was appointed to the Shreveport District. In this period he was instrumental, both in personal finances and leadership, in founding a church in Shreveport bearing the name Wynn Memorial. In 1925 he was appointed to Lake Charles, and in 1929 to Minden for a second time.

The ability and character of Robert H. Wynn were generally recognized by the various honors given. The D.D. degree was conferred upon him in 1913, and four times he was elected to the GENERAL CONFERENCE, once leading the delegation. He served for years on the General Conference BOARD OF EDUCATION.

In 1931, after surgery and apparent improvement, he passed away on December 25, with burial in Minden, La. He was survived by his wife, two daughters and one son.

WYOMING, U.S.A., sometimes called the "Equality State" because it led the way in woman suffrage, is in the northern Rocky Mountain region of the United States. It is bounded by MONTANA on the north, SOUTH DAKOTA and NEBRASKA on the east, COLORADO and UTAH on the south, and UTAH and IDAHO on the west. Rectangular in shape, it has an area of 97,281 square miles, and its population in 1960 was 330,066. A great portion of Wyoming was received from France in the Louisiana Purchase in 1803. The remainder was secured by the annexation of Texas in 1845, by the treaty of 1846 in which Great Britain relinquished claim to the Oregon country, and by thecession of Mexico in 1848.

The first white people to enter Wyoming were trappers, and in 1834 Fort Laramie was built by traders. The Oregon Trail crossed the region. In 1860 the renowned Pony Express was begun. A year later the first telegraph line was erected over the territory. There was trouble with the Indians until 1876 when the army campaigns assured the safety of the region. Laramie and Cheyenne were founded with the coming of the Union Pacific Railway in 1867.

Originally a part of the Dakota Territory, Wyoming was designated as a separate territory in 1868. At the initial session of the territorial legislature in 1869 equal rights were granted to women. In 1870 women began to serve on juries, and Mrs. Esther M. Morris of South Pass was appointed the first female justice of the peace in the world. In 1925 Mrs. Nellie Tayloe Ross became the first woman governor in the United States.

In the early days the cattle industry thrived in Wyoming, partly due to the thick buffalo grass. Before long, however, the ranges were overstocked, and that coupled with a severe winter in 1886-87 caused a depression. With the decline of the cattle industry, sheep raising became important, small farms developed, and more people entered the territory. In 1890 Wyoming became the forty-fourth state in the Union.

Wyoming's industries include wool, lumber, petroleum, and the mining of gold and a limited amount of jade. More recently uranium discoveries have produced considerable income, and the water power of the state has been developed. Tourism has steadily grown. Yellowstone National Park, Grand Teton National Park, Devil's Tower, Jackson Hole National Monument, and eleven national forests attract tourists in great numbers. Sportsmen hunt deer, elk, bear, and birds in Wyoming.

Methodism entered Wyoming in 1834 when JASON LEE passed that way en route to the northwest. However, there is no record that he preached a sermon in the territory. In 1870 Methodism from Colorado came across the border into southern Wyoming; Laramie and Cheyenne became preaching points on the Greeley, Colorado Circuit. Also, Methodist congregations were formed at Rawlins, Rock Springs, Evanston, and Lander.

In 1888 Wyoming became a Mission with DANIEL L. RADER as superintendent. Other preachers in the Mission included O. L. Fisher, J. B. Long, H. L. Wriston, J. W. Linn, H. A. James, and C. R. Laporte. Under pioneer conditions the work developed slowly. N. A. Chamberlain, superintendent 1892-96, was traveling with the pastor at Lander by team and buckboard through the Owl Mountains in early spring when they were caught in a blizzard and nearly perished. The bridge on the Wind River having washed away, the ferryman charged $10 for the crossing. Out of provisions they purchased a dozen eggs from a rancher for $1. Chamberlain then remarked, "One more river to cross and one more dozen eggs to buy and we would bankrupt the missionary society." In 1898 superintendent E. E. Tarbill reported that he had preached 163 times, traveled 19,000 miles, and had been mistaken for a commercial man, a cattleman, and the advance agent for a theater company. At one place where he was to preach in a saloon, the notice read: "preaching at 7:30, dancing at 9:00, and after the dance, a big poker game."

In 1914 the Wyoming Mission became the Wyoming State Conference, though it did not have and never achieved later the minimum of fifty ministers in full connection required for conference status. The GENERAL CONFERENCE waived the rule for the Wyoming work. In 1957, pursuant to the action of the 1956 WESTERN JURISDICTIONAL CONFERENCE, the WYOMING STATE CONFERENCE and the COLORADO CONFERENCE merged to form the ROCKY MOUNTAIN CONFERENCE. The Wyoming work then became a district in that conference.

In 1968 the statistics for the work in Wyoming were: thirty-three pastoral charges, 13,424 members, and property valued at $6,443,173.

WYOMING CONFERENCE was organized at Carbondale, Pa., July 7, 1852 with Bishop LEVI SCOTT presiding. It was formed by dividing the Oneida Conference. Its territory included northeast PENNSYLVANIA and south central New York. At the beginning the conference had four districts—Binghamton, New York; Honesdale, Pennsylvania; Owego, New York; and Wyoming, Pennsylvania. There were seventy-four preachers, 113 local preachers, fifty-nine pastoral appointments, and 10,662 members. In 1863 two districts were added—Chenango and Otsego.

The name "Wyoming" is from the Indian word "Waughwaumane" which means "broad valley." The Wyoming valley is four by twenty miles with mountains on either side and the Susquehanna River flowing through it. One Anning Owen escaped the Wyoming Massacre in July, 1778, went to eastern New York where he was in touch with ardent Methodists, and returned to the valley the next year a flaming evangelist. Ten years later Nathaniel B. Mills who was on the Newburg Circuit in New York ranged into the Wyoming valley. He was followed by Joseph Lovell in 1790, and the Wyoming Circuit with 100 members was formed in 1791. In the same year the Otsego Circuit in the New York end of the future Wyoming Conference was organized.

James Campbell from Albany, N. Y., was the first duly appointed preacher on the Wyoming Circuit. In 1792-93 he and WILLIAM COLBERT labored in the region. As time passed preachers were sent into the Wyoming area from the NEW YORK, BALTIMORE, and PHILADELPHIA CONFERENCES before the GENESEE CONFERENCE was organized in 1810 and the ONEIDA CONFERENCE in 1829. Thus when the Wyoming Conference was organized in 1852, it was the successor of five conferences which had perpetuated a name that had stood for an Indian preserve, a circuit, and a district (1845).

Camp meetings flourished within the bounds of the present Wyoming Conference and then ceased. Later some of the sites became centers for youth meetings or conferences. The conference Sky Lake Camp near New Windsor, N. Y. was the location of a camp meeting.

WYOMING SEMINARY, Kingston, Pa., the sole survivor of four schools started by the conference, is today one of the outstanding preparatory schools in America. The conference has supported the Children's Home, Binghamton, N. Y. for half a century. In 1962 the conference's endowment fund for conference claimants was about $805,000. In recent years the conference has established and is supporting homes for the aged at Binghamton, N. Y., and Elizabeth and Tunkhannock, Pa.

In 1970 the Wyoming Conference had four districts—Binghamton, Oneonta, Scranton, and Wilkes-Barre, 207 ministers, 182 pastoral charges, 84,433 members, and property valued at $49,558,292.

WYOMING SEMINARY, Kingston, Pennsylvania, was founded in 1844 by the ONEIDA ANNUAL CONFERENCE of the M.E. Church and has operated since that time under its auspices. The school consists of six divisions: college preparatory, secretarial studies, music, summer school, elementary school, and the Payne-Pettebone Nursery and Kindergarten. The governing board has twenty-seven members elected by the Wyoming Annual Conference upon nomination by a committee made up of equal members from the board and the conference.

JOHN O. GROSS

WYOMING STATE CONFERENCE (ME) was organized at Newcastle, Wyo., Sept. 3, 1914 with Bishop EDWIN H. HUGHES presiding. It superseded the Wyoming Mission which had been formed in 1888. When the Mission began it had seven pastoral charges and 329 members (see WYOMING for beginnings of Methodism in the territory). At the outset in 1914 the conference had two districts—Cheyenne and Sheridan, twenty-nine ministers, thirty-one pastoral charges, and 3,248 members.

The conference grew slowly. At unification in 1939 there were thirty-eight charges and 8,072 members. The Woman's Society of Christian Service had over 1,200 members. The conference maintained a Wesley Foundation at the state university in Laramie.

The Wyoming State Conference never achieved the minimum of 50 members in full connection required by the Discipline for an annual conference. So in 1956 it requested that it be merged with the Colorado Conference and that the combined body be called the ROCKY MOUNTAIN CONFERENCE. The COLORADO CONFERENCE concurred, the WESTERN JURISDICTIONAL CONFERENCE approved the plan, and the merger was effected in 1957.

In 1968 the Rocky Mountain Conference had in Wyoming 33 appointments, 13,424 members, and property valued at $6,443,173.

YADKIN COLLEGE, North Carolina, was a training school for ministers of the M.P. Church and other professional men and was operated under the sponsorship of the NORTH CAROLINA CONFERENCE of the M.P. CHURCH. Henry W. Walser (1803-1875), a distinguished state legislator and judge, donated the land for the campus and bore the expense of erecting the first building. He served as chairman of the Board of Trustees until his death. At the Annual Conference of 1852, Walser spoke "in reference to a Seminary of Learning proposed to be located in the County of Davie." A year later the site had been selected in Davidson County eight miles west of Lexington near the Yadkin River. In 1855 the institution was chartered as "Yadkin Institute" by the General Assembly of NORTH CAROLINA, and it was opened in October of the following year. As a preparatory school it made such progress that in 1861 the charter was amended to change the name to "Yadkin College." At this time some eighty students were enrolled, but when the Civil War began sixty of them volunteered for Confederate service, causing classes to be suspended from 1861-67. When Yadkin College reopened, it again operated as a high school until 1873 when it returned to college level work. Women were first admitted to the college in 1878.

The location of Yadkin College was said to be "eminently suitable for health and for study, removed from causes of diversion and from temptation, the sale of ardent spirits within two miles being forbidden by law."

George Hege, a graduate of Trinity College, was the first president of Yadkin Institute, and he was succeeded by others of ability and repute. J. E. Prichard observed in 1927 that "the leading ministers of our denomination in this state for a generation received their instruction" at Yadkin College, as well as "many of our leading laymen."

In 1924, following the rise of consolidated high schools and the opening of HIGH POINT COLLEGE, Yadkin College Institute closed. The sale of the college property in 1933 brought $100 which was turned over to the local M.P. Church. The Yadkin College Alumni Association was very active for a number of years and was responsible for erecting the old Yadkin College bell on the High Point College campus, and for publishing a history of the college in 1939.

YEAR BOOKS, METHODIST, U.S.A., were annual publications put out for some years by the M.E. Church and (similar ones) by the M.E. Church, South. These contained the general minutes of the conferences of these respective Churches as well as much other material. They usually carried a directory of their Church officers, and sometimes biographical sketches of bishops or of general executives, and quite often a listing of the roll of editors, the roll of bishops from the beginning of the Church, the editors of various official publications, and other information which might prove helpful to the ministry and to the membership of the Church. The Year Book editors endeavored to make these publications interesting by adding unusual information of general interest to Methodists. With the necessity of bringing out larger and larger editions of the General Minutes late in the life of the respective Episcopal Methodisms, the Year Books as such ceased to appear. The file of these today is a repository of much useful historic information, bearing on the life of the respective Churches at the time the Year Books were published.

YONSEI UNIVERSITY, SEOUL, KOREA

YONSEI UNIVERSITY, Seoul, Korea, the largest coeducational Christian university in KOREA, has an enrollment of about 5,000 students of whom 1,000 are women. Originally organized as Chosen Christian College under Methodist-Presbyterian auspices in 1916, it achieved university status in 1946. In 1957 it was united with SEVERANCE UNION MEDICAL COLLEGE, taking its new name, Yonsei, from the initial Chinese characters of the two uniting institutions.

There are ten colleges: Liberal Arts, Commerce, Science and Engineering, Music, Medicine, Nursing, Home Economics, Political Science, Law, and Theology. There are four graduate schools including a business night school, and the United Graduate School of Theology—in which three denominational seminaries (Methodist, Presbyterian, and Anglican) cooperate with the Yonsei Theological College under a grant from the Theological Education Fund (New York), with additional funds from the contributing mission boards. The United Board for Christian Higher Education in Asia has generously supported the university in recent years.

The University Medical Center, including Severance Hospital, occupies a fifteen acre site on the Yonsei campus. The medical science building has facilities for 280 medical students. The five bays of the out-patient clinic can accommodate 1,500 patients daily. Severance Hospital ward building has one of its six floors designated as the Eighth Army Memorial Chest Hospital, donated by the Eighth U.S. Army Armed Forces Assistance to Korea. Rehabilitation specialists operate in two centers: the Church World Service Amputee Rehabilitation Center, and the Crippled Children's Center. The China Medical Board has been of great assistance in making Yonsei Medical Center one of the finest in the far east.

The original college was founded by Horace G. Underwood, pioneer Presbyterian missionary to Korea. Continuous service to the college has been given by his son, Horace H. Underwood, and a grandson, Horace C. Underwood II.

Methodists who have been outstanding in the growth of the university have been Arthur L. Becker, Bliss B. Billings, and Elmer M. Cable. Those in the medical college have been James D. Vanbuskirk, M.D., and Earl W. Anderson, M.D.

Tai-Sun Park, a Methodist, is now president of the university.

YORK, BRANTLEY (1805-1891), American teacher and founder of Union Institute Academy which in time eventuated in DUKE UNIVERSITY, was a Methodist local preacher. He was born in Bush Creek community north of Franklinville, Randolph County, N. C., on Jan. 3, 1805, the son of Eli and Susanna Harden York. One daughter was born from Brantley York's marriage to Fannie Sherwood, and twelve children to his second wife, Mary Wells Linberry.

In 1838 this self-educated teacher of English, classical languages, and mathematics, transformed education at "Brown's Schoolhouse" from a "subscription" school to Union Institute Academy. The academy, located in northwest Randolph County south of High Point, became Trinity College in 1859, was relocated in DURHAM in 1891, and became Duke University in 1925. A historical marker at Trinity, N. C., designates the former site.

Succeeded by his student, BRAXTON CRAVEN, in 1842, Brantley York went to head the North Carolina M.E. Conference school at Clemmons. Although blind after 1854, he taught in numerous schools, was a professor at Rutherford College, published four editions of his Illustrated Grammar and one of his Arithmetic, and preached often.

Brantley York died in Forest City, N. C., on Oct. 7, 1891, and was buried at Rocky Springs Methodist Church, Alexander County, near the site of York Institute which he founded. His Autobiography was published in 1910. His son, Bascom A., was an ordained Methodist preacher.

YORK, England. In the year 1744 the vicar of Birstall in the county of Yorkshire misrepresented something said by the Methodist preacher, JOHN NELSON, and the vicar's version made Nelson guilty of subversion. He was accordingly committed for military service as punishment, and for this purpose was taken to the city of York. Before this, in 1743, JOHN WESLEY himself had passed within a few miles of York on one of his early preaching tours, but he had not gone into the city. But when in 1747 Wesley did make his first recorded entry into York, he found that JOHN NELSON, in the true apostolic tradition, had used his time in detention to preach the gospel, and a small group of Methodists were holding meetings. Already a number of villages around the city contained duly constituted Methodist societies, so that it was to be expected that the city itself should follow suit. And this it did after Wesley's visit in 1747, with a modest initial membership of four persons.

The society's first meeting place was a tiny room in the Bedern. But in spite of prayer and great zeal, the growth of the society was extremely slow: in its first year membership went up from four only to twelve. From this tiny room the Methodists moved to accommodations which carried the curious designation of "the hole in the wall." This place had originally been part of an ancient chapel which had fallen into decay. Part of this chapel had become an ahouse, and this in turn had gone into disrepair and disuse. This was what the Methodists now took over. The old name of the place arose from the fact that there had once been a small connecting door between the old chapel and the splendid York Minster. In this unsalubrious place the Methodists stayed only for a short time, leaving it for a room in Pump Yard, large enough to hold a hundred people. During these early years there had been considerable, and sometimes violent, persecution of the Methodists, but slowly this situation began to change. So in 1759 the little society felt bold enough to face its basic need and build the first Methodist chapel in the city. It was in Peasholme Green and was large enough to hold four or five hundred people. A notable contribution toward the cost of the chapel was provided by the then Dean of York, a college friend of CHARLES WESLEY, who gave no less than one hundred pounds.

From that time the Methodist cause began to gather a certain though restrained momentum. When John Wesley died in 1791 the Methodists had passed through the first stage of their history in the city. They had gained an entry, survived persecution, set up their society, and formed a large circuit around the city, penetrating deep into the countryside. They were poised ready for the coming century, the age of expansion. By 1791 thirty-five village societies were joined with that of York itself to form the York ROUND, and nine of these had built their own chapel. In York the society had 236 members, still with only one chapel, at Peasholme Green. On the occasion of John Wesley's last visit to York, a supper meal brought together the leaders of the York society, and they included Roger Preston, ROBERT SPENCE, William Fowler, RICHARD BURDSALL, and Joseph Agar. These names were among the great ones in early Methodism in this city, and their descendants continued to offer yeoman service in the century that followed Wesley's death.

In January of 1805 the foundation stone of New Street Chapel was laid; and when the building was opened in October, the regular congregation was large enough to fill it, numbering over one thousand. The century of building for the Methodists had begun. Albion Street (in Skeldergate) came in 1816 and St. George's in 1826. And in 1839-40 came the greatest achievement to date—the erection and opening of the Centenary Chapel, which, alone of the four buildings so far named, still stood in 1966. In 1856 Centenary was matched at the other side of the River Ouse (which divides the medieval city) by the building of Wesley Chapel in Priory Street. The elaboration of the premises is illustrated by a comparison between these three buildings. New Street cost about four thousand pounds, Centenary about eight, and Wesley about sixteen. The story of building continued with Melbourne Terrace (1877), Groves (1884), and Southlands (1887); mission rooms came into use in Wilton Street, Layerthorpe, Skeldergate, and Laurence Street. To allay any suspicion that the extent of the building bore no relation to the numbers of people involved, let us look at statements concerning Wesley Chapel and Circuit in the late part of the century. In the circuit the Young Men's Class was commenced on February 22, 1862, with some youths selected from the first class in the Sunday School, none being admitted under fifteen years of age. Twenty years later it was meeting on Sundays at 9:30 A.M. for conversation on biblical and religious subjects, and at 2 P.M. for an address. It now had 403 members, of whom 166 were members of the church, 94 were married, and 300 were registered as total abstainers. A. S. Page, whose father became a member of Wesley Chapel in 1866, and who wrote of the church at its centenary celebration, has stated quite categorically that in the last decade of the nineteenth century "almost every seat in Wesley Chapel (about twelve hundred) was occupied for the ordinary evening service."

As for non-Wesleyan Methodism, PRIMITIVE METHODISM found its way to York in 1819. The society which was formed moved from its first home in a former Calvinistic Baptist chapel (which they took in 1820) to Ebenezer Chapel, their own place, in Little Stonegate. Thence they went in 1864 to a mission hall in Nunnery Lane, and this was followed by the building of their own chapel at Victoria Bar in 1880. After Methodist Union in 1932 the Primitive Methodist Circuit joined with the Wesley Circuit.

In the days of the great Wesleyan Methodist schism in 1849, York Methodism suffered a great setback in membership, largely because one of the leaders of the disturbances was JAMES EVERETT, who lived in York. Although the societies were adversely affected, the erection of new opposition buildings was virtually confined to the chapel at Monk Bar (which styled itself a part of the "Methodist Free Church") and that in Peckitt Street (which belonged to the METHODIST NEW CONNEXION). Not for many years did these societies become once more a part of the parent body.

A second feature in this period was York Methodism's more than average interest in overseas missions. In addition to generous financial support, the York Methodists also supplied missionary workers. WILLIAM WARRENER went to the WEST INDIES, and Thomas Richardson followed him; RICHARD BOARDMAN and JOSEPH PILMORE, pioneers of American Methodism, went out from York; John Hick went to Nova Scotia and Robert Hardy to CEYLON; Thornley Smith and his brother George went to South Africa and Richard Burdsall Lyth to FIJI. And, outstanding even among giants, DAVID HILL gave thirty-two years of unforgettable service to CHINA.

After 1900 York Methodism entered a third phase, one of decline. Wesley Chapel could rely on a congregation of over a thousand every Sunday evening sixty years ago; now it is fortunate to have a hundred. In almost every part of the city the story is a similar one. Where exceptions exist it is because there has been immense housing development (as at Acomb) and the church has had some gain from the vast incoming population. In outward structure York Methodism is substantially what it was in 1900. On the south bank there is still the one Wesley Circuit; on the north bank of the Ouse there are two, Centenary and Clifton. Within the city walls themselves there are still the two vast chapels of Wesley and Centenary, both facing agonizing days of self-questioning about the mission of the Christian Church to the city.

Among the more distinguished ministers who have served Methodism in York are JOHN SCOTT, born at Copmanthorpe in the York Circuit and president of the Wesleyan Methodist Conference in 1843 and 1852. His grandson was JOHN SCOTT LIDGETT, also a president. Four other ministers who served in York at some stage of their career also occupied the chair of the Conference: John Rattenbury, DINDALE T. YOUNG, Wardle Stafford and HENRY BETT. But of course the people who mattered most to the church were those who gave their whole lives to the service of the one place, the York families themselves. In York Methodism there are certain names which are written into the story of the church there and which occur in successive generations: Agar, Meek, Hill, Rymer, Taylor, Bushell, Shouksmith, Kay, and many others.

WHITFIELD FLOY

YORK, PENNSYLVANIA, U.S.A., situated in the south-eastern part of the state, was settled in 1749 by German people. During the Revolutionary War, 1777-78, the Continental Congress, driven from PHILADELPHIA, met here. Methodism was early introduced into this part of the country when FREEBORN GARRETTSON in July 1781 preached in the public house near York. Several teamsters were present. A certain James Worley was awakened by the sermon, and was thought by his family and friends to be out of his mind. A physician was sent for who placed him in bed and blistered him, but all his efforts failed to help the patient. The family then sent for Garrettson, who was sixteen miles distant and who explained to him the plan of salvation, and in a little while Worley was converted. This was the introduction of Methodism into the town of York.

In 1782 Jacob Settler bought a lot west of the Codorus, erected a small frame church, and presented it to the society of Methodists. York was made a station in 1818, and a Mission Chapel, which later became Duke Street Church, was built in 1861. In 1870-72 a much larger Duke Street Church was erected.

First Methodist Church in York finished a handsome edifice about thirty-two years ago and that church today has the largest membership of any United Methodist church in the city, with 1,276 members in 1970. There are thirteen other churches within the city limits, with a combined total of 10,372 members (1970). These congregations raised a total of $958,302 for all purposes, and their total property was valued at $7,109,565.

UNITED BRETHREN preachers entered York County several years prior to the formal organization of the denomination in 1800. A conference was held in 1791, seven miles west of the town. It was under the leadership of PHILIP WILLIAM OTTERBEIN and MARTIN BOEHM. The first United Brethren preaching in York was delivered by Martin Boehm prior to 1801 and by CHRISTIAN NEWCOMER in 1802. Although Otterbein had been pastor of the York Reformed Church, 1765-74, he had not yet become associated with those who were to be United Brethren.

That denomination, organized in 1800, was reluctant to organize congregations in cities. It was not until 1840 that the quarterly conference of the York Circuit voted to organize a class in the town. The first Methodist church, west of the Codorus Creek, was purchased for $1,500, since that congregation had relocated. Later the First United Brethren Church organized four additional congregations in York.

EVANGELICAL ASSOCIATION services were begun in York about 1806, when JACOB ALBRIGHT preached at the Courthouse. A congregation was formed which worshipped in that building for more than thirty years. The first church building was erected in 1842. By the time of the union with the United Brethren to form the E.U.B. Church, there were seven Evangelical congregations in the city.

There are eighty-seven United Methodist churches in York County with a combined membership of 29,381 persons (1970). Property for these congregations is valued at $19,879,792.

Asbury Church is one of the oldest and most commanding churches in the CENTRAL PENNSYLVANIA CONFERENCE and the mother church of Methodism in York. The account of Freeborn Garrettson's visit is told above. A Methodist society was formed in York in 1782. Services were conducted in various places until 1791 when three lots, located at Newberry and Philadelphia Streets, were purchased from the Penn Estate for seventeen pounds, ten shillings and a "yearly quit-rent of one Barley Corn on the first day of March in each and every year hereafter, if demanded." The Jacob Stitler who built a log meeting house on the property and presented it to the Methodist society, was not himself a member.

In 1807 FRANCIS ASBURY preached in York to a large congregation. Originally on the Carlisle Circuit, the church became a single station in 1818. Two years later the church was incorporated as the First Methodist Church of York, and in 1824 the church established the first white Sunday school in York.

In 1836 at a cost of $16,000 a new brick church was built at Philadelphia and Beaver Streets, the former building (as is narrated above) being sold in 1840 to the United Brethren in Christ.

In 1873 a new building was erected at a cost of $24,500. Bishop MATTHEW SIMPSON preached at the laying of the cornerstone. Five years later a great revival took place under the evangelist Thomas Harrison. There were four hundred converts.

Asbury Church, as the mother church of Methodism in York, was instrumental in organizing the Duke Street Church in 1861; the Ridge Avenue Church in 1881; the Princess Street Church (later called Epworth) in 1883; the West Street Church in 1888. Epworth and West Street are now united in what is Grace Church.

In 1923 the site of the present building on East Market Street, three blocks east of the Square, was purchased, and three years later the present educational unit was dedicated on May 2.

In 1938 the present Gothic sanctuary was completed at a total cost, including the organ, of $135,000. Foxcroft stone was used in the construction of the building. A stately and graceful spire, known as a French fleche, rises fifty-seven feet above the roof and 110 feet above the ground level, and can be seen from almost any high point in the city. A cross surmounts the fleche.

In 1968 the name of the church was changed to Asbury United Methodist Church. Among the distinguished pastors who have served Asbury was JAMES E. SKILLINGTON, who came in 1943. Dr. Skillington became known over the whole Methodist Church for his ability and knowledge as a parliamentarian in successive GENERAL CONFERENCES.

Otterbein Church is the historic "mother church" of all the former United Brethren churches in York. The congregation was organized Aug. 18, 1840. For eleven years the new church struggled for its life. At the end of this period, however, there were 137 enthusiastic members and the church showed signs of increasing vitality.

The present parsonage was built in 1855, and in 1869 the present two-story brick church structure was erected. One of the first pipe organs in the city of York was installed in 1902. On July 21, 1918, the congregation dedicated a new well equipped educational building at a cost of $52,000.

By 1931 the congregation had increased to 700 members. Growth continued to take place until the present membership numbers approximately 1,000.

Two pastors, JOHN H. NESS, Sr. and PAUL E. V. SHANNON, were elected Conference Superintendents. Dr. Ness later became the Executive Secretary of the denominational Board of Pensions; Dr. Shannon was elected a bishop of the E.U.B. Church.

The church has also sent ten men into the ministry and one woman into missionary service. Of these JOHN H. NESS, JR. is serving as Executive Secretary of the Commission on Archives and History of the United Methodist Church, and D. Rayborn Higgins and Paul E. Horn are serving as district superintendents.

A new Christian education building was dedicated in April 1969, at a cost of approximately $300,000, with facilities for children and youth, plus offices and pastors' studies.

For 128 years this congregation was known as the First Church of York. With the formation of the United Methodist Church there were two First Churches in the city. By congregational vote on Sept. 8, 1968, the former First E.U.B. Church became known as the Otterbein United Methodist Church.

YOST, WILLIAM (1830-1920), American Evangelical minister, was born Dec. 25, 1830, at Womelsdorf, Pa. He was reared by German parents whose home was the stopping place of EVANGELICAL ASSOCIATION ministers. Bishop JOHN SEYBERT, who was one of these, placed his hand on William's head on one occasion and said, "I have a deep conviction that William will eventually become one of our preachers." Resisting such an impression, he entered college at the age of twenty, to prepare for a political career. However, broken health intervened and a remarkable conversion and dedication to God's will became a training for a notable ministerial career. As a pastor he served with marked success in the East Pennsylvania Conference of the Evangelical Association (1853-63). During his service as corresponding secretary of the Missionary society (1863-75), the church experienced a rapid expansion of her work in America, Europe, and Japan. From 1863, for forty-four years, Yost was engaged as a general church official.

"The name of William Yost must be written large in the annals of his denomination," said Bishop S. P. SPRENG. "He was an able preacher, unique, original and inimitable in his manner of delivery; thoroughly Biblical and Evangelical." He died in Cleveland, Ohio, May 25, 1920, leaving an aged widow, two sons and three daughters—the eldest, Mrs. Ella Yost Preyer, prominent in the organization of the WOMAN'S MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

YOUNG, BENJAMIN (dates uncertain), American circuit rider and the first appointed to ILLINOIS, was born in Allegheny County, Pa., the son of an Episcopal father and a Presbyterian mother, and brother of JACOB YOUNG. When he was a child the family moved to KENTUCKY, and there he became a Methodist. He entered the itinerant ministry in 1801, and in October 1803 received appointment as missionary to Illinois from the WESTERN CONFERENCE. Illinois was until 1809 included in INDIANA Territory. A letter of record from Young reports the difficulties he encountered in his attempts to open the land for the gospel. Not only were many of the scattered inhabitants unfriendly, but the Indians had stolen his horse. Nevertheless within one year he had formed five classes and reported sixty-seven members.

Unfortunately he was involved in a Conference trial on charges which today would be regarded as not only minor but unsubstantiated, and was expelled in 1804. His brother, Jacob Young, in his Autobiography does not hesitate to label the action quite unjust. Bishop ASBURY himself was apparently uneasy about the Conference action and sought unsuccessfully to reopen the case.

Benjamin Young's later history is obscure. His brother reports that WILLIAM MCKENDREE, who had been instrumental in his expulsion, in later years reclaimed him during a preaching tour in Illinois, "took him into the Church, and, I believe, had his parchments returned." Of this there exists no official record.

FREDERICK A. NORWOOD

YOUNG, DINSDALE THOMAS (1861-1938), British preacher, was the son of a Yorkshire physician. Converted early, he began to preach at fifteen, and in 1879 was accepted as a candidate for the Wesleyan Methodist ministry—the youngest man accepted up to that time. After training at Headingley College, LEEDS, he travelled in four LONDON circuits as well as important provincial centers. A notable ministry at Nicolson Square, Edinburgh, was followed by eight years at Wesley's Chapel, City Road, London. Then he went to make his greatest mark during a twenty-three years' ministry at Westminster Central Hall, London. He was widely known and loved as a preacher beyond the bounds of Methodism, travelling some 10,000 miles a year on preaching and lecturing tours. The hallmarks of his expository and avowedly fundamentalist preaching were simplicity, optimism, and conviction. He was awarded an honorary D.D. by LIVINGSTONE COLLEGE, U.S.A., but his greatest honor was being elected President of the Conference in 1914. He died Jan. 21, 1938, two years after his beloved wife. Young published several books of sermons and addresses, as well as biographies of ROBERT NEWTON, RICHARD ROBERTS, and PETER MACKENZIE. He gave the FERNLEY LECTURE for 1929, on Popular Preaching. In 1920 appeared his Stars of Retrospect: frank chapters of autobiography.

YOUNG, EGERTON RYERSON (1840-1909), Canadian Methodist missionary and writer, was born at Crosby, Upper Canada, on April 7, 1840, the son of William Young and Amanda (Waldron) Young. He was educated at the Toronto Normal School and taught for several years, prior to his ordination in 1867.

In 1868, he was appointed to Norway House (Manitoba), which he reached after a journey of more than two months. Later he opened missions at Nelson River and Berens River. Because of his wife's ill health he gave up his mission in 1876 and turned to fund-raising tours in association with THOMAS CROSBY. Subsequently, he served on circuits in Ontario, but in 1888 he was permitted to devote his time to speaking and writing on behalf of Methodist Indian Missions. He died in Bradford, Ontario, in 1909.

Egerton Young was a dauntless soul, who, as pastor and lecturer, greatly strengthened the cause of missions in Canada. His numerous writings, such as By Canoe and Dog-Train among the Cree and Salteaux Indians (1890), On the Indian Trail (1897), and The Apostle of the North (1899), recreated vividly the triumphs and the miseries of the missionary enterprise.

YOUNG, GEORGE (1821-1910), Canadian missionary and writer, was born near Picton (Upper Canada), on Dec. 31, 1821. He was educated in Picton and in 1842 became a probationer in the CANADA CONFERENCE. Ordained in 1846, until 1868 he served on various circuits in the Canadas.

In 1868, in response to an appeal from GEORGE McDOUGALL, he volunteered for the Western mission. He arrived at Fort Carry in time to witness the stirring events of the first Riel Rebellion. Along with other ministers he was credited with saving the colony from greater disturbances. He was responsible for the establishment of the first Wesleyan congregations in WINNIPEG. He was also the chief promoter of the Manitoba Wesleyan Institute, an academy that functioned from 1873 to 1877.

Young returned briefly to Ontario in 1876 and was elected President of the Toronto Conference in the following year. Two years later he returned to Manitoba as superintendent of missions. When the Manitoba and North-West Conference was organized in 1883 he became its first president. In failing health, he returned to Toronto in 1884. He was able to preach and write until his death in 1910. His work in the west was recalled in Manitoba Memories, published in 1897.

George Young was one of those whose contribution to the establishment of Methodism in western CANADA cannot be adequately measured.

YOUNG, GEORGE BENJAMIN (?-1949), American bishop of the A.M.E. CHURCH. His birthdate and birthplace in the state of TEXAS are unknown. He was reared on a farm, attended the rural schools of his county, and later was graduated from PAUL QUINN COLLEGE at Waco, Texas. In 1896 he received the B.D. degree from WILBERFORCE UNIVERSITY and was subsequently ordained deacon and elder in his native state. His career in the ministry included a professorship at Paul Quinn College, a presiding eldership and pastorates in Texas. He was elected bishop in 1928, retired in 1948 and died the following year. Bishop Young served the A.M.E. Church with distinction while in Swaziland and RHODESIA, Africa, as well as in the United States.

YOUNG, JACOB (1776-1859), American circuit rider in OHIO, was born March 19, 1776, in Allegheny County, Pa., of an Episcopalian father and a Presbyterian mother. When he was fifteen the family moved west to KENTUCKY, where he grew up, listened to circuiting preachers, and became a Methodist. In 1799 he was appointed exhorter and began his preaching career with an appointment in 1802 to Salt River and Wayne circuits. He was ordained ELDER in 1807.

Almost his entire life was devoted to the itinerant ministry in Kentucky and Ohio, with brief service in TENNESSEE (1806) and MISSISSIPPI (1807-08). In 1812 he was made PRESIDING ELDER of the Ohio District of the OHIO CONFERENCE, and spent the stirring years of the War of 1812 in that capacity. The rest of his life was spent in many appointments in Ohio Methodism. Worn out, he retired in 1856, and died Sept. 16, 1859.

He is best known for his lively Autobiography of a Pioneer, written in old age and printed, with editing by D. W. Clark and E. Thomson, by the Western Book Concern in 1857. Done in old age, it is not always reliable in detail; but it represents one of the most valuable and extensive, as well as readable, accounts of Methodism in circuit rider days in the Ohio Valley.

of churches and a leading businessman in the church. He was elected to the office of bishop in 1946 but served only two years. He died on March 10, 1948, in NASHVILLE, Tenn.

JOHN O. GROSS

YOUNGER, WILLIAM (1869-1956), was born at Morpeth Northumberland, in 1869. He entered the PRIMITIVE METHODIST ministry in 1894, and served successfully in several English circuits. He gave the HARTLEY LECTURE in 1924, The International Value of Christian Ethics. He was president of the last Primitive Methodist Conference, in 1932; he was president of the Conference of the Methodist Church in 1934. He died on Feb. 16, 1956.

YOUNGMAN, HENRY (1848-1927), Australian leader, was President of the QUEENSLAND CONFERENCE 1893, 1898 and 1907; President-General of the Methodist Church of Australasia, 1910-13. He gave statesmanlike leadership to the Conference and served in every executive position—Connexional Secretary and Secretary of Property, Loan Fund, and Insurance Committees, Editor Conference Journal and Book Steward. He helped to create the Queensland Conference, directed negotiations for the Union of Methodism in that State, and became its first President.

YOUNGSTOWN, OHIO, U.S.A. (population 140,000 in 1970), first appeared in the OHIO CONFERENCE appointments in 1824 when the circuit reported 777 members. Methodism was introduced in Youngstown by Shadrack Bostwick who had previously served in New England. Refused permission to preach in a log house built by the citizens and occupied by the Presbyterians, Bostwick preached in a barn. He soon formed a small class, and Youngstown became a preaching point successively on the Deerfield, Mahoning, and Youngstown Circuits. ROBERT R. ROBERTS, later bishop, served the circuit in 1806. The Methodists received a deed for a church site in 1814, and a frame structure was soon erected. Remodeled in 1818, it was replaced by a brick church in 1830. In the latter year some fifty "influential and wealthy" members withdrew to form a METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCH.

In 1842 Youngstown became a station, and Dillon Prosser was appointed to what is now Trinity Church. The church building was remodeled in 1861. Belmont Avenue Church was organized in 1877 and Wilson Avenue in 1883. In the latter year the present Trinity Church was built at a cost of $81,000. The Brown Memorial Church appeared in 1905.

WILBUR E. HAMMAKER, later bishop, was pastor of Trinity, 1915-36. During his ministry the building was enlarged. SCHUYLER E. GARTH, later bishop, served the church, 1936-44. RUSSELL J. HUMBERT, pastor, 1944-51, became president of DEPAUW UNIVERSITY. H. J. R. Elford has been pastor since 1951.

The Youngstown Community Center is jointly sponsored by the Division of National Missions, Conference Board of Missions, District Missionary Society, and Trinity Church. In 1970 the two mission boards appropriated $10,000 each for the center.

In 1970 The United Methodist Church had seven churches in Youngstown with a total of 4,167 members, property valued at $6,526,420, and $419,184 raised for all purposes during the year.

YOUTH CLUBS, METHODIST ASSOCIATION OF, was originated in England in 1945 by the Rev. Douglas A. Griffiths and sponsored by the British Methodist Youth Department. It seeks to use the approach to young people through youth clubs as a means of evangelism, education, and service. Recognized as a National Youth Movement, it is supported financially by the Ministry of Education. Its officers are elected annually, with the exception of the secretary, who is a member of the Methodist Youth Department Secretariat and is appointed by Conference.

D. HUBERY

YOUTH DEPARTMENT, METHODIST (British), was set up in 1943 in England, to coordinate the work in British Methodism of the Sunday School and Guild Departments, and to encourage the Youth Club movement within Methodism—later to be known as the Methodist Association of Youth Clubs. The department thus became responsible for the church's program both on Sundays and weekdays for children, young people, and young adults, and for the training of their leaders and teachers. Its policy centers upon churchmanship, education, and evangelism.

A general secretary is appointed by the Conference to superintend the whole work of the department and to organize its schemes of training. Two other secretaries have special responsibility for work among families, young adults, and young people. A fourth is appointed by the council to coordinate the children's work and arrange annual Scripture examinations for Sunday school scholars and teachers. It employs a field staff, usually professionally trained educationalists, who are appointed to districts and circuits in order to interpret policy and lend training programs.

The department controls a Trade Section, which produces Christian educational literature, syllabuses of study, and projects for the various age groups, audio-visual aid material, and a monthly magazine, Youth. The Holiday Section arranges bookings for the Wesley Guild Holidays Limited, and organizes regular educational and holiday tours abroad.

New headquarters at Muswell Hill, LONDON, were opened in May 1960, and named "Chester House" as a tribute to the generous services of the department's treasurer, H. Guy Chester. The buildings include a residential hostel for young Methodist workers and students.

The department works closely with the Ministry of Education in the nation's service of youth, and with other Christian educational bodies in the formulation of graded Sunday school lesson notes. It cooperates with the British Council of Churches on all ecumenical matters affecting youth. There is also a liaison with various other organizations, and from this has emerged the Association of Methodist Scouters and the Methodist Federation of Boys' Brigade Officers. The department issues its own certificates and diplomas for those who satisfactorily complete recognized courses of training in leadership among children or young people, and annually arranges Easter and summer schools for its constituency. The statistical returns of 1962 showed that the constituency served includes 560,000 meeting in Sunday departments, 37,500 on weekdays, together with 105,000 Sunday school leaders and teachers and 10,500 leaders of weekday activities. It is estimated that fifty percent of new members received annually into the church come from youth groups served by the Methodist Youth Department.

Youth Department (American, U.M.C.). In the United States work for youth is a department of the BOARD OF EDUCATION. It is known as the Methodist Youth Fellowship in the churches and is composed of youth between the ages of twelve and twenty-one. This includes junior-high youth, ages twelve through fourteen, those enrolled in the seventh, eighth, or ninth grades, known as the Junior High MYF; senior-high youth, ages fifteen through seventeen, known as the Senior MYF; and older youth, post-high-school youth who have not yet assumed adult responsibilities, who are working or in college and are still related to the local church youth program, known as the Older Youth MYF. Each age group has a council of youth officers and adult counselors to carry on all the activities for that age group.

The program of the MYF includes all activities of the youth in a church—Sunday school classes, Sunday evening and weekday meetings for worship, study, and fellowship. In addition, informal interest groups are formed from time to time in such areas as crafts, hobbies, music, nature lore, drama. Scout troops, clubs, and other groups sponsored by the church are a part of the MYF program. In addition, youth are expected to join the adults in the total program of the church, including the regular worship services, special services, and other all-church events.

The Methodist Youth Fellowship carries on an organization and program beyond the local church in subdistricts, districts, and annual conferences, including workshops, summer camps and conferences, and special events. The National Conference of the Methodist Youth Fellowship is the organization on the national level to bring together annually the presidents of annual conference MYF organizations to discuss the youth program, their place in the church, and current issues of vital importance to them.

The central office of the Methodist Youth Fellowship is in the Division of the Local Church of the General Board of Education of The United Methodist Church. Related also to the church's youth ministry is the Department of Youth Publications, Editorial Division in the General Board of Education, and designated staff persons in other boards and agencies. These comprise the Interboard Staff on Youth Work to bring unity and coordination in the total program.

YPRES METHODIST CHURCH (Flemish) is the head of a large Methodist circuit in West Flanders. The origin of the work was the opening in 1920 of the very first postwar relief station in Europe by the M.E. Church, South. A local church was organized in 1923, and a fine chapel and parsonage were erected in 1947 near the famous old Cloth Hall, 13 Beluikstraat. Pastors have been G. Twynham, 1920-21; J. Schyns, 1923-24; F. vanden Wyngaert, 1925-28; A. Mietes, 1929-30; J. van Kesteren, 1931-32; J. Mietes, 1933-37; J. Drubbels, since 1938.

YUGOSLAVIA (Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia) is located on the Balkan peninsula in southeastern Europe. Yugoslavia was created after World War I and consists of the following six republics: Slovenia, Croatia, Serbia, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Montenegro, and Macedonia. The three official languages of Yugoslavia are Serbo-Croatian, Slovenian, and Macedonian. The population is close to 20,000,000. The capital city is Belgrade, with the other major centers being Zagreb, Lyublyana, Sarajevo, Skopje, and Novi Sad.

No accurate religious census is available but a good estimate would be that about forty per cent of the population belongs to Eastern Orthodoxy (specifically to The Serbian Orthodox Church and The Macedonian Orthodox Church), about thirty percent to the Roman Catholic Church, about ten percent are Muslims, less than one per cent are Protestants and less than one per cent Jewish. The rest of the people are Communists and non-Communist atheists or agnostics. Of the Protestant denominations the largest are the Evangelical (Lutheran), and Reformed (Calvinist) Churches, with Baptists, Methodists, Pentecostals, Free Brethren, and Adventists consisting of tiny minorities, each church having not more than 2,000 members.

Methodism in Yugoslavia. The work of the M.E. Church in the territories of present Yugoslavia, which formerly belonged to the Austro-Hungarian monarchy, was commenced in 1898 when some German members of the Blue Cross Temperance Society in Bachka (a region in northeast Yugoslavia now part of the Autonomous Province of Vojvodina) invited Robert Möller, the Methodist preacher from Vienna, AUSTRIA, to evangelize among them. This led to an invitation to F. H. OTTO MELLE (later bishop of the German Methodist Annual Conference) as one of the first preachers. His work which commenced in 1899 or 1900 was successful despite strong opposition, and definite advances were made among the German colonists in Bachka and later in the other parts of Vojvodina. A number of ministers came from GERMANY, but local men such as John Tessenyi-Jakob were also trained and worked alongside the German pastors. Most of the work was done among the German minority, and some among the Hungarians, but little, if anything was done among the Slavic population.

By 1911 the Austria-Hungary Mission Conference was established, independent of the North German Conference. This conference had its main strength in Bachka where there were some 300 members. Institutional development and membership growth was steady until the outbreak of World War I. World War I apparently took the church by surprise. It did not disrupt the work of the churches, but did check their growth.

When the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes (later renamed Yugoslavia) was established after World War I, the churches in Vojvodina were incorporated into the newly formed Yugoslavia Mission Conference, to which were added in 1922 churches from Macedonia formerly related to the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, a Congregational missionary agency from Boston. The Congregationalist missionaries from the United States of America had extended their work from European Turkey and Bulgaria into Macedonia (then still under Turkish control) in 1873. Despite many hardships, approximately ten churches and a Girls' School were founded. These served the Macedonian population. The American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions was not able to take proper care of these churches when the Macedonian churches were separated from the headquarters located in Bulgaria as a result of the new political structure. Therefore the Board arranged a transfer of these churches to the Yugoslavia M.E. Mission Conference with cooperation from the Board of Foreign Missions of the M.E. Church in New York. Thus two fairly different groups of churches were united into one Mission Conference, but the merger was successful in every respect.

Some of the opposition experienced by the Macedonian Methodists from members of the Orthodox Churches and local authorities, and similar pressures upon the Vojvodina Methodists from the larger Protestant Churches and local authorities continued but diminished in scope. The church still was not officially recognized by the government but grew in membership until it passed the 1000 mark. The church suffered great financial hardship when appropriations were reduced by more than half of the amount granted, as a result of the depression. Thus the two Girls' Schools in Bitola and Novi Sad had to discontinue their operations in 1929. The other social activities also suffered but were continued. Among the most prominent was an orphanage in Srbobran, a Tuberculosis Sanitarium in Novi Sad, and an Old People's Home in Novi Vrbas. With the exception of the last named all these had to cease operations at the end of World War II as a result of government decrees and the expropriation of property.

During World War II the work of the Church was almost completely disrupted and a large number of members was lost as nearly all the German members fled or were placed in concentration camps. But by 1946 the church started a slow recovery in the face of opposition by the new Communist regime which came to power after the war ended. Small congregations started to function again in about forty localities mainly under the leadership of lay women and to a lesser extent of laymen and the four remaining ministers. The work of the churches was reduced to the strictly religious aspects and obstacles were frequently placed in its course of development. However, membership continued to grow slowly so that it reached a high point near the 3000 mark after it received a boost in membership by the addition of Slovak nationals living in Vojvodina. These had been formerly members of the outlawed Blue Cross Temperance Society. The key figures in this post-war work were George Sebele, Mrs. Paula Mojzes, and Krum Kalajliev, though the work of others was equally dedicated.

The present Church is permitted to maintain its ties with all agencies of The United Methodist Church as well as with various ecumenical agencies. In recent years, from about 1958 onward, the pressures by the government have been greatly relaxed and church work is carried on with relative freedom of worship. The major Methodist churches are located in Novi Sad (headquarters), Kisach (where the Home for Elderly People is located), Zrenjanin, Pivnitse, Skopje, Prilep, Koleshino, and Strumitsa. The church building in Skopje was seriously damaged by the 1963 earthquake and is being rebuilt with denominational and ecumenical funds from abroad.

The main method of obtaining converts is through personal and mass evangelization and revivals coupled with pastoral care and nurture. The worship is emphatically non-liturgical and informal with the main emphasis on the sermon. The pastors and members are staunchly conservative in theology. The religious and theological training of the membership and clergy is limited by the existing socio-economic conditions. Emphasis is on personal salvation and survival of the church through perpetuation of religious beliefs and personal piety. Despite being a minority church, its main contribution is to provide the opportunity for those dissatisfied with the religious milieu of the country to worship in churches more to their liking, and to influence positively many individuals to reform their life and provide an alternative approach to religious living from the one offered by the larger churches. When one considers the continuous opposition and antagonism which has been faced, the conclusion is that their work has been successful.

YUN, CHANG DUK (1910-), the ninth bishop of the Korean Methodist Church, was born in Pyongyang, KOREA, Dec. 8, 1910. His parents were devout Christians and his education was in the Methodist church schools in Pyongyang, graduating from Kwangsyung High in 1931, the Union Methodist Theological Seminary in SEUL in 1936, and the Theological Department of Kwansai Gakuin College, in Kobe, JAPAN, in 1941.

While in Japan he served as pastor of the Kobe Korean Church. Returning to Korea he served churches in what is now North Korea until the invasion of 1950, when he escaped the communist area, to serve as pastor of First Church of Taegu and as superintendent of the Taegu district.

He was a Crusade Scholar at GARRETT BIBLICAL INSTITUTE in 1954-56, at the same time serving the Korean Methodist Church in CHICAGO.

Returning to Korea he served as district superintendent, of the West Incheon District, as General Secretary of the Board of Evangelism of the Korean Methodist Church, and as pastor of Zion Methodist Church in Seoul.

He was ordained ELDER in 1939, was a delegate to the 1964 GENERAL CONFERENCE meeting in PITTSBURGH, and served four years as chairman of the East Annual Conference.

On Oct. 23, 1970 he was elected by the General Conference of the Korean Methodist Church, meeting in Seoul, on the first ballot as its ninth bishop.

BARON TCHI HO YUN

YUN, TCHI HO (1864-1945), first Korean to join the M.E. Church, South, was born in Sin-Tchon village, Asan County, South Choong-Chung Province, KOREA, Dec. 26, 1864. His father was a general in the Korean army and one-time Minister of Justice. Yun studied Chinese classics and at the age of seventeen was one of a group of young men selected to study government administration in JAPAN. Here he mastered the Japanese language and began the study of English.

Barely nineteen he was recommended to General Foote, the first U. S. Minister to Korea, as Korean interpreter and they arrived in SEUL from Japan in June 1883, and were instrumental in aiding ROBERT MACLAY, superintendent of the Methodist mission in Japan, in securing permission for Methodist missionaries to conduct medical and educational work in Korea in 1884. General Foote resigned early in 1885, and Yun went to Shanghai, entered the Anglo-Chinese School of the M.E. Church, South Mission, and was baptized in 1887. After studying at VANDERBILT and EMORY UNIVERSITIES he returned to Shanghai to teach English at his alma mater.

In 1894 as a result of political changes in Korea he was called to accept the position of Vice-Minister of Foreign Affairs. With the rank of baron he occupied many trouble spots for the Korean government and represented Korea at the coronation of the czar at St. Petersburg.

Upon his return to Korea in 1894, he urged Bishop E. R. HENDRIX and others to establish a Mission of the M.E. Church, South in Korea, and was influential in helping them secure land in both Seoul and Songdo. When the Japanese took control of Korea in 1905 he left government service and organized a boys' school in Songdo. In 1911 Baron Yun and five others, in a gross miscarriage of Japanese justice, were sentenced to six years imprisonment in an alleged plot to assassinate the Governor-General. Four years later he was granted an Imperial pardon and his rights and rank were restored. He became general secretary of the Y.M.C.A. for five years, and was president of that association for many years. He was also active on the boards of various high schools and colleges, as well as in church, cultural and research organizations, so much so that he was often referred to as the most influential Christian in Korea.

Baron Yun spoke five languages and in 1907 in TOKYO he gave an outstanding address to the WORLD STUDENT CHRISTIAN FEDERATION in English, Japanese, and Chinese. He died in Seoul in 1945.

ZAHUR-AL-HAQQ (1834- ?), early Moslem convert in INDIA, the first convert in BAREILLY, was baptized in June or July, 1859. He was often called the first convert of Methodism in all India. May, June, and July of 1859 brought the first converts in Moradabad and LUCKNOW, as well as in Bareilly, and four out of five of these were Moslems. Among these Zahur-al-Haqq was outstanding.

Born in a cultured Sunni Moslem family, he early learned Persian and Arabic as well as Urdu and Hindi, and was carefully instructed in the Islamic religion. But he was plagued by doubts, and began to study Hinduism and joined the Parmami sect. Disappointed there, too, he found a job as a teacher in a school in Bareilly. One day he heard the Methodists preaching in the streets. He undertook serious study of Christianity, began attending church services and soon declared his faith and asked for baptism. His wife left him and kept their son from him. His father and other relatives tried diligently and persistently to make him recant. But he persisted, joined the mission school as a teacher, and was successively licensed as an exhorter, then as a local preacher, and finally was ordained as a deacon, and after that an elder. In time he became the first Indian district superintendent. When his Moslem wife refused to return to him, he was married by Christian rites to a Christian. At the age of twenty his Moslem son was converted, and he and two sons by the Christian wife became honored and successful Methodist ministers.

ZAMBIA. The Republic of Zambia is situated in the heart of the southern half of the continent of AFRICA. It is fringed by the Portuguese territories of ANGOLA to the west, and MOZAMBIQUE and Malawi to the east, with RHODESIA to the south, and the Congo and Tanzania to the north. Zambia has no sea coast, and lies entirely at an altitude of between 3,000 and 4,000 feet above sea level. These facts explain why western influence came relatively late to Zambia, and why missionary activity largely preceded any political or trading ventures in the area.

David Livingstone was the great pioneer of Christian activity in this part of Africa, which had been unknown and unexplored until his time. His three great journeys of exploration took place in 1852-57, 1858-64, and 1865-73. His aim was to find a means of easy penetration into the heart of the continent, so that missionaries and traders could follow. After his first tour he declared: "I go back to Africa to try and make an open path for commerce and Christianity." But it was not until after his tragic death at Old Chitambo in 1873, that missionary activity began in earnest.

Methodist work in Zambia began through the efforts of two separate missionary societies representing the PRIMITIVE METHODIST and the Wesleyan Methodist churches of Britain. The Primitive Methodist Missionary Society had established work in SOUTH AFRICA, and through contact and cooperation with the Paris Evangelical Missionary Society, came to hear of the need for work amongst the subjects of Lewanika of the Barotse in the south and center of Zambia, namely the Balla and the BaTonga. Henry Buckenham led the first party, which arrived in Barotse territory in 1890. Lewanika had just completed a treaty with the British South Africa Company, and was in the throes of misgivings when the party arrived. He was unwilling to give authority for the new work, and at one point the new missionaries were accused of witchcraft! However in 1893 he gave permission for work among the Balla, and sent some of his people to help. Although stations were established at Nkala (1893), Nazhila (1895), Siajoba (1901) and Nambala (1905), the first baptisms among the Balla did not take place until 1906. The fact that the missionaries seemed to have come from Lewanika probably did not predispose the Balla to accept them or their message. Two other centers were opened soon after: Kanchindu (in place of Siajoba) (1907), and Kasenga (1909). The missionaries were more successful in their attempts at educational work and the production of literature in the Ila language. A grammar was published in 1906, and the New Testament in 1914. In 1916 land was purchased at Kafue for a large Training Institute, of which John R. Fell was appointed principal. Here teacher-evangelists were trained for the Wesleyan Methodist Church, the London Missionary Society, and the Primitive Methodist Church.

Meanwhile the Wesleyan METHODIST MISSIONARY SOCIETY had begun work in Zambia. The son of a Lala chief was converted whilst working on a mine in Rhodesia, and was responsible for rousing interest in having a missionary among his own people in Zambia. The first missionary came in 1912, but was invalidated home in the following year, being replaced by S. Douglas Gray. Work was established at Chipembi, and spread widely from there, including the first urban work at Lusaka and Broken Hill (now known as Kabwe). A school was later established at Chipembi, which became the country's pioneer in girls' education. When the various branches of British Methodism joined in union in 1932, the work of the two societies in Zambia was united.

The territory today known as Zambia was declared a Crown Colony of the British Empire in 1924, and was then known as Northern Rhodesia. It incorporated the much older Barotse Protectorate, which had been established with Lewanika through the activities of the British South Africa Company. Nineteen hundred twenty-four was a significant moment in the development of Zambia, for the Cooper Mining Companies were coming into production, and African townships were springing up in the north of the territory to house the men from many different tribes drawn there by the opportunity of earning money. African Christians on the Copperbelt gathered together for fellowship and worship, showing little regard for denominational differences. It was not until 1936, however, that missionary activity reached the point of organized cooperation and united activity through a United Mission to the Copperbelt. Methodist staff played an important part in this team, and continued to do so when the churches of the Copperbelt became part of the United Church of Central Africa in Rhodesia (itself a union of the ex-London Missionary Society with Church of Scotland congregations). The African congregations were involved in this from 1945, and the European congregations joined in 1958.

The Methodist Church continued its separate existence in the center and south of the country for another six and a half years. The original mission stations were still centers of activity. Educational work continued to expand with the opening of secondary schools at Chipembi (1948), Kafue (1957) and Njase (1960). Upper primary boarding schools for girls were established at Kasenga, Keembe, Masuku, and Nambala. Teacher training was transferred from Kafue to Livingstone in 1958, when several small colleges were integrated to form a Christian Council College, with a Methodist as its first principal. Primary schools were for a long time supervised by the circuit staffs, but this responsibility came to take a disproportionate part of a minister's time. Two education secretaries were appointed, and a number of African teachers were appointed to replace ministers as managers of schools. Shortly after Zambia became independent in October 1964, all primary schools were willingly transferred to government management. In large measure this led to the disbandment of the mission stations, which now remain solely as the residences of the ministers responsible for the rural circuits. In some circuits new manses have been erected close to the government administrative centers for the area, for example at Namwala and Sinazongwe.

In January 1965 the Methodist Church became part of the United Church of Zambia, which also includes the earlier United Church of Central Africa in Rhodesia, together with the Church of Barotse, founded by the Paris Evangelical Missionary Society. The problem of ordination was not raised by this union of nonepiscopal churches. All that was necessary was a public recognition that from the time of the United Church's inauguration, there was one "common fellowship within the United Church of Zambia." Colin Morris became the first president, in acknowledgment of the leadership he had given in the country and in the Church, in the struggle for independence. He led the new church for four years before a Zambian president was elected. Doyce Musunsa was the first Synod Clerk, or administrative head of the Church.

The United Church is an autonomous body divided into four presbyteries, which act under the authority of the Synod, the highest court of the Church.

Whilst the aim is for the church to become financially as well as organizationally autonomous, the cost of a full-time minister makes this, as yet, a distant goal.

Every effort is made to recruit Zambian candidates for training for the ministry, and some with nine years' schooling are in training in the United Church Ministerial Training College in the Copperbelt. Missionaries are engaged in pastoral work especially in the English-speaking congregations, as well as occasionally in a specialized capacity. No statistics of church membership or of church officers have been compiled in recent years, but the 1967 edition of the World Christian Handbook quoted figures of 648 places of worship and a community of 33,729.

Then studied in Grade School in PANAMA and in the Methodist School in San José, COSTA RICA, where his father was serving as missionary from Mexico. He felt the call to the ministry in 1934, took part of his training at the Union Evangelical Seminary, and finished it through the Conference Course of Study.

ZELLER, ANDREW (1755-1839), American United Brethren preacher and church pioneer, was born in Berks County, Pa., of Swiss ancestry. In 1805 he moved with his family to a farm north of Germantown, Ohio. After his conversion, about 1790, he actively promoted the work of the church. His farmhouse both in PENNSYLVANIA and OHIO became a home for preachers and a place for religious meetings. The first United Brethren congregation west of the Allegheny Mountains was organized in a log meeting house which he built near his Germantown home. He was an active licensed preacher and a member of the first session of the Miami Conference, Church of the UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST, in 1810. His dedication and administrative ability were recognized when he was elected to the office of bishop in 1817. He continued in this position until he retired in 1821.

Andrew Zeller married Catherine Forrer in 1779. They had nine children, five daughters and four sons. Reflecting the fact that many preachers stopped at the Zeller home, all his daughters married preachers.

Zeller was an earnest, wholehearted Christian, a plain practical preacher and a man of good judgment in the affairs of the church. He died on May 25, 1839 and was buried in a small graveyard on his farm. In 1865 the body was removed to the Germantown cemetery.

He prepared for the ministry in York Collegiate Institute; LEBANON VALLEY COLLEGE (A.B. 1911); and Bonebrake (now UNITED) THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY (B.D. 1914). The honorary D.D. degree was conferred upon him by Lebanon Valley College in 1922. He was married to Ethel Redding in 1911. Their four children have attained distinction in the fields of medicine, teaching, and social sciences.

Ordained in 1911 by the Pennsylvania Conference, Church of the UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST, Ziegler served pastorates as follows: Duncannon, Pa. (1909-11); Wagner-Aley, Ohio (1912-14); BALTIMORE, Md., Otterbein Memorial (1914-17); and Hagerstown, Md., St. Paul's (1917-21). The United Brethren GENERAL CONFERENCE of 1921 elected Dr. Ziegler to the office of General Secretary of the United Brethren Foreign Missionary Society, a position involving extensive traveling throughout the world, and the making of many contacts with Mission Boards and agencies of other denominations. Dr. Ziegler's writings for church periodicals have been extensive. He wrote a number of mission study text books. When the Evangelical and United Brethren denominations merged in 1946, Dr. Ziegler was elected Associate Secretary of the Division of World Missions, a position he served with distinction until his retirement in 1958.

ZINSER, JOHN GEORGE (1806-1883), American Evangelical Association pioneer preacher, was born in Wurttemberg, GERMANY, Nov. 28, 1806. His family emigrated to America in 1817 and settled in Pickaway County, Ohio in 1826, where two years later they became members of the EVANGELICAL ASSOCIATION. Zinser joined the Eastern Conference in 1829, and in 1834 began his long and effective career as a pioneer presiding elder. He was a front rank leader in extending the work into western PENNSYLVANIA, OHIO, MICHIGAN, INDIANA, ILLINOIS, WISCONSIN; and IOWA. His Ohio District (1837-43) reached into three states and two territories, requiring a round on horseback of 2,000 miles.

John G. Zinser was a staunch supporter in launching the cause of missions, 1839; publication of the German Bible, 1841; removal and relocating the Evangelical Publishing House in Cleveland, Ohio, 1854; and the founding of the Ebenezer Orphan Home, Tiffin, Ohio, 1866, of which he was the first superintendent.

"His sermons were so profound and intellectually clear," said Bishop REUBEN YEAKEL, "that they made deep impressions. . . . He was a great reader and close thinker, as his editorials while editor of the Christliche Botschafter, and many other articles from his pen clearly show. He was probably the last of the chief pioneers of the Evangelical Association, whose heroic labors extended from the East into the far West—who under untold self-denials and hardships, founded and spread the work of God in our church." Death came Oct. 11, 1883 at his home in El Paso, Ill.

COUNT ZINZENDORF

ZINZENDORF, NICOLAUS LUDWIG VON (1700-1760), the leader of the Renewed Church of the United Brethren, was born in Dresden on May 26, 1700. A Lutheran of strong ecumenical leanings, he formed in his youth "The Order of the Mustard Seed," which was to include a bishop, an archbishop, and a cardinal. A layman, he preached every Sunday, and built up a Christian community on his estate at Berthelsdorf. He welcomed the Moravian refugees led by CHRISTIAN DAVID and thus inaugurated the Renewed Church. Zinzendorf became a Moravian bishop and by his generous benefactions saved the Brethren from bankruptcy. He disagreed with JOHN WESLEY, whom he regarded as unsound on justification, and was criticized by him, especially for his "blood and wounds" hymns. Zinzendorf regarded each Church as a Communion, not as the local congregation, but as a tropus, or training-ground, within the larger, comprehensive Church, which comprised all Communions. This tropus idea was a valuable contribution to the conception of a world Church. Zinzendorf died at Herrnhut on May 9, 1760.

ZION'S ADVOCATE. The earliest United Brethren periodical was the Zion's Advocate, sponsored by the Miami Conference, Church of the UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST. Sometime about the beginning of September 1829, AARON FARMER, a member of that conference, brought out the first issue. It was an eight-page publication, in English, selling for one dollar per year in advance or one dollar fifty cents if not paid before expiration time. It was issued every two weeks and consisted of a collection of articles taken from various religious publications. It was printed by J. Allen, Office of Western Annotator, Salem, Washington County, Ind.

Later that year Aaron Farmer was assigned to Orange Circuit in INDIANA. When the Indiana Conference was formed in 1830, he was listed as a member without appointment. Then in 1831, he was assigned to the Flatrock Circuit. The magazine thus issued by a minister of another conference was discontinued toward the close of volume two.

The magazine failed partly from the inexperience of both the editor and the conference and from lack of subscribers. It was not until 1834 that a successful venture, the Religious Telescope, was inaugurated.

ZION'S HERALD. From Jan. 9, 1823, until March 16, 1955, Zion's Herald enjoyed the reputation of being the oldest Methodist weekly in the world. Never an official paper, it held a position of freedom few church-related papers ever equaled. Its first sponsoring body was called the Society for Giving and Receiving Religious Intelligence, and after several successor groups, it finally came under the auspices of its present owners, the Boston Wesleyan Association, in 1831. There were repeated efforts to merge it with the New York Christian Advocate and, indeed for a period of about four years, beginning in 1824, such a combination did appear under the title The Christian Advocate and Journal and Zion's Herald. But the New England Methodists had tasted success with their beloved Herald, and they called it back. Then, after several sponsoring groups published it, they resumed their regular publication with their newly formed Boston Wesleyan Association.

A series of distinguished editors fired its editorials: ABEL STEVENS made it a lively and lonely supporter of the abolitionist cause from 1841 to 1852. He was followed by ERASTUS O. HAVEN, GILBERT HAVEN, who was later a bishop, Charles Parkhurst, and LEWIS O. HARTMAN, later a bishop. Its editors were always in the thick of things and produced a paper whose unpopularity with "the establishment" was probably its greatest reason for being. It has owed that independence to that amazing group of self-perpetuating Methodist laymen—never more than twenty members—who since 1831 have put the resources of the Boston Wesleyan Association behind this publication.

Housed in the Wesleyan Building at 581 Boylston Street in Boston, Zion's Herald still continues to be published as a monthly magazine for New England Methodists. It can be said of it now, what was said of it in 1890 by Frederick Burrill Graves, "New England Methodism is clearly mirrored in the paper; and to know how this branch of our church stands on large or small questions of vital interest to Methodism, no better criteria of judgment can be had than those found in the columns of this paper."

ZUNGUZE, ESCRIVÃO ANGLAZE (1914-), African bishop for MOZAMBIQUE and one of the first Africans to be elected a bishop in the history of Methodist work in AFRICA. He was born in Morrumbene, Mozambique, on April 14, 1914, the son of Anglaze and Vetilange Zunguze. His parents died when he was small, and he was raised by an uncle, an evangelist. His wife Thelma is a graduate of the Hartzell's Girl School in Chiecuque, and they have five children.

He became a Christian in 1928 when attending a revival to which his cousin had invited him. He began his schooling at Chissico Station, Mollumbene, Inhambana, after which he went to the Cambine (Mozambique) Mission where he studied until 1932. There he taught and continued the study of English. He went to Old Umtali (Southern RHODESIA) for secondary work, 1935-38, serving there as a preacher for the juniors. He went on to study theology at the Old Umtali Biblical Institute, 1939-41, and at Carcavelos, PORTUGAL, 1959-60.

ESCRIVAO A. ZUNGUZE

Entering the ministry in 1946, he was ordained an elder in 1950, was a delegate to the Africa Central Conference, 1948, '52, and '56; he was elected a delegate to the GENERAL CONFERENCES of 1960 and '64, but was not granted a passport to leave his country for the latter. For several years he was pastor of the large Methodist church at Cambine, one of the largest mission centers in the country. He was elected bishop in 1964.

He is a member of the executive committee of the National Council of Churches in Mozambique. Considered an excellent preacher, as well as a fine singer, he has become well known in Methodist churches in the United States during his periodic visits to that land. His present assignment is MOZAMBIQUE and SOUTH AFRICA (the area around Johannesburg with Methodist membership of about 19,500). Both of these countries are included in the South East Africa Methodist Conference. He has become well-known in the COUNCIL OF BISHOPS of The United Methodist Church.

ZÜRICH, Switzerland, is the largest city of the country and has a population of 432,500 (1969) of whom the large majority are Protestants. The place is of great antiquity and early became a Roman station. In 1219 it was declared a free imperial city. In 1351 it joined the Swiss Confederation.

The preaching of Huldrych Zwingli in the cathedral, beginning Jan. 1, 1519, with the continuous explanation of the Gospel according to Matthew, and his statesmanship, made it the center of the German-speaking Swiss Reformation.

The first Methodist to preach in Zürich was Hermann zur Jakobsbmühlen, who came there on Oct. 1, 1856. At the first announced service nobody appeared, but very soon the number of hearers increased rapidly up to 400. In 1858 a house, called Zum Pfauen, was bought and its dancing hall converted into a church. The first Quarterly Meeting was held on June 4, 1859. Some opposition arose, especially from the state-related Protestant church. But the work progressed and expanded rapidly. Among the successful pioneers was Henri Nuelsen, the father of the later Bishop JOHN L. NUELSEN, who was born in the house Zum Pfauen. In the course of the following decades several churches were built in the city and circuits organized in the canton of Zürich.

A special event occurred in 1890 when a first book shop was opened; and in 1892, when a new building for the newly organized publishing house (CHRISTLICHE VEREINSBUCHHANDLUNG) was erected. The book shop was then moved there and printing facilities installed. Later the presiding bishop transferred his office into the same building, which became the administrative center not only of Swiss Methodism but of the whole Central and Southern Europe Central Conference.

In 1911 the deaconess work of the Methodist Church in Germany and Switzerland was divided into three parts. One of the motherhouses was built in Zürich and became Diakonissenhaus Bethanien, and is a hospital and deaconess training center.

More recently, in 1961, a new branch of Methodist life and work was opened. A girls' hostel, belonging to the Zürich First Church, was converted into a hotel which has become well known and is very popular. With its meeting rooms it proves to be a real "Methodist Center," as its name indicates. It is located at Zeltweg 20, in the same building as the pastor's home and office. One of the first conferences held there was the session of the executive committee of the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL to prepare for the OSLO WORLD METHODIST CONFERENCE. The emblem of the World Methodist Council which then was shown for the first time was designed by Bishop FERDINAND SIGG with the help of two members of the Zürich Methodist churches.

In recent years the five Methodist churches of the city had a membership of about 1,800, fourteen Sunday schools with sixty-five helpers and about 450 children.

Diakonissenhaus Bethanien. On July 8, 1874, during the session of the Annual Conference of the Methodist Church in GERMANY AND SWITZERLAND, held in Schaffhausen, Switzerland, four ministers—Carl Weiss, Heinrich Mann, Friedrich Eilers, and Jürgen Wischhusen—decided to found a motherhouse for deaconesses, i.e., for women and girls ready to nurse the sick and the aged and to live a communal life. Outside of a little monthly pocket money, these deaconesses would receive no salary, but the motherhouse was to provide for everything in days of health, sickness, and age. The work began with one deaconess in the apartment of the Methodist minister in FRANKFORT, Germany, Friedrich Eilers. But it grew rapidly, young women coming from different parts of Germany and Switzerland. In 1911 it proved necessary to divide the work into three branches. Motherhouses were established in Hamburg for North Germany, in Frankfort for South Germany, and in Zürich for Switzerland.

In Switzerland, "Bethany" sisters were already at work in St. Gallen and had been since 1885, in Zürich since 1887, in Lausanne since 1890, and in Geneva since 1908. They live in "families" under the leadership of head sisters.

In 1912 a new hospital and motherhouse building was opened in Zürich. At the same time a school of nursing was established, and this obtained the official recognition of the government. The hospital was entirely renovated and modernized in 1965-66, so that today there are 140 beds in two buildings in different medical, surgical, orthopedic, and other branches. Besides these buildings there are two houses for active and retired deaconesses, a church building or chapel on these grounds, and other buildings.

Other similar houses are in St. Gallen, Gais, Davos, Lucerne, Lausanne, Spiez, Bern, and Geneva, most of these being homes for the aged. The motherhouse (motherhaus) at Zürich is the center of the whole work and the home for 256 deaconesses (1966). About ninety of these work in hospitals belonging to "Bethany"; others work in community hospitals, in homes for the aged, in nurseries, among women prisoners and a few in parishes. Some labor in connection with the Methodist mission in North America.

In the school of nursing, deaconesses and so-called free nurses are trained. This training includes not only medical and nursing knowledge and technique, but also understanding of the Scriptures, church history, psychology of the sick, ethics, etc. The motherhouse is under the supervision of two directors, both ministers of the Methodist Church, who also act as chaplains, and of a head sister. All the deaconesses are members of the Methodist Church. The directors and the head sister share their responsibility with a board of management and a general assembly.

The distinctive signs of the Bethanienwestern are the white bonnet and a brooch with the triple sign of a cross, an anchor and a heart, symbols for faith, hope, and love. These are the signs under which these deaconesses want to serve their Lord Jesus Christ.

ZWICKAU, Germany, center of the Saxon mining district, was reached by the Methodist revival from Ruedsdorf before 1870. The large suburb, Planitz, reported Methodist meetings as early as 1866-67. In 1870 the "Bill for Dissidents" was passed, bringing comparative religious liberty in the Kingdom of Saxony. It became possible to leave the established church and form new societies without long and tedious special petitions. The annual conference now sent a pastor to Zwickau, thus observing the successful Methodist strategy of sending a minister to a town without any members in order to create an urban center for rural and suburban preaching places. After some efforts to perform their evangelistic task within the Lutheran Church, the Methodists founded the Zwickau Circuit of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the Kingdom of Saxony (1871). All Saxon circuits formed in the following half century nominally belonged to this Zwickau Circuit. From here the awakening spread. Since 1873 there has been a candidate for the ministry stationed at Schwarzenberg (Erzgebirge) where the first Methodist chapel in Saxony was built in 1883. Zwickau then became the residence of the presiding elder of the Berlin District; from here Ernst Gebhardt traveled throughout the North and East as superintendent and as gospel singer. There were periods of advance after the consecration of the first church in Zwickau (1885), before and after the building of the new Friedenskirche (Peace Church, 1931) and during the serious time in and after the Second World War, including the extension of the Methodist center (district house, home for the aged, a deaconess home). As a center of industry and with its active congregation being the largest Methodist local church in Germany, Zwickau is likely to remain the center of East German Methodism.

METHODIST BISHOPS: THEIR ORDINATION AS DEACONS AND ELDERS

by Roy H. Short

In the tabular compilation below is given the year of each man's elevation to the episcopacy, his name, date of birth, date of death, and the name of the bishop or bishops who ordained him deacon and elder. The table lists all of the bishops of the church from 1784 to 1967, but does not include the bishops elected by The United Methodist Church in 1968 nor those from the former Evangelical United Brethren Church. (This list furnished to answer queries from episcopally ordained men as to their Methodist "succession.")

by Albea Godbold

This table lists by states, and by denominations within the states, the annual conferences, provisional annual conferences, mission conferences, and missions (overseas conferences are not included save for one in Canada and those in Cuba and Puerto Rico) of the Methodist Episcopal Church before and after 1844, the Methodist Episcopal Church, South (1845-1939), the Methodist Protestant Church (1828-1939), the Methodist Church (1866-1877), and The Methodist Church (1939-1968). The conferences which continued in The United Methodist Church (1968-) are identified, including changes in names and boundaries through June, and in some instances through July 1968.

It should be said that since the M. P. Church was loosely organized, since the action of its General Conference regarding annual conference names, boundaries, dates for mergers and divisions, and the like, was in the last analysis advisory and not binding at the annual conference level, and since the denomination did not print General Minutes to show what actually happened each year in the conferences, it is hardly possible to compile a completely accurate table of its annual conferences. However, it is fair to say that there is documentary evidence for the facts and figures used in this table, and it is believed they are generally reliable.

The reader should remember that while the Methodist Church (1866-1877) was a bona fide ecclesiastical organization and must therefore be recognized as a denomination, it was little more than the northern conferences of the Methodist Protestant Church. For this reason in this table the annual conferences of the Methodist Church (1866-1877) are identified only in connection with the M. P. Church, as indicated in the next paragraph.

To save space and avoid the necessity of listing a large number of annual conferences as belonging to the M. P. Church prior to 1866, showing them again as conferences of the Methodist Church from 1866 to 1877, and then printing them a third time as conferences of the M. P. Church, a code is used in this table. A † sign before the name of a conference means that it was an M. P. conference prior to 1866, an M. C. conference during part or all of the time from 1866 to 1877, and if it continued in existence, was an M. P. conference again after 1877. A ‡ sign before the name of a conference indicates that it was organized or recognized by the M. P. Church during the years 1866 to 1877. A § sign before the name of a conference means that it was organized or recognized by the Methodist Church between 1866 and 1877.

The capital letters in column one and elsewhere in the table stand for the denominations—ME, Methodist Episcopal; MES, Methodist Episcopal, South; MP, Methodist Protestant; MC, Methodist (1866-1877); M, Methodist (1939-1968); and UM, United Methodist.

In column two the conferences in each state are listed alphabetically within each denomination. The arabic numerals preceding the names of the conferences indicate the chronological order of their organization by the denomination in the particular state. If the denomination created two or more conferences in the state in the same year, they are given the same number with letters added, as for example 2a and 2b, or 3a, 3b, and 3c. When the chronological order coincides with the alphabetical order, no numerals are used.

The figures in column three represent the year the annual conference began and the year it disappeared. In this table the beginning date for a conference means the year in which the preachers met with a bishop or other presiding officer and organized the body. In some instances this is not the year in which the General Conference authorized the creation of the conference, nor is it the year in which statistics for the conference first appear in the General Minutes. In instances in which the actual date of organization could not be authoritatively confirmed by the researcher, the date entered in the table is the one given by the best historical authority available.

The dates indicated in this table for the organization of some annual conferences differ from the dates found in their own journals and in the General Minutes. In view of the criteria adopted for the compilation of this table, the differences are both unavoidable and understandable. A number of present day conferences date their beginning from the time of the organization of the first annual conference in their geographical location, regardless of whether or not the conference today bears the same name as the original body. But in this table, every time a conference changes its name or becomes a conference in a new denomination, it is a new conference with a different date of organization. Also, some conferences date their origin from the time of the organization of the mission or mission conference which preceded them, but in this table missions and mission conferences are different entities with their own dates of beginning and conclusion.

Conferences ceased to exist for the following reasons: division into two or more bodies, merger with or absorption by other conferences, mere change of name, the union of denominations, and because the parent church decided to discontinue work in the particular region. The final outcome for each conference up to June 1968 is listed in column six.

Column four gives the location, that is, the territory, of each annual conference when it was organized. Later changes in boundaries are not indicated, except as they may be identified in the data entered in column four in connection with successor conferences which have been created through the years by divisions, mergers, realignments, and changes of name. By noting the chronological order of the creation of annual conferences in a state, the reader may get some idea of conference boundary changes with the passage of time.

For reasons of space, explanations of boundaries as given in column four are condensed. Details are often omitted. For example, if a conference embraces all or the major portion of one state and small segments of several adjoining states, not all of the latter may be named. If possible, the data on the location of each conference are compressed into one line in column four.

Column five shows how each conference was formed. New conferences have continually appeared because of the occupation of new territory by the denomination, because of the division, merger, or change of name of existing conferences, and because of the breakup or union of denominations.

Column six shows what happened to the conferences as time passed. Through the years many well known conference names and others not so well known have disappeared. This happened because the parent denomination had reason to divide, merge, absorb, and even abolish conferences. The division of the church in 1844, the sundering of the M. P. Church in 1866 and its reunion in 1877, unification in 1939, and union in 1968 caused the birth of some new conferences and the demise of many others. On the other hand, a few conferences have continued from the beginning until now with the same name and with part if not all of their original territory. However, as indicated above, every time a continuing conference's denomination changes, the conference itself shows again in this table with a new beginning date, albeit with the same name.

To save space, the word "conference" is used in this table only in those places where it is necessary to distinguish a conference from a mission, a mission conference, or a provisional conference.

When two or more conferences are named in columns five and six, they are always separated by commas. The absence of a comma between what may appear to be two conference names denotes a conference with a double title, such as the Missouri and Arkansas Conference ME, or the Arkansas and Louisiana Conference MP.

Asterisks (*) denote Negro annual conferences. Diamond signs (◊) indicate conferences organized by the two Episcopal Methodisms between 1845 and 1939 in territory already included in each other's existing annual conferences at the time of the division in 1844.

Some conferences organized by the M. E. Church in the South immediately following the Civil War included both white and Negro ministers and churches. As time passed, these conferences were divided along racial but not geographical lines. Sometimes the conference retaining the original name was white and sometimes Negro, as indicated in the table.

The names of foreign language conferences—Chinese, Danish, German, Italian, Japanese, Norwegian, Spanish, and Swedish—are printed in this table as they appear in the General Minutes of the particular denominations, even though in some instances they vary slightly from the names used in the yearly journals of such conferences. Each of these conferences is listed in the table under the state (if any) appearing in its name. If no state is included in the name, the conference is listed under the state in which it had the most churches.

The states in which the various foreign language conferences will be found are as follows: (1) German: California, Illinois, Kansas, Minnesota, New York, Ohio, Texas, and Washington. (2) Swedish: Illinois, Iowa, Minnesota, New York, and Texas. (3) Spanish (Mexican, Latin, and Latin-American): California, Florida, New Mexico, and Texas. (4) Norwegian and Danish: Minnesota and Washington. (5) Oriental: California. (6) Italian: New York.

The phrase "Merged in 1939" appears frequently in column six. It refers of course to the unification of the three branches of Methodism to form The Methodist Church. Generally the M.E., M.E.S., and M.P. conferences totally or partially involved in the 1939 mergers are not named, because the number is too large, and because in many if not in most instances their identity will be clear to the reader anyway. In like manner, when foreign language conferences are absorbed by English-speaking ones, and when Central Jurisdiction conferences are blended with those of other Jurisdictions, usually the bodies involved in the mergers are not named.

Cross references are entered where needed, but there are no duplicate listings of conferences in the table.

TABLE OF E. U. B. CONFERENCES

By John H. Ness, Jr.

This table lists by states, and by denominations within the states, the annual conferences of the Evangelical Association (1807-1922), The United Evangelical Church (1894-1922), The Evangelical Church (1922-1946), Church of the United Brethren in Christ (1800-1946), and The Evangelical United Brethren Church (1946-1968). There is no attempt to differentiate between a mission conference and a regular conference.

The capital letters used in the table stand for:

EUB—Evangelical United Brethren Church

UB—United Brethren in Christ

Ev. Assn. (EA)—Evangelical Association

Ev. Ch. (EC)—Evangelical Church

UE—United Evangelical Church

(U)—former United Brethren conference in Evangelical

United Brethren Church

(E)—former Evangelical Church conference in Evangelical United Brethren Church

(United)—former United Evangelical conference in The Evangelical Church

UM—United Methodist Church

Since merger plans have been completed for most of the former E.U.B. annual conferences, this table has been extended beyond 1968 to show the conclusion of the conferences in The United Methodist Church.

Introductory material preceding the Table of Methodist Conferences furnishes further explanatory details for this table as well.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

In a monumental undertaking such as this Encyclopedia a multitude of authorities have been consulted, some of them many times over. To most of the articles one or two printed sources of further information are appended, some works appearing many times. Those which have been used in five or more articles are here listed in the alphabetical order of their authors or (for anonymous or serial works) titles. For these select works full bibliographical data are supplied in this listing only, and after the individual articles only short titles appear. This not only saves much duplication of details of little interest to many people, but brings together one of the most comprehensive bibliographies of world Methodism ever published, which we believe will be of great service to librarians and scholars. To render this of even greater value, we have appended a rearrangement of these short titles under subject headings, so that the reader can discover at a glance the major works upon many broad Methodist topics. This arrangement by subjects moves from reference works to twenty-four distinct categories both topical and topographical, arranged in alphabetical order, several of them subdivided. These major categories and their subdivisions are listed below.

Our thanks are due to Mr. Gordon Duncan of the Abingdon Press for much bibliographical research in connection with this feature, ably supported by the secretarial labors of Mrs. Evelyn Sutton of Lake Junaluska, and especially of Mrs. Louise Queen, who also coordinated the bibliographical entries in the articles themselves with this bibliography.
